The HISTORY of GENEVA.

S E C T. I.

Containing the Description of Geneva and its Territory ; with a Sketch of its History to the Year 1500.

THE town or city of Geneva stands on an eminence, at the discharge of the Rhone, out of the lake of Geneva, or lake Leman ; and below it the Rhone joins itself to the Arve. Spon, the learned historian of Geneva, is dissatisfied with the derivation of the word Geneva from the juniper shrubs that grew upon the eminence whereon it is built ; “ as if, says he, the Latin or French tongues were spoken four ages before Rome was built.” But he does not consider, that both the Latin and Greek tongues, as well as the French, have their roots in the Celtic, of which the Tuscan itself was no other than a dialect. It is divided by the Rhone into three unequal parts, which are joined by four bridges. The largest division lies towards Savoy ; another, called St. Gervais, adjoins to the Pais de Gex in France ; and the third consists of an island in the Rhone, of seven hundred feet in length, and two hundred broad. Its inhabitants in general are Calvinists. It contains six churches, of which the finest is the cathedral of St. Peter. The professors of philosophy read their lectures in the chapel of the Maccabees, where the Italians and Germans are allowed to perform divine worship ; and in the year 1707, the Lutherans obtained the like indulgence, but within a private house. The town-house of Geneva is a stately building ; and its university, which was founded in 1558, and has twelve professors belonging to it, is, to this day, famous all over Europe.

Description of Geneva.

MANY circumstances contribute to render Geneva, small as its territory is, a most delightful place. The air of tranquility, freedom, and politeness, that is visible amongst the better sort of the inhabitants, is very inviting for strangers, especially those of a studious or contemplative cast, to reside amongst them. Its neighbourhood, both by art and nature, is enchantingly pleasant ; its air wholesome ; its inhabitants, mechanics especially, are industrious and ingenious. The city and small territory about it, is served with excellent provisions, and at a cheap rate ; and it is a general thoroughfare for traders and travellers to and from France, Germany, and Italy. Those and many other advantages, joined to the modesty and regularity of the magistrates and learned men here, have brought a great resort of young foreigners of the highest distinction to study under their professors, and to complete themselves in the French language. The city contains two hospitals, a house of correction, and an armoury, together with a kind of a large dock-yard for public barges, yachts, and other vessels.

ment.

BUT that which perhaps contributes most to the importance and independency of Geneva, is its form of government, which is that of a free republic, the supreme power of which is vested in the general council of citizens and burgeses. This council may be called the legislature of Geneva. It is subdivided, or rather modelled, into three other councils; viz. a council of twenty-five, or the lesser council, a council of sixty, and a council of two hundred. The twenty-five are part of the council of sixty, as the latter are of that of two hundred, which are formed out of the general council. In the assemblies of this last the syndics, who in fact are the heads of the government, are chosen; as are other subordinate magistrates, and the wine tax settled. The syndics are only chosen from amongst the council of twenty-five, who are charged with the executive part of the government, and who elect the members of the council of sixty; but the great council elects the lesser council. The council of sixty meets only by summons from the council of twenty-five; but the proceedings of both are controulable by the great council. Depending upon those councils are subordinate colleges, in which a lieutenant and his assistants preside; and there is likewise a chamber of appeals, from which causes might be brought before the lesser council. In short, every branch of the Genevan government is a check upon the other; and the whole is admirably well calculated for preserving the freedom and independency of their state. Their ecclesiastical discipline is under the direction of a consistory, who report matrimonial cases to the lesser council, and which in all cases proceeds with great moderation and tenderness. Their military establishment is properly regimented, of which the field-officers are members of the lesser council; but their garrison consists of twelve companies of sixty men each, into which foreigners are inrolled. Upon the whole, though the republic of Geneva is far from being a powerful state, yet its policy is so admirable, its members are so unanimous, and their œconomy so excellent, that the neighbouring kingdoms and states treat them with the highest esteem and regard; and the court of France always keeps a resident there. The independency, however, of their government is owing to the importance of their situation, which would make the acquisition of it so valuable to any particular power, that they all join in its defence, and the preservation of its liberty.

Its antiquity.

THE Genevois, like other states, run up their antiquities to times long before the Christian æra; and we have a particular detail of its history long before the time of Julius Cæsar; but as this is blended with the history of the foregoing part of this work, we shall omit it here. It is certain, that it early received the Christian religion, and that the inhabitants were reckoned amongst the Allobroges. It suffered in common with other European states, by the incursions of the barbarians, about the year 400; and in the year 440, we find one Isaac bishop of Geneva, whose jurisdiction was pretty extensive. It was at this time that the Vandals, who had over-run Gaul, settled in the country of Vaud; and having built several boroughs, were called Bourguignons, and according to modern orthography Burgundians. Those people at last were consolidated into a monarchy^a. The name of their first king, or as he is called by Sidonius Apollinaris, a cotemporary author, tetrarch, was Gonderic, who dying, divided his kingdom amongst his four sons, Gondeband, who had Vienne; Chilperic, Lyons; Godefigile, Geneva; and Gotmar, Besançon. The brothers, as usual in such partitions of territory, carried on bloody wars against one another; and Godefigile was slain in a church, but was succeeded in the government of Geneva by Sigismund, who was either his son or nephew. The barbarity of the times prevents our knowing much either of the civil or military government of Geneva till the year 620; but to make up this loss, the names and acts of its bishops are related in ecclesiastical records, the laity being too rude and uninstructed to keep any; and this silence, as to temporal affairs, has probably given the first handle for the claim of the bishops of Geneva to be its sovereigns. The names of Cariatbo and Appellinus, which last lived till the year 613, are however preserved as sovereigns of Geneva. In the year 620, Clothair, the king of the Franks, drove out the Bourguignons, and gave the Genevois the form of a civil government; and his grandson Theodoric II. erected several churches and religious houses in that city. Between the years 650 and 773, we have only the uncertain names of the Genevois bishops and princes, which seem to be confounded together. Towards the end of the eighth century, Charlemagne called an assembly of his states at Geneva, to consult about a war with Didier king of the Lombards. We are told, that that great monarch confirmed both the civil and religious privileges of Geneva, and erected his own statue in marble over the gate of the church, with an imperial

- a double-headed eagle under it. The eagle was to be seen in Spon's time. After the death of Charlemagne, we have nothing relating to Geneva but a dry catalogue of its bishops and counts, who carried on their contests about the sovereignty. As an apology for the lameness of their history, we are told of four fires, which at different times destroyed Geneva and its archives; so that we are obliged to descend to the year 1050, at which time we find three competitors for the sovereignty of Geneva; the bishop, the earl of Genevois, and the earl of Savoy; and the city was more than once brought to the brink of destruction during their contests. The reader is to observe, that the earldom of Genevois is distinct from the present jurisdiction of Geneva, though those earls often called themselves counts of Geneva^b. In the year 1120, Wide, son to an earl of Genevois, was bishop of Geneva; and, to strengthen his family-claim to the sovereignty, or rather the superiority over that city, he gave his brother an investiture of several villages and castles belonging to the diocese of Geneva, as Bonmont and Hautecombe, with all his temporal jurisdiction in Geneva. But Humbert, his successor in the bishopric, disputed this grant; and the archbishop of Vienna, metropolitan of the province, and apostolical legate, ended the difference by a treaty in 1124, by which it was agreed, first, that the bishop should have the administration of justice and lordship in the city, the coining of money and confiscations of estates, as likewise the fines of those who had dwelt a year and a day at Geneva: that the earl should not build any fort without the bishop's consent: that he should have a vidame, or lieutenant, for secular affairs: that he should moreover do homage to the bishop, not respecting any one but the emperor before him: and several other articles touching toll, forfeitures, and fines. Ardu- tius, a man of quality, but, as we perceive by a letter from St. Barnard to him, not very well qualified for ecclesiastical functions, succeeded Humbert as bishop of Geneva; and under the patronage of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa, he got the better of the earl of Genevois, who had made encroachments upon his jurisdiction; and the earl, in the pope's bulls, is design- ed under the title of a faithful steward to the bishop. The emperor, however, afterwards gave to the duke of Zeringuen the sovereignty of Geneva, which he resigned in favour of Amé the earl of Genevois. Ardu- tius, the bishop, by his zeal and assiduity, prevailed with the emperor to annul his grant, as having been obtained by surprize, and to confirm the bishop's right of sovereignty. Those grants in favour of the bishop founded their temporal claims, which the citizens of Geneva afterwards opposed. They denied that the emperor could, without the consent of the empire, give away the sovereignty of an imperial city, as theirs was; and they quoted the oath of their bishops, who, at the time of their admission, swore to maintain the privileges and liberties of the city. They admitted, however, that the con- fidence their ancestors had in their bishops, had rendered them too remiss; but they brought a stream of authorities to prove that their bishop had no temporal jurisdiction over them, and that their power arose entirely from their ecclesiastical capacity. Notwithstanding all their arguments, the bishops seem at times to have acted as sovereigns of the state; though it does not appear that the people, or lay-magistrates, ever made any formal renunciation of their liberties to them.
- c ARDUTIUS, who held his see fifty years, was succeeded by Nantelinus, who was so pressed by William the earl of Genevois, that he was obliged to have recourse to the friend- ship of Thomas, the first count of Maurienne and Savoy, to whom the bishop granted several lands and castles, which the earl of Genevois pretended were his property. This produced a war between the two counts, in which the earl of Genevois was worsted, and obliged, after the death of Nantelinus, to submit to the arbitration of the archbishop of Vienna, and Grand- son, or Grandison, bishop of Geneva, who built fort de Peney, which still belongs to Geneva, and is governed by a castellan, who is a member of the great council. After his death several bishops succeeded, who exercised temporal jurisdiction over Geneva, and had many contests with their neighbours, in which they were always befriended by the counts of Sa- voy; one of whom, Amé IV. in the year 1285, came to Geneva, and with menaces demand- ed to be reimbursed for the charges of the war he had carried on with the earl of Genevois, on account of the city. William of Constance was then bishop, and proposed to compro- mise matters with the earl of Genevois; but the Savoyard party amongst the inhabitants pre- vailed, and the earl of Savoy obtained the possessions of the earl of Genevois within the city, which was likewise to serve him as a place of arms, he promising, at the same time, to de- fend it at his own cost against all enemies, and that there should be a free intercourse be- tween his states and Geneva. It was likewise agreed, that the earl should become vidame of Geneva, and that he should have a bailiff under him, as being possessed of the earl of Ge- nevois's property there. This treaty, to which the bishop was obliged to consent, con- tinued in force some years.
- f In the year 1291, Humbert dauphine of Vienne, and a friend to the earl of Genevois, attempted to surprize Geneva, while the earl of Savoy was fortifying it. His design was discovered; but, after burning part of the suburbs, he encamped before the city, with an intention to besiege it regularly. The bishop endeavoured, by intreaties, to divert him from his design; but the courage of the inhabitants proved more effectual than his submissions, for they forced the dauphin to raise the siege. In his retreat he took and plundered two castles belonging to the bishop, who thereupon excommunicated him. War continued between the courts of Savoy and Genevois, after the death of William of Constance, whose successor was Martin, as his was Amé. The prelate equally dreaded both counts, and was therefore suspected by both; and under him the earl of Genevois, who had built a castle called Gaillard, within a league of Geneva, gained ground; for he made an alliance with the bishop and commonalty of that city, and paid homage to the church for several lands. This bishop is noted for a remarkable decree he issued, that the inhabitants of Geneva should begin the computation of their year from Christmas, and not as they had always done before from Easter. a b

*Disputes about
Geneva,*

GENEVA, however, remained still a bone of contention between the two counts; and in the year 1307, the dauphin of Vienne got possession of the castle of Entremont, belonging to the earl of Savoy. That earl was shut up at Geneva, where he still maintained his footing; but he marched out of that city to retake his castle. The earl of Genevois and his friends laid hold of that opportunity to appear at the head of an army before the city, which sent out deputies to treat with him. His proposals seemed reasonable to the deputies; but when they made their report, the city was divided into two factions, which came to blows with each other. That of Savoy prevailed; for though the earl of Genevois and his followers were introduced into the city, they were driven out of it by the Savoyard party, with the loss of one hundred and thirty-two men; and the Savoyards put to death, in a judicial way, several of their chief antagonists, and confiscated the goods of others. Next year a difference happened between the bishop and the earl of Savoy, on account of the latter having coined money at Nion, which lay within the diocese of Geneva; but his right to that coinage was confirmed by arbitrators, upon condition of the stamp being different from that of Geneva; that he did homage for the same; and that the eighth part of the profit should go to the bishop. The year 1309, was remarkable for the disputes that happened between the bishop and the people of Geneva, who complained that he had illegally extended his power. The bishop cited them before his metropolitan, the archbishop of Vienne; but the people declining his jurisdiction, he excommunicated them, and obliged them to submit to his terms. The people of Geneva, however, considered this submission, not as a proof of his legal right, but of his usurped power. Peter of Forigny succeeded Amé as bishop of Geneva; and in the year 1313, William earl of Genevois did homage to him for his possessions. The bishop soon after accepted the like homage from Edward earl of Savoy; and this produced new wars amongst all the three, which continued many years. In 1321, a fire reduced great part of Geneva to ashes; and in the year 1330, the battle of Monthoux, or Montbon, was fought between the counts of Savoy and Genevois, in which two thousand men were killed; but the advantage lay on the side of the Savoyards. Another great fire broke out, which consumed two-thirds of the city of Geneva in 1334. c d *which is ex-

make peace.*

In 1342, Peter of Forigny, after being bishop of Geneva for 31 years, was succeeded by Alamand; but the differences between the counts of Savoy and Genevois were now compromised. Amé VI. was then earl of Savoy; and in his minority he did homage to Alamand, for his Genevois possessions; but growing up, he was by Charles IV. emperor of Germany, made vicar of the empire in that country; and in that capacity, joined with that of vidame, he claimed the temporalities of Geneva. William of Marcoffay was then bishop; and the emperor coming in 1366 to Geneva, he and the syndics prevailed upon him to revoke the vicarship he had granted to the count. The latter, however, refused to give up possession, and the emperor was obliged to publish four several decrees against him, with penalties in case of his non-compliance. The bishop appealed to pope Gregory XI. who then resided at Avignon, to whose arbitration the earl likewise submitted. His award was, that the earl should resign his letters of the vicarship, and relinquish all he held belonging to the church; but that he should be confirmed in the vidamate, and in possession of the castle of the isle. The earl submitted to this decision, which seems to have restored peace to Geneva; and in the year 1387, Ademor was bishop of Geneva. He published an act, confirming the liberties and privileges of the city: the most material articles of it are, "That all processes brought before the vidame, or steward, shall not be transacted in writing, but by word of mouth, in the mother-tongue: that criminal cases should be tried by the syndics chosen by the citizens: that no one should be put to the rack by them: that it should be lawful to none but citizens to sell wine: that the care of watching the town should be committed to none but citizens; and that neither the bishop, or any other deputed by him, should exercise any authority after sun-setting: that the citizens, burgessees, and freemen of a of the city, might chuse every year syndics, or recorders, for the town, to whom the commonalty should give full power and authority."

NOTWITHSTANDING those excellent regulations, the earls of Savoy did all they could to establish themselves masters of Geneva; but the spirit of the people rendering that impracticable, they invented various pretexts for keeping some footing in the city; but the magistrates always took care that it should be upon sufferance; and the requests and concessions on both parts are still carefully preserved, as evidences of Geneva's independency on the house of Savoy. In the year 1398, William of Lornay was bishop of Geneva, and had the courage to cite the earl of Genevois to appear before him, to answer a charge of felony; and the earl not appearing, he was outlawed, and his estate declared to be forfeited to the church.

The earl of Genevois outlawed.

b Two years after, viz. June 22, 1400, the emperor Wenceslaus gave Geneva a confirmation of her rights, in so ample a manner, that no succeeding emperor or king of the Romans could violate them. The next year died the earl of Genevois; and Odo his uncle, and successor, made a compromise with Amé the earl of Savoy, to whom he resigned his estates, part of which was claimed by Humbert's daughter; but the earl of Savoy did homage to the bishop for the whole. In the year 1409, John de Bertrandis having succeeded William of Lornay, was called upon by the earl of Savoy's vicar-general, to do homage to that earl for Geneva; but the emperor Sigismund interposed, and the claim was dropt. This Bertrandis was a cardinal, and assisted at the council of Constance, and was suspected of being a favourer of John Huss, who was burnt there. He afterwards made a visit to Charles VII. of France,

A cardinal bishop of Geneva.

c and laid before him the injustice of his subjects intermeddling in the quarrel between the city of Geneva and the earls of Savoy; and obtained an order, prohibiting such practices for the future. In the year 1415, the emperor Sigismund paid a visit to Geneva, where he was magnificently entertained for three days. Two years afterwards he erected Savoy into a dukedom, in favour of Amé, the eighth earl, who paid a visit to Geneva, in company with pope Martin V. and fifteen cardinals. This was in the year 1420. The purpose of this visit was, to petition the pope for the sovereignty of Geneva, of which John of Pierrencize was then bishop; and to him the pope referred the duke's suit, which was founded upon the inability of the bishop to punish crimes in the city and territory, unless assisted by the power of Savoy. The bishop summoned the people to a general assembly, and laid before d them the duke's request, which had been approved of by the pope. It was unanimously rejected by the inhabitants, who, in their turns, required the bishop to be true to his charge, in which case he might depend upon their assistance for maintaining his just rights, and those of the city.

Pretensions of the earl of Savoy.

THIS noble spirit encouraged the bishop, and produced a most excellent act in favour of liberty; for he entered into a formal concord or agreement with the people and the syndics, never to alter the constitution without their consent. This act was ingrossed in writing in Latin; and the observance of it sworn to by the bishop, the syndics, and the council, under the title of "A transaction between the reverend father John, patriarch and minister of the bishopric of Geneva, on the one part, and the citizens, burgeses, and commonalty of Geneva on the other, against the endeavours and suit of duke Amé to pope Martin." It was then subscribed by all the magistrates, commonalty, and clergy of Geneva, to the number of seven hundred and twenty-seven; and the year after was confirmed by the emperor Sigismund, who declared Geneva to be an imperial city, under the title of Nobile Imperii Membrum, and took it into his immediate protection against all princes, the duke of Savoy in particular. John of Pierrencize was succeeded by John of Courtecuisse, who was bishop for no more than one year. He was succeeded by John of Brogny, who in his younger days kept swine. He was then so poor, that not being able to buy a pair of shoes at Geneva, the shoe-maker gave him credit for them, upon condition he should pay him when he came to be a cardinal. A cardinal taking a liking to the boy, brought him up to literature; and becoming cardinal of Ostia, and bishop of Geneva, he rewarded the generous shoe-maker by making him steward of his household. He erected the chapel adjoining to the church of the Maccabees, where the philosophy lectures are held; and was so little ashamed of the meannells of his birth, that he bore a hog for his arms. He was succeeded in 1426, by Francis of Mies; and while he was in the chair, in 1430, another great fire happened in Geneva, which burnt down St. Peter's church, and a great part of the town.

The constitution of Geneva settled.

e IN 1432, Amé I. duke of Savoy, turned hermit at Ripaille, near Tonon, upon the lake Lemman, resigning the title, but not the revenues, of duke of Savoy to his eldest son Lewis, and that of earl of Genevois to Philip his younger son. According to our historian^a, he obliged the duke his son to live at Tonon, in so frugal a manner, that he amassed money enough to purchase himself the popedom at the council of Basil. His history as pope, under the title of Felix V. is foreign to this part of our work. His dignity, however, gave him authority enough to strip the bishop of Geneva of the greatest part of his revenues; and, upon that prelate's death, he made himself administrator of the bishoprics of Geneva and Lausanne. His reign, as pope, seems to have been very ridiculous; though, in other respects, he appears not to have been a weak prince. He held the bishopric of Geneva from the year 1444 to 1451, and governed it by an administrator or vicar; but, in the mean while, the emperor Frederick III. paid a visit to Geneva, and persuaded Felix to resign the popedom. It is remarkable, that, while he was in possession of that bishopric, he and his sons were so far from invading the sovereignty of Geneva, that they were at great pains to confirm all its rights and privileges; and his holiness declared, under his hand, that the Genevois, tho' not obliged so to do, lent him six hundred soldiers for the assistance of the city of Lausanne; and acknowledging, that the syndics, burgeses, and their successors, were no way obliged to such things, unless it came from their own free-will, leaving them in their ancient liberty. In the year 1450, the Genevois assisted Felix against the Friburghers, with another body of troops under Burdignin, their chief syndic. Next year, Felix died; and is said to have been buried with a bible under his head, at the end of which was a Latin inscription, importing, "That the city of Geneva is situated amongst mountains; that it was of small extent, sandy, and its inhabitants desirous of novelties."

his grandson.

FELIX left Cyprian, archbishop of Tarantaise, his vicar in Geneva; and the people were so well pleased with the conduct of the house of Savoy, that Peter, his grandson, though but eight years of age, was appointed bishop of Geneva, which he held by his administrator for seven years and eight months. He was succeeded by his younger brother John-Lewis, son of duke Lewis, who, having a warlike turn, vigorously maintained his own authority and the privileges of the people, and forced his brother Janus, earl of Genevois, to resign the title of earl of Geneva, which he had assumed; but this intimacy with the house of Savoy soon cost the Genevois dear. Duke Lewis had a son, Philip, whom he kept so bare in his pocket, that the young man not only accused his mother, who was a Cyprian by birth, of lavishing her husband's riches upon her lovers, but was guilty of so many riots and murders about his father's court, which was held at Tonon, that the latter applied to his son the bishop, and the syndic of Geneva, for an asylum in that city, where he was accordingly received, and was lodged in the convent of the Grey Friars of Rive.

Remarkable adventure at Geneva,

THERE appears to have been some truth in part of Philip's charge against his mother; for he interrupted a cargo of cheeses that were conveying to Fribourg, in which a large sum of gold was concealed. On this discovery, he found means to get admittance into Geneva, where he informed his father of his mother's practices, and restored to him all the money, excepting what he had bestowed upon his accomplices. After this, Philip attempted to apprehend and punish all the Cyprians who were about his father's court; but they having taken refuge amongst the inhabitants of the city, he was obliged to leave Geneva. The uxorious duke, far from being pleased with this discovery and restitution, accused the citizens of conspiring with his son against him; and one of the syndics was hanged on that account. This did not appease the duke: he prevailed with his son to put him into possession of the archives of Geneva, which he carried to France, and presented to Lewis XI. who sent them to Lyons, where Spon, who was a physician in that city, consulted them, when he composed his history. The duke, at the same time, prohibited all merchants, travelling to or from his country, to go by the way of Geneva; and prevailed with the king of France to imprison Philip, whom he offered to set at liberty, if the Genevois would acknowledge the duke for their sovereign; but they rejected the terms. In the year 1465, duke Amé IX. of Savoy, prosecuted his father's designs against Geneva; but was, at last, obliged to restore the intercourse between his subjects and the Genevois; an act which the late duke had made use of as an argument of their dependency upon the house of Savoy. Amé IX. died in 1472, and left his wife Yoland, sister to Lewis XI. of France, guardian to his children. John Lewis of Savoy was still bishop of Geneva, which he governed by vicars; and the dutchess Yoland was in that city when Charles duke of Burgundy, being defeated by the Swisses at the battle of Morat, took refuge at Gex, in the neighbourhood of Geneva. The dutchess went with her children to pay him a visit; but the duke detained her prisoner by force; and would have seized the person of the young duke her son, had he not been hid in a corn-field by one of her domestics. After this, the duke's Lombards, as they are called, ravaged the neighbourhood of Geneva; the bishop of which, by way of retaliation, hanged up all the duke's subjects that were found in Geneva, to the number of two hundred. This did not prevent the victorious Swisses from ravaging the state of Geneva in their turn; but they were, with some difficulty, prevailed upon to desist, and to agree to a conference at Fribourg, where the Genevois and Savoyards consented to raise a sum of money, of which two thousand eight hundred crowns of gold were to be furnished by the Genevois for paying the Swiss troops. The interruption of the intercourse with Savoy had impoverished the Genevois so much, that they were unable to raise the sum so soon

which loses its

Troubles of Geneva,

a as the Swiffes demanded; so that about two thousand of them mutinied, and, breaking from their commanders, they would have plundered the city, had not the people of Ligne interposed, and obtained time for the Genevois to raise the money; which they did, with the utmost difficulty, by melting down their church-plate, and that of private citizens, besides laying heavy taxes on the people. This transaction happened in 1476. Next year the bishop, wisely considering the Swiffes to be the natural allies of Geneva, proposed a perpetual league between them and the Genevois; but the latter were so jealous of their bishop's intentions, that they rejected his proposal; and he was obliged to limit the duration of the league to the term of his own life.

which league with the Swiffers.

b This year was distinguished by some very remarkable adventures at Geneva. The bishop had two favourites, the one Pommieres, the other Chiffy; the former of whom, being disgusted, retired to France; and, by representing the duke of Savoy and the bishop of Geneva as enemies to that crown, he obtained the bishopric of Vivieres. He proposed to the French king, at the same time, to surprise Chiffy at the bishop of Geneva's court, and to carry him into France, till he should be forced to reveal all the bishop's secrets. He undertook to execute this infamous exploit himself; and accordingly repaired, with three or four of his brethren to Geneva, on pretext of seeing their friends, and staid there fifteen days; during which time their other accomplices, by degrees, dropt into the city, till Pommieres thought them numerous enough to execute his purpose. Being well acquainted with the bishop's court and manner of living, and that his guards served only for shew, early in the morning c the conspirators rushed into the bishop's bedchamber, where they found Chiffy, whom they carried out in his shirt, with his hands bound behind him, to be put on horseback, the bishop not daring to oppose them. The youngest brother of Pommieres, during this transaction, was amusing himself in entertaining some ladies of the court; and, before he could make his retreat, was taken prisoner, and by the bishop put into the custody of the relations of Chiffy, who thereby obtained his liberty, by being exchanged for the other. This did not satisfy the bishop, who, in the year 1479, understanding that the bishop of Vivieres was at Piedmont upon a party of pleasure, he surprised him at the head of about forty horse, and killed him with his own hand as he was sitting at table, some of his companions undergoing the same fate.

History of the bishop's favourites.

d In the year 1480, the city of Geneva was visited by a famine, and so great a mortality, that seven thousand of its inhabitants died; as did their bishop John Lewis, the year following, of a pestilential fever at Turin. This prince and prelate has the character of being brave and generous; but very amorous. Though he was, in general, vindictive, yet he had sentiments of justice, as appeared by his forgiving a miller, who beat him for being too intimate with his wife, and making him a present of the cloaths he wore when he underwent the discipline.

Famine in Geneva.

UPON the death of the bishop John-Lewis, the pope, the chapter, and the people, were divided in giving him a successor. The pope appointed his nephew, Lauro Vere, cardinal of St. Clement's; the people were for Francis, archbishop of Auch; and the chapter chose e Urban of Chivron, who resigned his right to Francis of Savoy, as the cardinal of St. Clement's did his to Compois, bishop of Turin. Francis of Savoy, however, by the assistance of his family, drove Compois out of Geneva, and taking possession of the see, he is noted for spending four hundred crowns at an entertainment which he gave to his brother Philip, lord of Bresse, and his nephew Charles, duke of Savoy. Compois sought relief at Rome; and, after some struggle, matters were so compromised, that Francis of Savoy remained bishop of Geneva; and, being like his predecessor, a laic, he had vicars who officiated under him, and took upon himself the title of administrator and protector of that church. Being settled in his new dignity, he prevailed with his nephew the duke of Savoy, and the earl of Genevois, to retract some acts which they had passed in prejudice of the church of Geneva; and f the duke obtained leave to reside in that city. Upon the death of Francis, in 1490, Charles of Seyssel was chosen bishop of Geneva; but Anthony Champion, chancellor of Savoy, was appointed by the pope. Both parties obstinately standing to their claims, Champion having got the metropolitan of Vienna on his side, and being assisted by the lord of Bresse, took arms and drove his antagonist out of the city. In the following year, one John Gay instigated the peasants about Foucigny, to an insurrection against their nobles, who oppressed them. They were encouraged by the example of the cantons of Switzerland, to make this attempt for asserting their liberty; but being no more in number than one hundred and twenty, they were first prevailed upon by the lord of Bresse, with fair words, to return home, after committing many outrages; and being dispersed, they were taken and executed as rebels.

the succession to the bishopric.

g UPON the death of Champion, Philip of Savoy, who was but seven years of age, was chosen bishop of Geneva; and his election was confirmed by pope Alexander VI. who assigned the bishops of Lausanne and Nice for his guardians. Like some of his predecessors, he had a warlike turn; and, after his father's death, he threw off the ecclesiastical habit. In 1498, Philibert duke of Savoy came to Geneva, and was so delighted with its situation, that he obtained leave of the bishop and the magistrates, not only to reside there, but to keep courts of justice for his own subjects only. He was attended by Rene, his natural brother, a young man of a haughty tyrannical disposition; and to him the duke, who was immersed in pleasure, committed the management of his affairs. Rene having a particular spite against the Genevois, sought to make his brother absolute in that city; and under the colour of the court of justice that had been erected, he arrested one Levrier, a Genevois, which was so much resented by the bishop and syndics, that they cut off the right hand and head of a Savoyard, who had been guilty of coining money within their state.

S E C T. II.

Geneva recovers its liberty from the duke of Savoy; agreement between the duke of Savoy and the city; imprisonment of the French ambassador; history of Berthelier of Geneva; original of the word Hugonots; alliance between Geneva and Fribourg; struggles between the Genevois and the dukes of Savoy; the dawnings of the reformation in Geneva; agreement between the Protestants and Romanists in that city, where Farel preaches, and where the mass is abolished in 1535.

Geneva asserts its liberty,

THE Genevois maintained their liberties against the repeated attacks made upon them by the dukes of Savoy, under most amazing disadvantages. As those princes were in a manner possessed of the keys of their city, the little trade the Genevois carried on lay at their mercy; and money, almost unknown to the inferior ranks of the people, was very scarce with their superiors. Notwithstanding all those discouragements, their love of independency made them happy; and they had the spirit to oppose Rene in all his tyrannical practices. The residence of the duke of Savoy in their city, though it brought them some money, corrupted the manners of their youth, and gave Rene hopes of succeeding in his schemes of tyranny. He accused one Eyria, a Genevois gentleman, of having entered into a conspiracy with a physician of Lyons to poison the duke; and having trepanned the physician, he was brought bound hand and foot to Geneva, where he was thrown into the prison of the island, and beheaded, after being put to the rack by Rene's orders. This inhuman proceeding exasperated the magistrates and inhabitants of Geneva, who had in vain remonstrated against it, so greatly, that Rene durst not venture to put to death Eyria, who escaping out of prison, fled to Bern in Switzerland, and prevailed with those virtuous republicans to lay the oppressions and misconduct of Rene before the duke his brother. At the same time, a bare-footed friar, in preaching before the duke, compared him to a great purse, which was filled with a great many smaller purses, all stuffed with money, alluding to Rene and his associates, but, properly speaking, had none belonging to itself. This sermon, and the remonstrances from Bern, opened the eyes of the duke, who gave Rene three days for leaving his dominions, upon pain of death. Philibert, at the same time, perceiving he had no right to Geneva, retired to Chambery; and thus Geneva once more recovered its independency.

Duke of Savoy renews his claims upon it.

EYRIA was then called home; but soon after the plague broke out in the city, and dissensions prevailed amongst the citizens. By the constitution of Geneva, and indeed the same prevails in other republics, no man could be judicially put to death there, without confessing the crime for which he suffered. One Cotton being capitally convicted, died on the rack rather than confess; and this accident was represented in such colours of inhumanity to the duke of Savoy, that he renewed his claim of jurisdiction over the city. The Genevois were forced to suffer the matter to be referred to arbitration; and the arbiters, tho' most of them were the duke's subjects, giving sentence against him, he swore by God and St. Peter, that he would desist from his claim, and leave the death of Cotton to the cognizance of his nephew the bishop, when he should come of age. This happened in the year 1503, while Geneva was afflicted with an intolerable famine.

A remarkable robber.

NEXT year was remarkable for the reign of one Mortal, a thief of peculiar art and address in Geneva. Neither locks nor bolts could withstand him; but he was so moderate in his depredations, that he generally left behind him more than he carried off; and he was so punctual in paying his debts and tavern bills, that he was every where well received, which made the common people entertain a notion, that he was assisted by fascination, or witchcraft. He was, however, sometimes apprehended; but so extraordinary was the strength of his constitution, that he endured the torture, and even made slight of it, so that he was always acquitted. He was as singular in his death as in his life. He fell sick of the plague, and his mother who attended him, seeing him deprived of speech, and afraid that he might recover through the strength of his constitution, shut him up in a coffin, and had him buried alive. Duke Philibert of Savoy, a prince of a mild and equitable disposition, died in 1504, and was succeeded by his brother Charles. This prince, more a ambitious than Philibert, being at variance with the inhabitants of Valey, obtained of the Genevois an aid of two hundred men, which were sent him under captain Burdig-nin. He then demanded from them six pieces of ordnance, which, at instigation of Peter Faccon, Leverry, Le Fente, Hurich, and other leading men, were refused him. The duke vowing revenge against those citizens, they purchased, by the payment of a crown a year, the protection of the canton of Fribourg, with liberty to reside still at Geneva. The duke of Savoy refused either to enter the city, or to swear to maintain its privileges, till Leverry was delivered into his hands; upon which the latter was imprisoned by the bishop's cancellor. The canton interposed; and the other cantons shewing dispositions to protect the liberty of Geneva, Leverry was not only set at liberty, but sent to the bishop, who was b then at Piedmont, to complain of the encroachments of the duke's officers upon Geneva; and Anthony Pecolat, another citizen, was sent to complain to the duke himself, who being apprehensive of a confederacy of the Swiss cantons against him, consented to come to Geneva, where he and his mother received small presents of plate from their state, and not only swore to maintain its privileges, but acknowledged that the court of justice, which he held in the town, was merely by the indulgence of the syndics and council.

Beginning of the alliance between Geneva and Fribourg.

In the year 1510, Philip of Savoy, after being bishop of Geneva for fifteen years, resigned his bishopric to Charles of Seyssel, brother to that bishop who had been driven out by Champion; and Charles himself was made earl of Genevois, and afterwards duke of Nemours in France. Seyssel, soon after his election, obtained from the emperor Maximilian, king of c the Romans, a confirmation of the city's privileges. Next year the walls round St. Gervais, one of the divisions of Geneva, were finished; the expence being defrayed by an excise on wine, and a loan of money. The duke of Savoy offered to assist them with workmen, and they accepted of his offer; but not till he had given it under his hand, that he assisted them only as a neighbour, and not on account of any right he pretended over their city. Notwithstanding this declaration, he laid a deep scheme for subverting the liberties of Geneva, by effecting a peace between the king of France and the Swisses, whom he persuaded to interpose in his behalf with the Genevois. It had been usual for the latter, before their breaches with the house of Savoy, to hold annual fairs; and the disuse of them was of great prejudice to both parties. The duke proposed to restore them, and thereby to renew the footing
d of his family in Geneva, as well as to increase his revenue, by the toll upon goods brought through his country. The terms, however, that were annexed by the duke to this proposal were,

Succession and disputes of the bishops.

Proposals of the duke of Savoy

“ FIRST, that the city and bishop should appoint an officer to keep account of the profit of each fair, one third part of which should be given to the duke, bishop, and city. Secondly, that the city should, once a year, make a present to the duke. Thirdly, that the warding the gates should belong to the duke, during the time of the fairs. Fourthly, that the duke should have, henceforward, fines paid for every new building, both in city and suburbs.”

As those proposals tended towards a direct superiority of the duke over the city, the Genevois unanimously rejected them. Notwithstanding this the duke, who was a thorough c politician, tried other means to accomplish his ends. Several meetings were proposed, and some were held, but all to no purpose; so jealous were the citizens of his views. Corn this year was so scarce at Geneva, that one Francis Mallet, the dean of the chapel of the Maccabees, lent his plate to the magistrates of the city, who caused it to be coined for the supply of the poor; and he was for this generous humanity made a citizen, gratis.

A. D. 1512.

It must be acknowledged, notwithstanding all the precautions the Genevois had taken to secure their liberties against the house of Savoy, they were still very precarious. The duke's vidame was in possession of the island of the Rhone, where the prison for lay-persons stood, as that for the clergy did within the bishop's jurisdiction. The vidame's jailor had f been excommunicated for debt, and was arrested by the bishop's officers; and those of the vidame, in their turns, imprisoned them. A tumult ensued, and the vidame was forced to surrender himself prisoner to the bishop's people; but at last mutual releases passed on all sides, and all appeared satisfied.

Danger of Geneva

BOTH the duke of Savoy and the bishop were then absent from Geneva; but both of them, on this occasion, repaired to that city. The duke laid hold of the opportunity to revive his claims upon the sovereignty of Geneva; but the matter being fairly discussed, it appeared that the vidame was to blame. Not satisfied with this, the duke still insisted upon his rights, and that the bishop should put to death the citizens we have already mentioned, who had obtained the protection of the canton of Fribourg, he not daring to do it by his own authority, for fear of provoking the Swiss confederacy. The bishop shewing a beg coming firmness against this demand, the duke told him, that as he had made him bishop, he would strip him of that dignity, and render him the poorest priest in his diocese. The g bishop, however, died in 1513, lamented by the bishop of Geneva, for the prudence, rectitude.

Dispute about a French ambassador,

and about the rights of the Genevans,

Persecution of Pecolat, and other Genevans.

THE Genevois, who were no strangers to the encroachments of the pope, and the ambition of the house of Savoy, shut the gates of their city upon the death of their bishop Charles of Seyffil; and the chapter chose for their bishop Ainé, abbot of Beaumont; an ecclesiastic of noble extraction, and a fair character, only too much addicted to women. This choice being made, the chapter obtained the concurrence of the confederate cantons; and a joint letter was sent, with a deputation to the pope, at the abbot's expence, for a confirmation of his election; but his holiness had already been prevailed upon by the duke of Savoy, to grant the dignity to John of Savoy, prothonotary of Auch. This John of Savoy was the reputed natural son, by a common woman, to Francis of Savoy, bishop of Geneva, and had been provided for by the duke in an obscure station in the church. Being of a mean appearance, and of an abject disposition, the duke thought him a proper person to be preferred to the see of Geneva, as fearing from him no opposition to his ambitious views. It is even said, not without probability, that John, before his promotion, took an oath, by which he promised to comply with whatever the duke should command, with regard to his claims on the city. The Genevois, unable to withstand at once the papal and the ducal power, were obliged to receive him as their bishop; and he entered upon his office with great pomp, and at first with appearances of moderation and generosity; for he even obtained a promise from the duke of bringing the fair from Lyons to Geneva, with great advantages to the last.

TOWARDS the end of the year, Villeneuve, the French king's minister, having disobliged the Swiss cantons, in his return to France stopped at Geneva, where deputies from Bern and Fribourg demanded of the magistrates and council, that he should be put into their hands; and in case of non-compliance, they threatened them with an immediate invasion. The bishop was then absent, and the danger was pressing; for the protection of France was at too great a distance to shelter them from the resentment of the cantons. After deliberation it was resolved, to put the ambassador under arrest; that a guard should be raised, and the gates shut, to preserve the public peace; and that, in the mean time, he should be lodged in the episcopal palace. Nothing, however, would satisfy the cantons, but that the ambassador should be immediately delivered up, while the court of France as strenuously insisted upon his being released. The syndics and magistrates applied to the bishop, who refused to give the ambassador up, because his enemies might put him to death; and advised the magistrates not to comply, because their compliance would be a kind of acknowledgment of superiority in the cantons over the city, besides making the French king and nation their enemies. The Swisses, however, proving intractable, and seeming determined to put their threats into execution, the magistrates told them, that though they could not deliver the ambassador up, yet the deputies might take him by force, which they accordingly did; and he was carried prisoner to Bern, where he underwent the rack; but was afterwards set at liberty.

THE connection by marriage that happened between the family of Medici and the duke of Savoy, gave the latter great hope of prevailing with pope Leo X. to authorize his claim upon the sovereignty of Geneva. To facilitate this, he obtained from the bishop a concession of all his rights over that city. The pope would readily have agreed to this request; but it was opposed by the conclave, who were of opinion, that the bishop's resignation of his temporalities to the duke was invalid. In the mean while it appeared, that the bishop was no better than the dependent and vassal of the duke. He was deeply in debt, on account of the expences of his nomination at the court of Rome; and the duke of Savoy received the revenues of the bishopric, and the abbey of Pignerol; so that the prelate used to say, that he had nothing belonging to a bishopric about him, but his mitre and crozier staff. His poverty led him to oppress the poorer clergy, and those who had suits in his court; so that he soon became equally hateful and despicable in the eyes of the Genevois. At last, being supported by the vidame, he wrongfully imprisoned a lawyer of good character, one Vandel, who had four sons, who resolved to rescue him; and the people taking their part, the bishop and the vidame were abandoned, even by their own creatures, and were obliged to release the prisoner; but he harboured an implacable resentment against those who had been most forward to oppose him, particularly against one John Bernard and John Pecolat.

THE latter, in conversing with the bishop of Maurienne, and the abbot of Beaumont, who were complaining of the wrongs they suffered from the bishop, jokingly desired them to be easy, intimating that the prelate (A) would not be long lived, being already far gone in the venereal disease. These words being repeated to the bishop by one of his spies who a overheard them, he pretended that they implied a design against his life; and one of his servants happening to die of eating too heartily of a dish of unwholesome fish that had been prepared for the bishop's table, and several others falling ill of the same, he pretended that they had been poisoned by Pecolat.

AMONGST the reasons urged by the cardinals against the validity of the bishop's concessions of his temporalities, the strongest was, that it could not take place, but in cases where the people are in rebellion against their bishop, and he too weak to reduce them. The duke of Savoy and the bishop, therefore, omitted no means to provoke the Genevois to rebel; and the natural vivacity of the Genevois laid hold of every opportunity to turn the bishop and his officers into contempt. At last, upon an occasion which is too ridiculous for history to transmit, the duke and the bishop came to Geneva, with an intention to punish some young men, particularly one Berthelier, who had been guilty of some frolics against the bishop's officers. They were attended by the archbishop of Turin; but upon examination the affair was so far from deserving the name of rebellion, that, by the archbishop's advice, the persecution was dropt against all but Berthelier, and one or two of the principals, who were particularly obnoxious to the ecclesiastical power, and to the Savoyards.

THE bishop began now to despair of being able to prevail against the Genevois within the city, and withdrew to Focigny; where, in concert with the earl of Genevois, the duke of Savoy's brother, and other noblemen of that court, he apprehended Pecolat at the village of Presinge, together with his companion, and one servant. Pecolat's process had been privately drawn up by the vidame of Geneva; and being brought prisoner to the bishop's house at Forigny, he was there three times put to the rack, to make him confess a design against the bishop's life, on account of the words he had dropt, and the accident of the dish of fish. Pecolat denied all; but at last worn out by the force of torments, and being told that his companion's servant had accused him, he answered whatever they desired him to say. The inhabitants of Geneva took Pecolat's part, and remonstrated to the duke of Savoy upon the injustice of imprisoning him without the city, and trying him before any jurisdiction but that of the syndics, who were his lawful judges; upon which he was carried to Geneva, and being imprisoned in the castle on the island, he retracted all he had said, as having been extorted from him by the force of torments. A dispute then arose between the syndics on the one part, and the duke and the bishop on the other; the latter insisting that Pecolat ought to be racked again. The syndics, though they were afraid of the duke, hesitated upon this; and the prisoner, under pretence that he was a clerk, and not amenable to a temporal jurisdiction, was carried to the bishop's prison. The barbarity of his enemies went so far, that perceiving him to be proof against the rack, they imagined that he was assisted by some supernatural power which lay on his beard, and ordered a barber to cut it off. Pecolat, knowing what torments were intended against him, and afraid of his own weakness, had the resolution to snatch the barber's razor, and to cut out part of his own tongue. This, with the torments he had suffered, procured him many friends; and the officer who was to pronounce sentence against him, not only refused to perform that office, but advised him to appeal to the archbishop of Vienne, who sent an order to stop all proceedings against him, even by the bishop himself. One Victor, a young man of spirit, had the courage to serve this order upon the bishop; upon which Pecolat was removed to the castle of Peney, belonging to the duke. The consequence was, that the bishop, disregarding the summons of his metropolitan, was excommunicated, as were all his officers, which created such a tumult in the city, that the clergy joined with the people, and forced the bishop's officers to release the prisoner, which was done just at the time when an order came from Rome, annulling the summons and the proceedings of the metropolitan. Pecolat, we are told, afterwards recovered the use of his speech, because he had cut off only part of his tongue; but he attributed the same to a miraculous intercession.

f IN the mean while, the case of Berthelier proved still more interesting to the duke and the bishop. He was a young man of great resolution, vivacity, and address, and had always distinguished himself against the family of Savoy. Perceiving that the duke and the bishop were resolved, at any rate, to put him to death, he escaped in disguise to Fribourg, where he had purchased the privilege of a citizen, and engaged the Fribourgers so much in his interest, that they not only sheltered him, but sent a messenger to the duke and the bishop, to request that Berthelier should either be tried at Fribourg, where they might send lawyers to assist at the trial, or before the Syndics of Geneva, if they would furnish him with a safe-conduct to that city; but with a condition annexed, that some of the Fribourgers should be present at his trial. The duke and the bishop declined both those proposals; and the duke himself made a journey to Fribourg, but without being able to prevail with the Fribourgers to deliver up Berthelier. At last, rather than exasperate the Fribourgers, and embroil themselves with the other cantons, the duke and the bishop granted a safe-conduct to Berthelier, in the terms he had demanded, and he presented himself before the syndics. He boldly justified all he had done against the duke and the bishop, and set aside Picolat's evidence as being extorted by the rack; so that nothing appearing against him but a few youthful frolics, the syndics would have acquitted him, had they not been deterred by the power of his persecutors, who offered him a pardon, which he refused to accept of, as having been guilty of no offence.

His courage.

BERTHELIER was so far from being intimidated by this persecution, that during its continuance he was pursuing the plan of an alliance between Fribourg and Geneva, as the only means of securing the independency of both states; and the house of Savoy was equally intent upon defeating it, great numbers of the inhabitants of Geneva being Savoyards, and attached to that interest. This encouraged the duke to proceed with cruelty against such of the Genevois as he found in his own dominions; and he put to death at Turin, two young gentlemen of respectable families at Geneva, as being accomplices with Berthelier, after extorting a confession from them by the force of torments. A copy of this confession was sent to the syndics of Geneva, who paid no regard to it, and who sent deputies to the duke and the bishop, complaining loudly of what had been done. The duke dissembled; but the bishop threatened the city with the utmost penalties, if the magistrates did not renounce their connexions with Fribourg, and give up Berthelier and his accomplices to punishment. Spon^a informs us, that the deputies had been debauched by the duke and the bishop, who gave them an answer in writing, such as the deputies themselves dictated; but the letter was not to be delivered till the syndics and council of Geneva had sworn to comply with the contents. The deputies returning, after an absence of five or six weeks, acquainted first the lesser, and then the greater council with the preliminary conditions; adding, at the same time, that if they were not complied with, the duke had sworn that no Genevois should possess his property in safety. The council treated this absurd and imperious proceeding with the indignation it deserved. They refused to take the oath; and returning the letter unopened, it was with difficulty the people were prevented from throwing the deputies into the Rhone.

Treats of the bishop against the Genevois.

Their alliance with Fribourg.

Origin of the word Hugonot.

THE independent Genevois now were sensible that nothing could save their liberties and estates from ruin, but the conclusion of the alliance proposed by Berthelier with Fribourg. Besançon Hugues, one of the syndics of Geneva, befriended it warmly; but the Savoyard party was so prevalent at Fribourg, as well as Geneva, that it met with great difficulties; and at last Besançon proposed, that if the alliance could not be rendered general, that an association should be entered into between its friends in both cities; those in Geneva, amounting to three hundred of the principal and most resolute of the citizens, who had set their names to the form of an association for that effect. Those associators were; by the Savoyards, termed Eignots, a Swiss or High German word, which signifies confederates by oath; and Spon, with great appearance of justice, thinks that from thence arose the famous word Hugonot, notwithstanding the various other etymologies that are assigned to it. The Eignots, on the other hand, called the Savoyard party Mamalukes, in allusion to the Egyptian soldiery, who, being originally Christians, had renounced both their religion and liberties, to become slaves to the sultan. The Savoyard party in Fribourg objected to the proposed alliance, because it was not clear to them that the Genevois were an independent people, and at liberty to enter into such an engagement. This objection being reported by the deputies at Geneva, the citizens were split into factions and cabals. The duke of Savoy and the bishop, perceiving that the Eignots had the majority in Geneva, complained to the Fribourgers of debauching their subjects from their allegiance. The Fribourgers, in answer to this, affirmed, that the magistracy of Geneva, in temporals, were independent of the bishop; and that if the duke would prove his sovereignty over that city, they would proceed no farther in the alliance; and that they were willing to enter a saving clause in the treaty as to his rights, till they could be judicially discussed. They added, that they were so far from being enemies to the bishop's ecclesiastical authority, that they were ready to defend it against all who should attack it.

Complaints of the duke of Savoy and the bishop.

THE duke and the bishop, far from being satisfied with those answers, complained of the Fribourgers in the next general assembly of the confederate cantons, for admitting the Genevois into their burghership, alledging, that the Genevois by their constitution could pretend to no right of burghership, being only bindersassen or inhabitants of their own country, by sufferance from the house of Savoy, whose dominions surrounded them. This plea was refuted by the Genevois, who produced evidences that the dominions he held about Geneva, had formerly belonged to them. While those disputes lasted, the abbot of Beaumont and Bonnivard, prior of St. Victor, two young citizens, warm in the cause of liberty, and several other inhabitants, with the consent of the council of Geneva, took up their burghership in Fribourg; and at last the alliance between that city and Geneva was fully completed, and Berthelier was formally acquitted by the syndics, of all the crimes that had a been laid to his charge, by the bishop having only a slight fine imposed upon him for his youthful excesses.

THE duke of Savoy now perceived that the Genevois set both his and the bishop's power at defiance. At first he proceeded with temper, and joined with the bishop in sending one Salleneuse, a man of experience in business, to be their temporal deputy in Geneva; but the inhabitants disowned his authority. The duke had no better success in the complaints he had brought before the general assembly of the cantons; and while he endeavoured to amuse both the Fribourgers and the Genevois with terms of accommodation, he secretly assembled an army of seven thousand men at St. Julian. Before he began his march towards Geneva he sent a herald, who demanded audience in a full assembly of the council; b which being convened, the herald refused to seat himself along with the syndics, but placed himself in a chair above them, alledging, that he appeared there as representing the duke of Savoy, the lord and master of their city. He then delivered his commission, which contained a demand, that the council should provide splendid and magnificent lodgings for the duke in their town-house, and that they should furnish him and his company, which consisted of ten thousand men, with victuals, and all fitting entertainment, because, concluded he, the duke intends to appear with that equipage to do himself justice.

THE reader, from what we have already mentioned, may easily form an idea of the arguments made use of to evade this demand; upon which the herald pronounced them to be rebels; and other ceremonies of the like kind passed on the part of his attendants, and all c of them left the city. The magistrates were not wanting to themselves on this occasion; they made the best dispositions they could for their own defence; they obliged even the Savoyard party to take arms, and all of them appeared determined to defend their liberties to the last extremity. They sent messengers to acquaint the Fribourgers with what had happened, but they were intercepted by the duke's army, and put to the strappado, till they discovered all they knew with regard to the city. By this time the duke's army was increased to the number of ten thousand, and he was advanced as far as Gaillard. The Fribourgers, suspecting what had happened, sent Marty, one of their number, to endeavour to persuade the duke to proceed no farther against their allies the Genevois. Marty reported his commission to the duke, who pretended, that he only wanted to enter Geneva as a d friend, to put an end to the dissensions and heart-burnings of the inhabitants, and he sent Marty to persuade the Genevois to give him admittance; but in the mean while his army, which was destitute of great artillery, appeared at the gates of the city, while the citizens, who had never seen any action, deserted their posts, and a general confusion ensued. The magistrates in public demanded from Marty what they had to trust to from the Fribourgers, a suspension of arms having been granted by the duke till next morning. Marty frankly acknowledged that, however well affected his countrymen were towards the Genevois, their assistance must come too late to defend them from the duke; upon which the inhabitants threw down their arms, and gave over all thoughts of resistance.

They declare
rebels,

NEXT morning Marty and the syndics sent to Gaillard, to capitulate with the duke, who e promised to enter the city only at the head of five hundred men, besides his ordinary train. This capitulation, however, was most infamously broken. The earl of Genevois, the duke's brother, ordered the walls to be broken down, that the duke might enter as a conqueror through the breach; and soon after the whole Savoyard army marched into the city, where the soldiers were guilty of all manner of abuses and enormities, while the earl of Genevois took up his quarters in the town-house, and seized upon the public arsenal and artillery, as well as the keys of the gates. Not contented with this, proclamation was made by the duke's orders, that no citizen should presume to appear in the streets, or even to put his head out of a window, under pain of being publicly whipped. Notwithstanding this severity, we are told, that some of the Genevois appeared abroad with their swords by their sides, f but were forced to undergo the penalty. It is probable that the Eignots within Geneva, still depended on succours from Fribourg, where the spirit ran so strong in their favour, that the Genevois deputies obtained a company of infantry, which was soon after augmented to six or seven thousand men, some of them Savoyards, and they formed themselves into separate bodies, under different colours. They set out on their march with incredible expedition, and perceiving that they could do nothing against Geneva, they marched to the country of Vaud, where they seized the duke's governor Lulins, and desired him to acquaint his master, that he ought to beware in what manner he treated the Genevois, because they were determined to make severe reprisals upon his subjects.

neva,

THE duke was sensible that his soldiers were all undisciplined and cowardly; and he took g the advice of the Fribourgers, who entered Morges without resistance. He immediately ordered another proclamation to be made, ordering, that none of the Genevois should be molested either in person or estate, on pain of death, and then posted a body of horse to guard the important post of Nyon, which lies between Morges and Geneva, on the side of the lake.

but it is re-

He

A treaty.

He sent for the deputy of Fribourg, and desired him to repair with his deputies to Morges,^a to endeavour to pacify matters, promising that no harm should come to the Genevois. The deputy, reflecting on the duke's late scandalous breach of faith with the Genevois, treated his request with a mixture of indignation and scorn, and refused to obey it. The duke's deputies therefore repaired to Morges by themselves; but meeting with no success in their commission, he ordered them to repair to the other cantons, and endeavour to prevail with them to interpose their authority with the Fribourgers. In the mean while he assembled the general council of Geneva, and he demanded of the members, that they should renounce their burghership with Fribourg, and send deputies to Morges, to assure the Fribourgers that they had suffered no outrages, and that Huges and Malbreiffon, his coadjutor, had no public commission from them. The Fribourgers treated this message as being extorted by force, and carried their point. (B) The duke was forced to agree to make an immediate payment of four thousand crowns, upon their promising to return home, without doing any other damage to the country than living at free cost, and to withdraw his army from Geneva, without injuring either the city or inhabitants, whom he was to leave in full possession of their privileges. He found himself, however, under great difficulties, to raise the money; but at last the Genevois agreed to pay one half, and the earl of Genevois pledged his plate for the other, which was to be redeemed by the Genevois. The duke remained at Geneva sometime after his army had left it, and there, on account of the plague, he retired to Tonon, in the Chablais, from whence he sent a safe-conduct by the vidame Configli to Huges and Malbreiffon, desiring them to attend him. They obeyed^c him, but had so indifferent an opinion of his honour, that they left the safe conduct in the hands of the wife of Huges, with instructions to send it to Fribourg, if she heard they were detained. This was a necessary precaution; for they had not travelled a mile from Geneva, before the vidame, enquiring about the safe-conduct, told that it had been sent to Fribourg, but that they were very willing to return to Geneva. This put the vidame into a passion: when they arrived at Tonon, the duke, surprised and vexed at his disappointment, put them under a strict arrest; but dismissed them, after making them swear to renounce the burghership of Fribourg, and all public business without his leave. Soon after, by arresting Porral, who was secretary of Geneva, he got into his hands the contract of burghership between that city and Fribourg.^d

Duke of Savoy baffled,

IN May 1519, the differences between the duke of Savoy and the two confederate states, Fribourg and Geneva, were laid before a general meeting of the cantons at Zurich, and accommodated on the following terms. "That the duke should desist from all attempts against the bishop and city of Geneva; in which case no use was to be made of the confederacy between Geneva and Fribourg, and the Fribourgers, who demanded more money, were exhorted to be content with the four thousand crowns they had already received." This accommodation being made under the sanction of the cantons, for some time restored peace to Geneva; and the Eignots and Mamalukes, as they were called, began to resume their intercourse with one another.

THOUGH the duke of Savoy was thus baffled in his attacks upon the independency of Geneva, yet having the bishop at his devotion, he was still very powerful in that city. Having still an implacable thirst of revenge against Berthelier, he employed the vidame Configli, who was a thorough paced ruffian, to arrest him in the bishop's name, which he did near the gates of Geneva. Berthelier, on this occasion, behaved at once like a philosopher and a patriot, tho' offered his life if he would submit to the duke, and own him as his master; and being carried to the prison on the island, he refused to be examined by any but his lawful judges the syndics; upon which, without any farther ceremony, his head was next day struck off (C), by the sentence of the bishop's provost. The Eignot party were struck with consternation at Berthelier's death, and the Fribourgers demanded satisfaction for it; but the duke threw the blame of it upon the bishop. By this time the Savoyard party had^f

(B) This expedition happening during lent, when little food besides herrings were to be had, it was called the Herring campaign.

(C) The reader perhaps will not be displeased, at being informed of a few more particulars of this extraordinary person. When he saw the vidame approaching to arrest him, he knew his fate, but refused to make his escape, though he might have done it. When he gave his sword to the vidame, he boldly told him to keep it well, for he must account for it; and when shut up in close prison, he was so unconcerned, that he diverted himself with a little squirrel, which he commonly carried about with him in his bosom. Though in mean circumstances, yet he had learning and great parts; and being told he must die, he wrote upon his prison wall, "Non moriar sed vivam, et narrabo opera Domini. I shall not die, but live and declare the works of the Lord." When he came to the place of execution, he was not suffered to speak in public, and took very little notice of a confessor who was offered him. His epitaph was as follows:

*Quid mihi mors nocuit? virtus post fata vivescit.
Nec cruce, nec sævi gladio perit illa tyranni.* (1)

a got a great ascendancy in the government of Geneva; and the Fribourgers, who sought only a pretext to break with the duke, demanded more money, while he, on the other hand, insisted on satisfaction for the damages his country of Vaud had sustained, and referred the Fribourgers for payment to the Genevois, whom, at the same time, he advised to pay no more. This management increased his party among the citizens, who were disgusted at the new demands of the Fribourgers; and he had even interest enough to get the new syndics set aside, on pretence that they had not been legally elected, and that they had encouraged the Fribourgers in their exorbitant demands. In their room were chosen citizens of the Savoyard party.

b THE magistracy and council being thus new modelled in favour of the duke and the bishop, two deputies, Richardet and Goulaz, were sent by the syndics to the cantons at Zurich, to clear the duke from having any hand in Berthelier's death, and to vindicate the bishop's proceedings in that matter; to throw the blame of the Fribourgers demands upon the displaced syndics; and to exhort the deputies of the cantons to interpose with the Fribourgers to renounce their alliance with Geneva. In answer to those instructions, the Fribourgers justified themselves with great spirit and firmness, and represented the death of Berthelier in the blackest light; but notwithstanding all they could do, the sense of the cantons, who were for preserving the public peace, was in favour of the Savoyards. The duke of Savoy at this time resided at Geneva; and, upon his departure thence, he appointed the sieur Salaigne to be his vidame there, instead of Configli, who was extremely unpopular. In the year 1522, died John of Savoy, bishop of Geneva; whose body is said to have been so emaciated with the venereal disease, that after his death it weighed no more than twenty-eight pounds. He had in his life-time made Peter of Baume, who was of the noble family of Montevel in Bresse, his coadjutor; and he died expressing great remorse for the troubles he had brought upon the Genevois, at the instigation of the house of Savoy. Next year Peter, having been chosen bishop of Geneva, entered upon his office, after taking the oaths to qualify himself, which were as usual administered by the syndics upon the bridge of the Arve. The new bishop prevailed with the syndics and the magistrates to postpone the entertainments and shews, designed for him, till the arrival of the duke and duchess of Savoy. This happened a few days after, and their entry was made at an expence, and with a pomp, to which the Genevois were entire strangers. The young gentlemen of the city were dress'd in silks, velvets, and cloths of silver, and the ladies formed themselves into a troop of Amazons, armed and disciplined in the ancient manner. The duchess, however, having been disappointed in her favourite ambition of lodging in the town-house, gave so little attention to the honours that were offered her, and beheld the Genevois with so disgusting a coldness, that some of them shrewdly remarked, it had been more proper to have expended the money, in welcoming them to the city, upon fortifications to keep them out of it. The Savoyard party apologized for the behaviour of the duchess as owing to her education and the customs of her native country, she being an infanta of Portugal. At last the Genevois were better reconciled to her manners, and the residence of the duke's court at Geneva making money circulate, nothing passed but mutual entertainments and feasts; and the duchess was brought to bed of a son at Geneva; who died soon after in Spain, before the father could perform his promise of making him prince of Geneva, the sovereignty of which was most passionately coveted by the duchess.

but prevails again.

Death of Peter of Savoy.

c THE duke of Savoy by thus enervating the minds of the Genevois, made them forget the care of their liberties; and their dependency, which they had hitherto so jealously preserved, received daily violations. The inhabitants either neglected, or through their expences were unable, to repair the fortifications of their city; the bishop, though well intentioned, was voluptuous and indolent, and possessed so many livings under the duke of Savoy, that he durst not disoblige him: but above all the Genevois were deprived of all hopes of protection, either from the emperor or the king of France, who were at war with each other, while the duke kept himself neuter, with a view of becoming master of Geneva. In this state of affairs the duke, notwithstanding the last accommodation, carried his claims upon the sovereignty of Geneva higher than ever; and Levrery, the son of the lawyer of that name already mentioned, having the courage to oppose him, he was put to death, almost in the same manner as Berthelier had been, whom he imitated in his courage, constancy, and behaviour, disdaining to fly when it was in his power to have made his escape. While this tragedy was acting, the bishop, who ought to have interposed his authority to prevent it, was in Piedmont, but had left the care of the bishopric to his brother Sorlin, who was of the same character with himself, and withdrew to Remilly, to avoid being solicited to interpose in favour of Levrery.

Danger of the Genevois losing their liberties.

f His death brought the Genevois to a sense of their danger. Richardet was chosen one of the syndics, and called upon Boulet, the treasurer of the Savoyard party, to account for the public money which he said had been idly dissipated. Boulet, instead of complying, upbraided Richardet with being an Eignot; upon which the latter broke his syndical staff upon the treasurer's head. Boulet complained to the duke's council at Chambery; but the syn-dics refusing to acknowledge its authority, their estates in Savoy were confiscated, and they applied for protection to the bishop, whom they empowered to carry their complaints by way of appeal to Rome, he pleading inability to give them redress. But he was now intirely at the devotion of the court of Savoy; and he not only put into his own pocket three hundred crowns, which had been given him to carry on the appeal, but prevailed with the general council to retract it, and to refer the matter to himself. This affair at first met with some approbation; but the duke's vidame proceeding to violence, forced the heads of the Eignots to fly from Geneva, some of whom were taken in their flight; but Huges the chief, and a few of his friends, escaped to Fribourg. There they applied to the magistrates for protection in terms of the alliance between them; but receiving only fair promises, they addressed themselves to the states of Zurich, who at their request sent deputies to the duke.

Upon their application, he readily agreed to the release of the prisoners, and the return of the exiles; but it was upon conditions so dangerous to the public liberty, that they rejected them, and once more applied for a general alliance with the confederate can-tons.

Rise of the reformation.

THE reader is here to observe, that by this time the doctrines of Luther had made a vast progress both in Germany and Switzerland; and the cantons were so much divided in matters of religion, that they gave less attention than they otherwise would have done to the affairs of Geneva. The duke of Savoy was sensible of this; and coming from Chambery to Geneva, he ordered a general council of the inhabitants to be summoned, where he appeared attended by his chancellor and guards in all the state of a sovereign prince. His chancellor, without much preamble, demanded that the assembly should immediately recognize the duke's sovereignty, renounce all alliance with the Swisses, and disclaim all connections with the fugitives. But the people were less terrified than amazed at his proceedings, and refused to comply with any of his demands. He then changed his method of proceeding; and both he and his officers endeavoured to win them over by friendly protestations and fair promises, which made some impression upon the counsellors; but the syndics persevered firmly in their opposition. In about twelve days after, the Swiss deputies, from the can-tons of Fribourg and Soleurre, came to the Genevois, and promised the inhabitants their assistance against all attacks upon their liberties and independency. This message was delivered, and debated upon in a general assembly of the Genevois, where the Savoyard party had such an ascendancy, that the deputies were ordered to acquaint their principals, that the subjects of Geneva, who had applied to them for protection and assistance, had no legal authority for so doing, and that they were well satisfied with the duke of Savoy's proceedings and intentions; and letters to the same purpose were sent likewise to the cantons of Bern and Lucerne.

Ambition of the duke of Savoy.

ON the 10th of December, the duke ordered another general council to be convoked, where, amongst other things for the establishment of his own authority, he demanded, that the council should renounce all foreign connections, which was accordingly agreed to and proclaimed. The chief Eignots disowned the authority of this council, as being partial, irregular, and under undue influence; and on the 22d of the same month, John Bandieres, and the secretary Vandelli, presented themselves before the council, at the head of the wives and children of the fugitives, and above two hundred other citizens, who had signed a writing given in by Vandelli, approving of all that had been done with regard to the foreign alliances by the fugitives. This bold stand gave a favourable turn to the Eignot party; and it was agreed, that the bishop should be invited to return from Pignerol, and resume his functions at Geneva.

The Eignots
prevail.

HE was, by this time, tired of the mortifications that had been imposed upon him by the duke of Savoy, and complained heavily of them to the syndics, promising to maintain their privileges to the utmost; but recommending to them secrecy in their proceedings, and their voting by ballot, as at Venice. This was a wise advice; and at the next election of syndics, John Philippe, who had great credit with the cantons of Fribourg and Bern, was chosen the chief. The Eignots now carried every thing before them. The fugitives returned to Geneva; and Huges, as then spokesman, acquainted the council, that the cantons of Bern and Fribourg had agreed to enter into a defensive alliance for twenty-five years, or for ever, as should be thought most proper. The citizens had three days granted them to deliberate upon this proposal; and then another general council being held by the ringing of the great bell, not above five or six members gave their negatives to it; but the bishop, who was present, protested against every thing that might prejudice his authority. Thus the alliance was completed, and the permanent foundations of the Genevois liberty were laid.

Eight

- a Eight Genevois deputies swore to the agreement at Bern and Fribourg, and as many from those cantons did the same at Geneva, where they were received under the discharge of the city cannon, and entertained at the public expence, amidst the loud and general acclamations of the people.

- THE clergy, who in general were devoted to the house of Savoy, were startled at this revolution, but the syndics promised them protection, provided they behaved dutifully. The duke of Savoy represented the new alliance as being inconsistent with the engagements between him and the two cantons; but he received no other satisfaction than that those engagements were ready to be dissolved when he pleased. The chief Mamalukes, to the number of forty-two, were obliged to leave Geneva, and take shelter in Savoy; but it was b intimated to them by the Genevois syndics, that they were at liberty to remain in Geneva, if they would behave like honest men. According to Spon^a, that was far from being their intention; for they entered into a conspiracy with the vidame, who remained still at Geneva, for seizing the chief Eignots, and cutting off their heads. This conspiracy being discovered, the conspirators were summoned by sound of trumpet to appear, and upon their remaining contumacious, they were declared to be traitors, and their estates forfeited. Gruet, the bishop's vicar, being suspected of favouring the duke, was deposed, and his place filled up by the abbot of Beaumont. The vidame himself at last fled, as did his deputy and jailor; and thus an end was put to all the authority of his court, which was the greatest grievance the Genevois had suffered. In doing this, the syndics proceeded with great formality, and c executed by their own authority a malefactor, who was confined in the vidame's prison, their own common serjeant acting the part of his provost. After this the duke of Savoy, whose arms over the castle gate in the island were broken down, and his officers, never more exercised any jurisdiction in Geneva.

Mamalukes.

- THIS great revolution was planned and completed, with a perseverance, moderation, and regularity, which do not always reside with the spirit of liberty; and it must be acknowledged, it was chiefly owing to the discernment, honesty, and abhorrence of tyranny in the Fribourgers, who brought the Bernois into their confederacy. The Genevois did not, as was too often the case with the other republican states of Italy, proceed with rancour against their antagonists. They agreed, at the bishop's intercession, to readmit into the city d such of the Mamalukes as should behave with moderation, upon their paying a fine; but this reconciliation was prevented by the duke of Savoy, who threatened, if the Mamalukes agreed to it, to treat them as enemies, and if they did not, to restore them upon honourable terms. His chief dependence was upon his interest with the confederate cantons; but the allies gave him to understand, that he had no grounds for hope from that quarter, and that they would hear no arguments he could urge in favour of his claims upon Geneva. Those altercations continued till the 22d of December, 1526, and were renewed next year; when the duke refused to make satisfaction for some murders committed by his subjects upon the Genevois, or to suffer the fugitive Mamalukes to appear at Geneva, though they were offered letters of safe-conduct by the bishop.

- e THE latter was now so much in the interest of the confederates, that the duke's party formed an ambuscade for carrying him off, as he was going to say mass without the town, and this obliged him to retire to Franche Comte, having first cancelled all the evidences of his opposition to the confederacy. Fifteen days after his retreat, he sent a letter, or the copy of one, written by the emperor to the duke of Savoy, injoining him to desist from all his claims of sovereignty over Geneva, which was an imperial city. By this time the Mamalukes had removed their cause before the archbishop of Vienne, but the great council of the Genevois, encouraged by the imperial letter, refused to acknowledge that tribunal; and an act was passed, that no Genevois from thenceforward should prosecute a suit before that court. In the mean while the duke of Savoy was so much exasperated with the bishop, f that he confiscated all his livings in Savoy, but offered to restore them if he would join with him in establishing the vidamate in Geneva; which the bishop was so far from doing, that he remitted all his own temporal power to the syndics, for the ease of the suitors in his court.

bishop.

A. D. 1527.

- A WHIMSICAL institution which took place at this time, had almost overthrown the new established liberty of Geneva. Certain Vaudois gentlemen eating broth with wooden spoons at the castle of Vaud, some of them proposed in jest to join together, to oblige the Genevois to make use of the like spoons. The joke soon grew serious; a fraternity of the Spoons was instituted; each member hung his spoon about his neck by way of badge, and Francis of Pontverre, who had the reputation of a good soldier, was chosen to be their captain. g The duke of Savoy seemed to dislike this association at first, but was better reconciled to it, when he perceived that those knights of the spoon made war in earnest upon the Genevois; so that in a very short time, he and they came to a good understanding with each other. The Genevois applied to their confederate states for succour; but unfortunately for them, the two cantons of Bern and Fribourg were at variance together, on account of religion. All they did at first was to send deputies to persuade the knights to forbear hostilities; but that proving ineffectual, they sent two companies of soldiers, of about eight hundred each, who pretending that they were obliged only to defend the city, and not to act offensively against the duke's subjects, with whom they were in alliance, lay idle in and about Geneva; where they eat and drunk of the best at free cost. The truth is, neither of the cantons at this time chose to provoke the duke; and nothing, worth mentioning, was done to suppress the knights for above two years. During this time, the Mamelukes continuing contumacious, sentence of death was pronounced against them by the syndics.

Perplexing situation of the Genevois.

In the year 1528, the Genevois found themselves in a very perplexing situation. Their friends, the Bernois, had driven the Roman catholic religion out of their jurisdiction, while the Fribourgers zealously retained it: and the Bernois wanting to propagate their new faith amongst certain peasants, whom the Fribourgers pretended to be their subjects, each state applied to Geneva for assistance. This was a case that had not been provided for by the articles of the alliance; and the Genevois, to please both parties, sent each a company of one hundred and fifty men; that designed for the assistance of Bern, being commanded by John Philippe, and the other by Richardet. The reconciliation that soon after happened between the two cantons, prevented any bad consequences from the absurdity of this conduct; for both parties returned home without coming to action. All this while the knights of the spoon were insulting the Genevois under their own walls; and a difference happening between Huges and Bonnivard, no care was taken to repel them effectually. The Genevois laboured at this time under a more essential difficulty. Their city was filled with the reformed fugitives from Fribourg, and Roman catholics driven from Bern. The latter state exhorted them earnestly to forsake the errors of popery, and the Fribourgers to stick close to the religion of their ancestors, under the forfeiture of their friendship. Both parties agreed upon the necessity of reforming the clergy; and the Genevois consulted Bonnivard, the abbot of St. Victor, on that head, as being a man of honesty and understanding. His answer was, "If you will be ruled by me, you shall do one of these two things: that is, if you continue debauched, as ye are at present, you must not wonder if others be so too: and, secondly, if you will reform the clergy, you must first shew them the way by your good examples." An incident that happened soon after, more fully explained Bonnivard's sentiments. The Mamelukes had obtained from the archbishop of Vienne, a writ of excommunication against the Genevois, for their contempt of his authority, and it was fixed up in most public places. Bonnivard travelling along with the Genevois deputies, observed one of those writs fixed up in the high road, and stopped to read it, which they were simple enough to dissuade him from doing; "for (said they) as soon as ever you shall have read it, you will stand excommunicated." He smiled at their simplicity, and replied, "You are much mistaken; for if ye have condemned the Mamelukes unjustly, ye are excommunicated by God himself; but if justly, what power has the archbishop of Vienne over your consciences."

Rise and progress of the reformation at Geneva.
A. D. 1529.

THOSE are incidents material to the knowledge of the original of Geneva's reformation. The good sense of Bonnivard created doubts, and a spirit of inquiry in the minds of the Genevois; and being already sufficiently exasperated by the spiritual claims of the Romish clergy, the more they inquired, the more they were disposed to embrace the doctrine of the reformers. While this suspense lasted, there was a cessation of hostilities between the Genevois and the knights of the spoon; but Pontverre, in marching through Geneva, openly expressed himself in terms so insolent, and at the same time so threatening to the Genevois, that they were alarmed, but without daring to shew their resentment. Next year, in passing through the city slenderly attended, some of the inhabitants who knew him put him to death, though in no very warrantable way; but the syndics, tho' they did not approve of the action, protected his followers, and sent his body for interment to his friends, who complained to the duke of his murder, as it was called. Though the duke had no great regard for him, yet he sent deputies into Switzerland, who complained bitterly of the Genevois; but they were so well vindicated by Vandelli, who escaped all the ambuscades laid for him by land, by crossing the lake in a boat, that the cantons would take no cognizance of the matter. This exasperated the fraternity of the spoon still more, who received fresh assistances from their allies; and the cantons of Bern and Zurich interested themselves so far in their quarrel, that they sent deputies to inquire into the grounds of it, and to report the same at a meeting of the cantons, which was to be held at St. Julien. Their report was so favourable for the Genevois, that after various negotiations, the duke of Savoy was prevailed upon to pay the auxiliaries from Bern and Fribourg, and to admonish the knights of the a the spoon to forbear their hostilities against the city. His admonitions were disregarded, and their insults continued even to the plundering some houses in the suburbs. The rest of the year was spent in various altercations about dissolving the fraternity of the spoon, which was generally looked upon to be an illegal and a predatory institution; but nothing effectual was done, saving that the Bernois and Fribourgers renewed their assurances of friendship for the Genevois, and cancelled their treaty of alliance with the duke of Savoy.

By this time the bishop of Geneva had laid aside all business; so that the magistrates were obliged to re-establish a kind of commission for managing the affairs of the bishopric, and Richardet was chosen his steward, with four assistants, who have ever since been called auditors. When this regulation was intimated to him in the Franche-comté, he approved of it; but was so immersed in indolence, that he desired to have no further concern in the matter, that he might do nothing farther to exasperate the duke of Savoy, with whom he had renewed a correspondence. Next year the plague raged in Geneva to such a degree, that a set of miscreants, who had recovered from it, and therefore thought themselves proof against it, entered into a confederacy for propagating it; but being discovered, they were punished with the most exquisite tortures. Both the duke and the Knights of the Spoon continued their hostilities against Geneva; and the bishop, who remained still in Franche-comté, was prevailed on to give them his countenance. This encouraged them so much, that they formed a scheme for surprising the city itself, by scaling the walls in the night-time. Their courage failed them in this attempt; but they plundered the suburbs of St. Leger. Not only the allies, but the other cantons of Switzerland, considered the case of the Genevois as a common cause; and, says Spon^a, "There set out from Bern seven thousand men, and twelve pieces of ordnance, under the conduct of the governor of Erlach; from Fribourg two thousand, with four pieces of cannon; and some time after, five hundred from Soleurre, with two pieces of cannon. Two or three thousand volunteers joined this army." All those auxiliaries arrived at Morges, where they staid four days, while the knights thought proper to break up their camp. This army, however, which was more formidable than any that had been seen for some hundreds of years in those parts, struck the duke of Savoy with very serious apprehensions; and he sent de Vauru to assure the Genevois, that he knew nothing of the late attempt upon their city, though de Vauru had appeared as one of the heads of the knights.

Increase of the power of the magistrates.

Danger of Geneva,

which is delivered by its allies.

d THE leaders of the confederates, while at Morges, proposed terms of accommodation between the duke and the Genevois; but the latter earnestly desired to have a conference with him at Geneva. Upon the army of the cantons decamping from Morges, and looking upon the Knights of the Spoon, as being no better than outlaws and ruffians, they burned down the castle of Rolle, and most of their houses in the Vaud, and then marched to Geneva, where they arrived about the 8th of October. A peace was proposed between the duke and the Genevois, and hastily concluded at St. Julian. The terms were, "that the prisoners should be released on both sides; and that no acts of hostility should pass from either party, under penalty, on the duke's part, of the forfeiture of the country of Vaud; and of the Genevois, of the revocation of the alliance." It is probable, that the Genevois agreed to this peace, chiefly with a desire to get rid of their friends, who had consumed all that was eatable in their territory, and left the inhabitants on the point of starving. Nothing had been stipulated either as to the vidamate or the alliance; and the duke of Savoy continued to insist upon the revival of the one, and the dissolution of the other, in an assembly of the cantons held at Payerne, December the 3d. He likewise insisted upon the fugitive Mamalukes being restored to Geneva, and to all their honours and estates there; and upon his being paid two hundred thousand crowns, to indemnify him for the expences of the war. The deputies of the cantons were for referring the matter to the emperor; but that expedient was rejected by the Genevois, who insisted upon referring it to a general assembly of the cantons. The affair came before the latter on the 31st of the same month; and their determination was, that the affair of the fugitives should be postponed; that the alliance with Geneva should be confirmed; that Bonnivard, who had been illegally imprisoned by the duke, should be released; and that the duke should pay to the three cities twenty-one thousand crowns, which he was to raise upon the bishop of Geneva, and the Knights of the Spoon; and that the agreement of St. Julian should stand good, but that the vidamate should be restored to him.

A peace.

A. D. 1533. Differences arise anew:

f THE duke rejected all the terms of this arbitration that were in his own disfavour; but appointed a person to act as his vidame. The Genevois would not admit him, because the other articles were not complied with, and fortified their city, so as to secure it against all surprize; while the duke, on the other hand, threatened to raise an army of ten thousand men to reduce them, and prohibited all manner of provisions from being carried into the city out of his dominions. But the religious disputes, which now began to be very warm at Geneva, promised him greater advantages than all he could hope for from his arms, as they threatened an utter dissolution of the confederacy.

Progress of the reformation in Geneva.

CERTAIN young Genevois, either from a spirit of controversy, or the love of truth, fixed up in all public parts of the city, a number of propositions, which they undertook either to defend or confute; but the tendency of the disputations was generally against the established religion. The reader who reflects upon that invincible love of liberty that was inherent in the natives of Geneva, and the perpetual struggles they had with their bishops, whose lives were far from being exemplary, cannot be surprised that the Genevois imitated their neighbours the Swisses, in canvassing the absurdities in religion. By what can be gathered from their history, the ecclesiastics amongst them differed in little or nothing from the laity, excepting in their hasty performances of their modes of worship; for they served in their armies, and wore swords when they appeared abroad. One Veily, a canon, drew his sword upon one of those young Genevois disputants, who stood upon his own defence; and a fray ensued, in which several persons were wounded. Upon this the syndics published an order against all such public disputations for the future, and against the broaching of new doctrines. Soon after this order was published, the Bernois, who were extremely zealous for the conversion of the Genevois, persuaded William Farel, an eminent reformer, and Anthony Saunier, to repair to Geneva, where, though in defiance of the civil power, they preached the new doctrines as they were called, and gained many secret converts. The clergy took the alarm; and though two syndics were their friends, they were obliged to leave the city. Their place was supplied by Anthony Froment, one of Farel's disciples; a brisk lively young man, who introduced himself under the character of a reading and writing tutor into many families, where he instructed his pupils, their parents, and friends, in the principles of the reformed religion; but his success chiefly lay amongst the women. His mission was not long a secret; for his audiences soon grew so crowded, that the magistrates could no longer wink at such assemblies; and an order was issued from the council, commanding him to desist. This order was delivered to him by the common serjeant, while he was in the middle of his sermon; but he returned the usual answer on such occasions, that it was better to obey God than man. This answer being reported to the council, a warrant was issued to apprehend him; and this obliged him first to abscond, and then to leave the city. Those proceedings made great noise in the cantons of alliance. The Fribourgers repeated their threatnings to break with the Genevois, if their magistrates did not effectually put a stop to the new doctrine. The answer of the magistrates was, that they had done all they could, and that they would strengthen the ecclesiastical power for that purpose. It is likely that they were not very sincere in those confessions, for the reformed daily increased; and the Roman clergy, the more the Genevois read the scripture, became the more detested. At last, in one of their assemblies which they held in a garden, one Guerin, a cap-maker, took upon him to administer the sacrament, for which he was obliged to fly the city. It must be acknowledged, that those first reformers amongst the Genevois, were not remarkable for their meekness. Several tumults happened between them and the established clergy; and blows were frequently dealt between the followers of both parties. The magistrates, however, continued to protect the Papists, and to banish such of the Protestants, particularly Olivetan, as were most forward in preaching and disturbing the public peace, by presuming to accuse the mass of idolatry.

religion.*

THIS offended the Bernois; and they in their turn threatened to break with the Genevois, if their magistrates continued their severities against the reformers. Thus the city was divided between the Bern and Fribourg interest. The Romish clergy had still great credit; they complained that the threatening letters which had been sent from Bern, had been procured from thence by the reformed faction at Geneva; and while the council was assembled, about two hundred of the Roman catholics called out for justice against the reformed, whom they threatened to punish if the magistrates declined it. This tumult being appeased, with great difficulty, and by fair words, four days after another of a more threatening nature broke out. One Baudichon had assembled, at his house, about two hundred reformed, all of them men of spirit and courage, well armed, and determined not to be insulted by the Romanists. The popish part, on the other hand, assembled in great numbers in the church of St. Peter; and great preparations were made on both sides to come to bloodshed. Two of the syndics repaired to St. Peter's, and two to Baudichon's, to endeavour to compromise matters. In the mean while the great bell was rung by the Romanists, which was a signal for all of them to put themselves in arms. Some eminent citizens were wounded; the city gates were shut; the great artillery was drawn out against Baudichon's house; and some of the council put themselves at the head of the Romanists. It happened, as it generally does on those occasions, that father was divided against son, and husband against wife, and all burned with irresistible fury; so that nothing was now expected but an unnatural

a natural scene of blood. The priests blew the flame, as believing their party the most numerous; but the syndics, by their incessant labours for peace, brought the reformed in Baudichon's house to consent to a treaty. This proposal was rejected by the Romanists, who advanced to the assault; but understanding that they would meet with a warm reception, they halted, and began to listen to some Fribourg merchants, who happening to be in the place, interposed, and brought both parties to consent to a parley. This interposition being seconded by the prudence of the syndics, three hostages on either side were interchanged for keeping the peace; and next day the articles of agreement were published by the syndics. The substance of them was,

An insurrection,

b THAT all enmity should cease on both sides, in words as well as deeds: that none should rail against the sacraments of the church; but that all persons might use their own liberty: that flesh should not be eaten on Wednesdays and Saturdays: that none should preach without licence from the syndics and superiors; and that nothing should be maintained in sermons that could not be proved out of the holy scriptures. Those articles were solemnly sworn to, the syndics taking the oath of the laity, and the vicar, of the clergy, for their observance.

c IT is easy to perceive, that, by this concordate, the reformed, or as they were then called, Gospellers, carried their main points. The Bernois, sensible of the strength of their party, sent a herald to desire that Peste and Baudichon, two of the chief Gospellers, should not be molested; and after Easter they sent Farel and another minister to Geneva, to dispute with the popish preachers. This renewed the tumults. The Romanists met together in a quarter of the city called Molard. Swords were drawn; the great bell was rung, and the canon Verley appeared armed from head to foot, brandishing a naked sword, as the champion of the Romanists. Above seven hundred appeared on each side, and Verley was killed in endeavouring to make his retreat; while Coquet, a syndic, was wounded in the head, in endeavouring to separate the combatants, which was at last effected with great difficulty; and two of the ringleaders were imprisoned. Verley happening to be a Fribourger, that canton demanded satisfaction, not only on those who actually killed him, but on Coquet and the magistrates, who had not suppressed the tumult. Some days after deputies came from Bern, who acted as mediators; and at last it was agreed, that every person might be at liberty to go either to mass or sermons, as he pleased; and this compromise was likewise sworn to, the other standing still in force.

The Fribourgers demand satisfaction.

d THE bishop, all this while, was absent; but was now in hopes that the divisions of Geneva would render his presence there so necessary, that he might re-establish his authority. On the 1st of June he arrived at that city, having been met a league out of town by the syndics. His first care was to release several ecclesiastics out of prison, and then he assisted with the Fribourg deputies, at a general council, which was held after mass. In that council a president of Franche-comté harangued the members, in favour of the bishop, and against the Gospellers. It soon appeared, that the reformation had taken too deep root to be crushed by his authority amongst the Genevois. Verley's kindred having assembled one hundred and twenty men at Fribourg, passed the lake, and advanced to Gaillard, from whence they sent to Geneva, and once more demanded justice for their kinsman's death. Here the old dispute between the bishop and the syndics, concerning jurisdiction in capital cases, was revived; and he was given to understand, that he had no power to judge the prisoners; upon which, finding all his endeavours in vain to establish his authority, he hastily left Geneva, about the middle of July, and retired into the duke of Savoy's dominions. In the mean while nine men and a woman were indicted for Verley's murder, before the attorney-general; and being acquitted, the attorney offered to enter an appeal, which was rejected, the syndics acquainting him, that they owned no superior on earth, and therefore would admit of no appeal. To prove, however, that they were in earnest to punish the murder, f one Thoberet, who was convicted of having stabbed Verley, was publicly executed. This example of justice did not quiet Verley's relations, who fell upon the Genevois Gospellers wherever they met them; and those bickerings were often attended by bloodshed.

The bishop returns to Geneva.

g FROMENT was now returned to Geneva, together with one Alexander Camus, another reformer; while one Furbity, a doctor of the Sorbonne, appeared at St. Peter's church, as the champion for popery. The indiscreet zeal of Froment and Camus led them to break the late pacifications, by publicly contradicting Furbity in the church; upon which Camus was banished, and Froment put under arrest. This proceeding disobliged the Bernois, whose religion being Lutheran, was not implicitly embraced by the reformed of Geneva. It is probable, likewise, that the syndics neither approved of the indiscretion of the reformed preachers, nor of the forwardness of the Bernois, in pressing upon them their religion. The Bernois, on the other hand, were disgusted with the slowness of the syndics; and to quicken them, they demanded the arrears owing them on account of the late war. They likewise insisted upon Furbity being punished, for preaching erroneous and blasphemous doctrine, doctrine, and complained of the treatment of Froment and his companions. The Genevois, upon the Bernois deputies entering the city, took them to be Lutheran ministers; and the Papists, both laics and ecclesiastics, ran to arms; but understanding how matters went, they were quieted. Upon the application of the deputies to the council, the custody of Furbity was offered to the grand vicar, who refused to receive him; and the council made the best apology they could to keep the Bernois in temper. Soon after a herald came from Fribourg, complaining that Farel, who was returned to Geneva, was suffered to preach, and again threatening to break off their alliance. The episcopal and Savoyard parties foresaw that it would be impossible for the syndics to preserve their alliance both with Bern and Fribourg; and this encouraged the grand vicar, on the 1st of January, 1534, to give notice to all the parishes, that none should presume to preach, either in public or private, without licence from the bishop or himself; and that all the inhabitants should, under pain of excommunication, burn their French and Dutch bibles.

THREE days after fresh deputations, on the former account, arrived from Fribourg and Bern; but the latter was by far the most importunate. They demanded the arrears that were owing to their state, and insisted upon satisfaction for Furbity having railed against their religion. The Genevois promised the payment of all that was justly due to them; but pleaded that they had no power over Furbity, because he was an ecclesiastic. Upon this the deputies, in a rage, threw upon the table the letters of association; but took them back upon Furbity being ordered to answer for himself in the town-house. This revived the dispute between the spiritual and temporal courts. Though the magistrates had declared, that they did not mean to injure the bishop's rights, by ordering Furbity to answer before them; yet the bishop sent express orders, that his case should be remitted to the ecclesiastical court; while the Bernois insisted, with equal perseverance, upon his being tried by the syndics alone, and that one of their ministers should be permitted to preach in Geneva.

Conspiracy discovered.

It must be acknowledged, that the Genevois magistrates had, at this time, a most difficult task to manage; but the discovery of a dangerous design formed against their liberties, soon determined the part they were to act. Amongst other instances of bloodshed between the professors of the two religions, one Pennet, a Papist, killed Porral, a Protestant; and the murderer, accompanied by Portery, the bishop's secretary, took refuge in the steeple of St. Peter's church, with design to ring the great bell in the night-time, and alarm their party. The syndics, on being informed where they were concealed, entered the church, made both of them prisoners, and Pennet next day lost his head. Portery's house was then searched, and many blank commissions, and other papers, sealed with the duke of Savoy's coat of arms, were found in his closet, with an order for appointing a governor over Geneva, who was to act, in temporals, as the bishop's lieutenant, and to punish the reformed with the utmost severity. Papers of the same import were likewise found under the bishop's hand; and, in short, a discovery was made of a design to render Geneva subject to the house of Savoy and the bishop.

Consequences of it.

THE evidences of this conspiracy were read on the 10th of February, in the general council, convoked for electing the syndics, and produced great effects. The Bernois deputies animated the Genevois against the Savoyard party, and promised, in the names of their principals, to stand to their alliance. Portery's indictment was drawn up, and his relations pleaded the bishop's pardon in bar to his trial; but the syndics refused to admit it; and being convicted of man-slaughter, treason, and sedition, he was executed according to his sentence. This served to encrease the intestine divisions of the city, where, after the discovery of the late conspiracy, the magistrates evidently leaned to the reformers. The ridiculous expedient of a public disputation between Furbity and the ministers was tried before the council of two hundred, who condemned Furbity to make a public recantation in the church of St. Peter, of the expressions which had given offence to the Bernois. He was accordingly led to the pulpit, and the form of recantation put into his hands; but instead of pronouncing it, he began to harangue the auditory in favour of popery; upon which he was pulled from the pulpit, and kept close prisoner. He was not the only preacher whom the Bernois complained of; they accused the preacher of Rive, one of the parishes of the city, of maintaining doctrines that were not to be found in the scripture, extracts of which they produced in writing. The syndics answered, that the preacher should be warned not to propagate such doctrines for the future. The Bernois then complained of one of their ministers having been banished the city; but the syndics and council replied, that they could not repeal his sentence of banishment. Lastly, the deputies desired that they might be allowed a chapel and chaplain for themselves, both which were accordingly granted them.

By this time, the reformed had secretly taken a resolution to try their strength with the Roman Catholics, and endeavoured to get possession of the church of Rive. For this purpose

- a pose a reformed minister openly contradicted a preacher, who had delivered a sermon there on the first Sunday in Lent; and on the 1st of March, Baudichon and Amy Perron, with other vigorous reformers, obliged Farel to get up into the pulpit, after the preacher had finished his discourse, and to confute him. This was the first time that the reformed had preached in a regular place of worship within Geneva; nor does it appear after that, that they ever quitted possession of the church of Rive, where they not only preached, but baptized, married, and administered the sacrament. Some of the counsellors and new deputies from Fribourg complained of those proceedings, as encroachments and breaches of the late pacification. The magistrates laid the fault upon their allies of Bern, whom they said they could not disoblige at a juncture so critical to their liberties; and they exhorted the Fribourgers to join them in defending them against the bishop, which were so far from doing, that they utterly renounced their alliance with them, by tearing the seals from the treaty. Thus an alliance, which was formed upon the noble principles of liberty, was cancelled through fantastic differences in religion.

Progress of the reformation,

- ON Whitsun-eve the heads of the images over the church gates were struck off, by some unknown offenders; and Bernard, a priest of St. Peter's church, renounced popery, and was married by Peter Vieret to Amy Perron's sister. In short, the party of the reformers every day gained ground. This was the more extraordinary, as the episcopal and ecclesiastical power and property in Geneva, was at least equal to those of the temporal, and indeed can only be accounted for by the ignorance, heat, imprudence, and pride of the ecclesiastics themselves. Lamentable, however, were the divisions that reigned both in public and private, when the two parties came near to an equality, and which encouraged the bishop to attempt once more to re-assume his authority. He was supported by the duke and nobility of Savoy, who raised a considerable body of soldiers to assist him to enter Geneva, the gates of which were to be opened by his party within the city, while the charges of the cannon that defended the walls were to be privately drawn. The vigilant syndics, three of whom were now Protestants, discovered this conspiracy; and at nine of the night preceding the morning of the intended execution, they shut their gates, and put the inhabitants under arms; but continued the signals that were to be given to the bishop by his accomplices within the city. His scouts finding all the gates shut, and that all was quiet within, concluded that the design was discovered, returned to Lebussyet, within two miles of Geneva, where the bishop was; and thus the design came to nothing, the Savoyards only plundering a few open houses, and making Peter Vandiel prisoner; but he was soon after exchanged. As to the bishop, he retired again to Franche-comté; and thinking that he was ill-served in Geneva, he turned out his officers there, and settled at Gex; but the magistrates of Geneva refused to send him the seal of the bishopric when he demanded it.

ground.

- A GENERAL assembly of the cantons was then held at Baden, and the Genevois laid their grievances before it. The Bernois, at the same time, sent deputies to desire the duke of Savoy, who affected to be in good understanding with them, not to abet the enemies of Geneva; but they received little satisfaction. The duke complained of the Genevois, for the indignities they had formerly done him, and of their lately demolishing his altar in the church of Rive; and not only demanded that the bishop should be re-admitted, but that his vidame should be restored in the city. In answer to this, the Genevois referred themselves to the treaties of St. Julien and Payerne; but refused to re-admit the bishop. Several other conferences were held on the same subject, at Tonon and Lucerne; but all was to no purpose. About this time the magistrates of Geneva had the honour of receiving a letter, written to them by the French king, informing them, that he had set at liberty two of their countrymen, Baudichon and Cologny, who had been imprisoned at Lyons for their religion, and requesting the Genevois to set Furbity, who was his subject, at liberty. Even that powerful intercession did not prevent the Genevois from asking leave of the Bernois before they would grant the request; and then Furbity was exchanged for Saunier, a minister.

Baden.

A. D. 1535.

- THE impolitic proceeding of the French king, who persecuted the Protestants within his own dominions, while he favoured them in the empire, was of vast service to the reformation in Geneva, as it filled that city with French refugees, and furnished them with men and preachers of far greater abilities than any the Papists had to oppose to them. New converts were likewise every day renouncing the errors of popery, even among their own clergy. During all those proceedings, the syndics took care to be attended with a captain and a herald belonging to the Bernois, to give countenance to their party. On the 4th of April, a woman, an inhabitant of Bresse, under pretence of being a proselyte to the reformation, came to Geneva, where she was discovered, and executed for attempting to poison three ministers. Viret was the only one who tasted the poison, and it almost killed him. The woman accused a canon as being her confederate; and he was imprisoned by order of the syndics.

A female poisoner discovered.

Unsuccessful attempt of the Genevois.

On the 5th of May the Genevois attempted to surprise the town of Peney, which they considered as belonging to their jurisdiction, though in possession of the bishop. Their attempt proved unsuccessful, though five hundred men and seven pieces of cannon were employed in it; and after losing two or three of their number, they returned to Geneva. This attempt, the justice of which does not clearly appear, occasioned hostilities to break out between the people of Peney and Geneva; and the latter, for that and many other reasons, proceeded in strengthening and augmenting their fortifications. The bishop and his court continued still at Gex, where he had the mortification to see an end of all his authority in Geneva. The syndics, on the other hand, affected to do nothing but upon the clearest evidences of scripture and reason. James Bernard, guardian of the convent of Grey Friars of Rive, and brother to the Bernard of the same convent, who had abjured popery the year before, held public disputations at the convent of Rive, against Caroli, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and Chapuisy, a Dominican friar, who were champions for popery. The bishop prohibited all his clergy, as the duke of Savoy did his subjects, from being present at those disputations; but they were mightily encouraged by the syndics, who ordered four secretaries to attend, and to take down all that passed at them, with a view of publishing it. On the 22d of July, Farel, at the head of many of his hearers, drove the Romish clergy and auditory out of St. Magdalen's parish church, of which he took possession; and six days after he preached at St. Gervais, attended by a guard of fifty men, assigned him by the syndics, for preventing disturbances. On the 5th of August, he preached at St. Dominick's; and at last, on the 8th of the same month, at St. Peter's itself, under the sound of the great bell.

The Roman Catholic religion expelled out of Geneva.

It was a misfortune, not peculiar to Geneva, that the spirit of her reformers carried them sometimes into unwarrantable, nay barbarous excesses. Being in possession of their churches, they not only destroyed the relics and images there, but demolished the statue of Charlemagne, which stood over the great gate of the church, which was erected by himself, as is most probable; an outrage that gave great concern to the lovers of antiquity and learning. Next day Baudichon, Vandel, and Amy Perrin, who had been appointed captains of the city guard, went at the head of their men to the churches of St. Gervais and Dominick, where their zeal against popery led them to destroy a noble picture which had cost six hundred ducats; and they would have pulled down the fine chapel of Rene of Savoy, had not the syndics interposed with their staves and prevented them. Next day Farel preached before the council of two hundred; and the 22d of August gave the fatal blow to the Romish religion in Geneva, by the syndics passing an order for utterly abrogating the same, and for establishing the Protestant doctrine. We know of no tumults that this great revolution of religion was attended with. The nuns of St. Clare had leave, if they pleased, to continue in their convent; but perceiving they could not be indulged with having the mass celebrated there, they begged to be carried to the duke of Savoy's dominions, to which they were escorted by the syndics, and where the duke built them another convent at Aney (B).

At this time, all the regular military force of Geneva amounted only to four hundred volunteers, who were commanded by Baudichon, instead of the syndic Philip. Claude of Savoy, a Genevois, was sent to Bern, to prevail with that canton to send them some assistance. The Bernois were then in good terms with the duke of Savoy, and offered to be mediators between him and their allies; but declined to spare the troops that were required; upon which Claude went to raise supplies in Neufchatel. Having raised some, the deputies of Bern, as they were marching through their country, procured them to be disbanded, while the Savoyards intercepted three of the Genevois deputies, and confined them in the castle of Chilon.

(B) Those nuns were but nine in number, one having turned Protestant; and some of them had not, for thirty years, been out of the walls of the convent. They were a whole day in travelling to St. Julien, which is but a league; but were vastly astonished when they found themselves in the open fields, where they took the sheep and oxen for lions and bears. Before their departure, Farel, with great zeal, preached a sermon, in which he exhorted them to marry; but without any effect. Their journey is recorded by one of themselves, called sister Jussie, in a little tract, entitled, The Beginning of the Heresy in Geneva; which is written with inimitable simplicity.

S E C T. III.

Containing the progress of the reformation amongst the Genevois, and their wars with the duke of Savoy; arrival of Calvin at Geneva; his history there, with that of Servetus, whom he procured to be burned; Calvin's troubles and death; successes of the Genevois against their enemies; Beza appears among them; and their history continued to the year 1603.

NO people perhaps, under the denomination of a republic or a sovereign state, ever were at a lower pass than the Genevois were, when they had the spirit to reform themselves from the errors of popery; and what is still more, to shake off the yoke of their bishop and the duke of Savoy. They had amongst them neither trade nor manufactures, and so little money of their own, after the expulsion of the Savoyards, that it was with the utmost difficulty two pieces of coarse money of the Geneva coin were discovered, to be patterns for a new coinage. They were on all hands surrounded by enemies, who had every motive for hating them that revenge, ambition, and popery could inspire. They were even destitute of provision for their daily support; and now that their friends the Bernois had failed them, they seemed to be abandoned by all human aid, as the people of Gex had intercepted and cut off the few auxiliaries, who still appeared willing to follow Claude. The Savoyards had seized upon Peney, where they committed the most inhuman outrages, and carried away the inhabitants, whom they accused of treason, prisoners to Gex; but the Genevois, though thus surrounded with difficulties, and though they scarce possessed a foot of ground they could call their own, without their gates, never seemed to have entertained the least thoughts of submitting to their former tyrants, either temporal or spiritual.

A. D. 1536.
Difficulties of
the Genevois;

WHILE they were in this distress, they were relieved, by an accidental effect; of their poverty. Having no manufactures, and little agriculture of their own, the poorer sort generally sought their livelihood in France, where they were employed as printers and compositors, and in other ingenious arts, particularly about Lyons. Those poor journeymen could not withstand the call of their country's distress, and about six hundred of them took arms for her relief, being commanded by one Roboan, a printer, and one Francis of Montbel, sieur of Veray. Beginning their march with that intention, they found the Savoyards in possession of all the passes as far as Salleneuve. Notwithstanding this they forced their way to St. Claude; and Montbel undertook to acquaint the Genevois of their approach, and to desire them to favour their entering the town, by making a sally. Montbel discharged his commission with great danger to himself; for being alone he was taken for a spy; and as he was approaching the gates of Geneva, he was fired upon by the inhabitants. He found means, however, to acquaint them with his instructions; and the Genevois made the sally accordingly with all their force and artillery. Both parties, however, were so ignorant in military discipline, that they missed each other upon the road, so that part of the auxiliaries fell into the hands of the Savoyards, and part threw themselves into Geneva.

who are oppressed by the Savoyards.

THIS reinforcement, inconsiderable as it was, gave a favourable turn to the affairs of the Genevois; it enabled them to make sallies, and to procure provisions. Though they were rather straitened than besieged in the city, yet they were threatened with all the miseries of a siege; but the fortune of the war was now changed, and they enlarged their quarters. Their enemies had taken the convent of Our Lady of Grace; but being obliged to quit it, the Genevois razed it to the ground; and on the 16th of January, they defeated their enemies, in an attempt they made to surprise their city by a scalade, on the side of Gervais and St. Victor. Those small successes, joined to the apprehensions of famine, gave them courage and an additional degree of weight with their allies of Bern, who, resenting the attempt of the Savoyards to surprise their city, declared war against the duke of Savoy, and sent him back the articles of agreement they had entered into with him, promising, at the same time, to send the Genevois a speedy reinforcement. This induced the duke to fill the neighbourhood of Geneva with an additional number of soldiers, in order to cut off all resources from the inhabitants. This was so far from discouraging the Genevois, that they resolved, under de Veray, to beat up the enemy's quarters; and accordingly, in a sally, they surprised a body of six hundred horse and foot, whom they cut into pieces, or made prisoners, with the loss of not above three or four of their own men. Some days after this action, being disappointed of the succours promised them by the Bernois, they fitted out a bark, and as many boats as carried eight hundred men across the lake, where they alarmed the country of Savoy, and plundered Gentoux and Verfoy, even to the bells of their churches. This expedition was commanded by de Veray, who next day took possession of Sacconex, which had been abandoned by the enemy on the approach of the Bernois auxiliaries that were now in motion; and in those two castles they

they found a vast quantity of provision, which they sent to Geneva, where it proved a most seasonable relief to the inhabitants: they then blew up the fortifications of Peney, which had long been a thorn in their sides, and which they had not men to garrison.

They are assisted by the Bernois.

ABOUT the 31st of January, the Bernois auxiliaries were advanced in their march to Geneva as far as Nyons, having destroyed all that part of the Vaud through which they passed. Charles III. was then duke of Savoy; but he was so ill-served by his subjects, that he was obliged to take mercenaries into pay, who plundered his dominions equally as his enemies did, so that his subjects of the Vaud, as well as the Chablais, considered the Bernois rather as their protectors than their foes. The city and castle of Gex surrendered to the Bernois; as did Tonon, though lying on the other side of the lake; and the castles of Jussy and Gaillard were, upon summons, delivered up to the Genevois. At last the Bernois auxiliaries, who, with those of Neufchatel, did not amount to above seven hundred men, arrived at Geneva. In a council of war it was resolved to attack fort la Cluse, which they took, and sent the garrison, consisting of five hundred men, prisoners to Gex. But the joy of the Genevois, who returned from this expedition loaded with booty and provisions, was greatly damped by the avarice and insolence of their Bernois auxiliaries, who demanded, for their expence of the war, all the revenues of the vidamate and the bishopric. The senate, on the other hand, represented to the Bernois the dishonour of staining the generous assistance they had given them, by a demand which would subject them to the same oppression from which they had been relieved; and the demand seems, at that time, to have been dropt. The truth is, the Bernois were no inconsiderable gainers by breaking with the duke of Savoy. It gave them an opportunity of making themselves masters of Lausanne and Yverden; and at last, by the help of the Genevois frigate, they took the castle of Chilon, where they delivered Bonnivard, who had been many years confined prisoner in a dungeon. The French king, Francis I. was master of the greatest part of Savoy, La Bresse, and Piedmont, and desired the Bernois to confine their conquests within the Vaud and the Chablais. The Fribourgers, at the same time, though at peace with the duke, took possession of the county of de Romant, lest, as they pretended, it should fall into the hands of the Bernois. Thus the duke was stripped on all hands; and in the beginning of May this year, the Genevois possessed and garrisoned Jussy, Thy, Peney, Bellerive, and Seligny; but demolished the castle of Gaillard.

A new alliance.

THE Bernois had never lost sight of their claim upon the Genevois, whom they now thought to be in a condition to satisfy it; and a meeting was held at Bern for that purpose, where matters were settled on the following terms. The alliance between the two states was continued for twenty-five years; the Genevois obliged themselves to pay to the Bernois ten thousand crowns in six months time; the Bernois were to be admitted into Geneva as often as they thought proper, and to be put into possession of the lordship of Gaillard, the abbey of Bellerive, and the castle of Cholex. Thus the Genevois preserved the revenues of the vidamate, the bishopric, and the valuable abbey of St. Victor.

Religious affairs.

FAREL, who seems to have had in his composition a strong tincture of enthusiasm, still continued at the head of the Genevois reformation; and it is more than probable, that the syndics thought he had too much sway with the common people. The persecution of the Protestants still raging in France, the famous John Calvin, with his brother Anthony, came to Geneva, in his way to Basil and Strasbourg. He was a man of parts and zeal for the reformation; and his learning was far superior to that of Farel, who, with great difficulty, engaged him to remain at Geneva. By their joint labours the Protestant religion acquired great strength; but the divisions and imprudence of its professors had almost ruined it. The Bernois were smitten with the itch of disputation, upon the most ridiculous trifling matters of religion; and assuming a superiority over the Genevois, pressed the latter to comply with them in every whimsical article as a matter of salvation. In the year 1537, an Anabaptist endeavouring to introduce his doctrine into Geneva, was disputed with by Farel, who prevailed with the magistrates to banish him and his followers out of the city. They retired to Switzerland, where the Bernois put some of them to death. In March, Caroline, a famous champion for popery, came likewise to Geneva; and Farel, after disputing with him, prevailed with the magistrates to drive him out of their city likewise. Farel then presumed to differ with the Bernois, upon the articles of making use of unleavened bread in the sacrament; and of women being married with their hair dishevelled. This created a breach in the friendship between the two states; and Calvin joining with him in rejecting the doctrine of consubstantiation, it was widened.

The Protestant ministers expelled;

IT was no wonder that the Genevois magistrates were prejudiced against men who could thus endanger the peace and liberty of a state for such whimsical trifles. The Romish party was indefatigable in representing and exaggerating those absurdities; and at last the magistrates, who are said to have been Roman Catholics in their hearts, cited the three principal Protestant preachers, Calvin, Farel, and Courant, who was blind, to appear before them,

- a them, which they accordingly did, and offered to defend their Confession of Faith. They had against them, not only the Romish, but the Bernois interest; and upon their refusing to conform with the canton of Bern, in celebrating the sacrament, the syndics ordered them to depart the city in three days time, which they were obliged to do. Calvin retired to Basil, and from thence to Strasbourg; as Farel did to Neufchatel; but both of them held a frequent correspondence with their friends in Geneva; and it was easy to foresee, that their exile would be of no long duration. Their banishment was followed by the persecution of the other Protestant clergy, some of whom were prudent enough to comply with the Bernois discipline in indifferent matters; while others, particularly Saunier and Matturin Cordier, were banished for not complying with the Romanists, by administering the communion in
- b a wafer.

- DURING the year 1539, the liberty as well as the religion of the Genevois was in suspense. The banished ministers and their followers had the merit of maintaining the independency of the state in both. The Bernois pretended to dictate; the Roman Catholics improved the differences to their own purposes; and the magistrates, without troubling themselves about the affairs of religion, passed a decree in the general council, that whosoever should so much as advise a change of government, should lose his head. This was a necessary precaution; for a faction now sprung up, who called themselves Artichauds, or Artichokes, from their wearing leaves of that plant as badges, who favoured the superiority of the Bernois over Geneva. Those artichauds had been enemies to the banished pastors. Three of
- c them resided as deputies at Bern, and had agreed to give up to the Bernois the lordship and abbey of St. Victor, with other articles extremely prejudicial to the public liberty. This agreement being reported in the general council, the deputies were sent for home, imprisoned, and condemned to lose their heads as traitors. Being men of great interest, their condemnation produced considerable disturbances. John Philippe, who was then captain-general of the troops, and had borne the highest posts in the state, befriended them, and killed a partizan of the other faction. This in an instant lost Philippe all his interest and popularity. He endeavoured to make his escape, but was taken; and though the Bernois earnestly interposed in his favour, he lost his head. Richardet, another leader of the same party, was killed by a fall, in trying to make his escape over the city walls. Two of the
- d three deputies who were under sentence of death, had been joint syndics with Philippe and Richardet, when the reformed ministers were banished out of Geneva; and nothing was now more talked of than the repeal of that banishment. In the mean while the emperor Charles V. A. D. 1540. sent a letter to the citizens of Geneva, encouraging them to maintain their independency against the Bernois, to whom he had wrote to desist from their claims; and threatening the Genevois with his highest displeasure, if they did not maintain themselves in the possession of those privileges that had been granted them by his ancestors. Those letters being read in the general council, an order was made for repealing the banishment of the ministers; and Calvin was accordingly invited to return to Geneva. He was at that time settled at Strasbourg, where he had vast success in making converts; and it was with great difficulty he
- e was prevailed upon to return to Geneva, where a consistory was now established. Being returned, his exile seemed to have given him new lustre. He applied himself indefatigably to the duties of his function: he kept up a close correspondence with the most eminent Protestants all over Europe; and at last he became in a manner the dictator of the state, where he established that ecclesiastical policy which still prevails there. The high credit he was in was of service to Geneva, where many useful manufacturers and artists took refuge on account of their religion.

- In the year 1542, the plague being at Geneva, the great palace there was fitted up for an hospital; but the magistrates held Calvin in so great esteem, that they would not suffer him to attend the infected, and he went to Strasbourg, where he renewed his disputations
- f with Caroline. Next year Peter of Baume, bishop of Geneva, died, and that dignity was conferred by the pope upon Auberive, who resided at Arnig. Some pretend that Calvin was jealous of the superior parts of the excellent Castalio, who was his fellow-labourer in the ministry, and that he employed underhand means to procure his expulsion from Geneva. It is certain that Castalio was accused before the council of maintaining some heterodox opinions, particularly with regard to the song of Solomon, which he considered as an amorous poem, and the descent of Christ into hell; which being disapproved of by the council, he was deposed from his ministry, and obliged to withdraw to Basil.

Death of the bishop of Geneva.

- In the year 1545, a most incredible scene of wickedness was discovered in Geneva. That city had been often subject to the plague, which a set of miscreants, who were employed as
- g cleansers, and who being recovered had nothing to fear from the infection, endeavoured to spread. Those wretches, consisting of men and women, erected themselves into a kind of fraternity, and made use of cant words to express their detestable practices. One Lentilles was at their head; and it was common for them to collect the morbid matter in rags, which they dropped or distributed in places which were not infected. One Tallent, an accomplice of Lentilles, had been discovered in this detestable crime at Tonon, and being apprehended he confessed his guilt, and impeached Lentilles and his confederates. Lentilles being apprehended, was confronted with Tallent; but would confess nothing, tho' racked to the most exquisite degree till he expired. All they could extort from him, was his desiring them to seize upon all who attended the hospital. This being done, seven men and twenty-four women were tried, convicted, and upon their own confession burnt alive; and a surgeon, and two others, had their skins pulled off them by red-hot pincers. All of them acknowledged that Lentilles had engaged them, under the most horrible oaths, to the perpetration of their crimes. Those executions, in a few weeks, restored the city and state to salubrity, after losing twenty thousand people.

A scene of wickedness discovered.

Dissentions in Geneva.

NOTHING memorable happened for some years after in Geneva but religious disputes. Calvin's rigorous discipline shut up the taverns, put a stop to all sports, and prohibited all prophane dancing and singing, which gave great offence to the young Genevois; but it was in vain they repined. Calvin got the magistrates on his side, and the contumacious were threatened with excommunication if they did not submit. A member of the council, however, had the courage to impeach Calvin's doctrine as being unsound; but the magistrates, without farther inquiry or application, committed him to prison, and condemned him to do penance for his accusation, by walking through the city with a torch in his hand. A letter about this time was intercepted from Calvin to Viret, and read before the council, accusing the Genevois of impiety and hypocrisy. Calvin being questioned upon this letter, boldly justified it; but applied his reflections to particular persons; upon which he was acquitted, and he continued his disputations and publications upon religion with vast success. He met with a keen opponent in the person of Bolsec, who had been a Carmelite, but pretended to embrace protestantism, and at the same time charged Calvin with making God the author of sin, and with other absurd tenets. Calvin defended himself, as is said, with great learning, and was seconded by Farel; and Bolsec was first imprisoned, and then banished the city. One Troillet was another of Calvin's opponents, but was silenced by the secular power, though that did not prevent many disturbances on the head of religion from arising.

Condemnation of Servetus.

BUT the most impious abuse of the secular power in matters of religion, happened in the case of the famous Michael Servetus, a Spaniard, and one of the most learned physicians of his age. It is far from being our intention to enter upon the speculative points of this unhappy gentleman's doctrine in which he differed from Calvin; we shall relate facts. Servetus had been imprisoned for his opinions at Vienna; from whence making his escape, he took refuge at Geneva. It was natural for him to hope for an asylum amongst a people who had founded their liberties upon their right of thinking for themselves in matters of religion, and disclaiming authority in points of conscience. He was deceived; and being arrived at Geneva, he was thrown into prison, and accused by Calvin of some heterodox opinions with regard to the Trinity, and other articles of faith. He was at the same time robbed by the magistrates of a gold chain, and a considerable sum of money, which never were returned him; so that he was in danger of perishing for want in the prison. Being called upon to make his defence, he did it with so much freedom and learning, that Calvin could oppose him with nothing but the secular power, which condemned him to be burnt alive. Servetus suffered this sentence without retracting his opinion, to the indelible infamy of those concerned in it. This cruelty gave many advantages to Calvin's enemies. He was represented as a favourer of persecution in matters of religion, which was the strongest charge that he himself had brought against the Romish church; and the defence he made for himself was vague and illiberal; for it contained nothing more than recriminations upon Servetus, and a pretended confutation of his heresies, as if those bare allegations, had they been proved, could have justified murder.

Jealousy of the Genevois.

THE fiery spirit of Calvin seemed to communicate itself to the laity of Geneva. The French had retired to that city in such numbers, that the Bernois sent the magistrates some intimations of their having formed a design against their liberties; upon which the people of Merindol and Cabrières, who had fled for refuge to Geneva, were employed in farther fortifying the city. This did not satisfy the hot-headed citizens, and under Amy Perrin, their captain-general, they entered into a design to massacre all the French within Geneva in one night. This detestable conspiracy was discovered by the council, who put to death as many of the heads of it as fell into their hands; but thirty of them fled, and were condemned in their absence. They, however, procured the Bernois to intercede for them, but to no purpose, which produced many tumults in and about the city.

Valentine Gentil condemned.

GENEVA was now the chief sanctuary of all the reformed, whom religion had driven from their own countries. The English, the French, the Italians, and other nations, had their several churches there, or in the suburbs, and their transactions make a considerable figure.

- a figure in the ecclesiastical history of that time. In the year 1556, the confederacy between Geneva and Bern was renewed; and next year it was rendered perpetual. In the year 1558, some Italians professing Arian principles, which they neither understood nor could explain, came to Geneva; amongst them was Valentine Gentil. The secular power continued to be the great test of truth amongst the Genevois; and those heretics, as an answer to their doubts and doctrines, were required to sign the confession of faith drawn up by Calvin. Some complied through conveniency, amongst others was Gentil; but others, because they would not comply, were forced to leave the city. Gentil, notwithstanding his subscription, continued to dogmatize upon Arian principles, and to oppose the doctrine of Calvin; upon which he was committed to prison, and great doubts arose, whether he did not deserve the
- b fate of Servetus. Gentil was, however, more pliable at this time than Servetus had been. He exhibited a writing, by which he retracted his opinions; and by a seeming repentance prevailed with the magistrates to inflict upon him no other punishment than burning his books, and obliging him not to depart the city without their leave. Notwithstanding the mildness of this censure he joined with Matthew Gribalde, a disciple of Servetus, and withdrawing from Geneva, he propagated his doctrines in the county of Gex, where the bailiff obliged him to a second recantation; but being irreclaimable, he was afterwards burnt at Bern.

- THE great apology for Calvin pursuing those sanguinary persecuting measures is his sincerity, and his being satisfied as to the truth of what he taught. He had now acquired a reputation all over Europe, which occasioned a resort of Protestants to Geneva, to the vast benefit of that city. About the year 1558, those emigrants encreased so greatly, that it was judged necessary to found a college at Geneva for their reception and education. This college was divided into seven classes, in which Greek, Hebrew, and philosophy, were taught by separate professors, while Calvin, and the famous Theodore Beza, read the divinity lectures. The statutes of this college were afterwards printed. About this time Emanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy, succeeding to his father, who had been stripped of almost all his estates, obtained the restitution of part of them from the cantons; but complained bitterly that the Genevois encouraged his subjects of Lucerne and other places in their contumacy. A like complaint was brought against the Genevois by Charles IX. the French king, who taxed
- d their state with being the source from which all the divisions and distractions of his kingdom proceeded. In answer to those charges, the Genevois did not deny their having encouraged foreigners to study there, and to qualify themselves for the protestant ministry; but they protested that they never entertained the least thoughts of fomenting disobedience in subjects against their sovereign; and as to the Savoyards, they declared, that they had no farther connection with them, than by praying God to deliver them from military cruelty.

- GENEVA* was at this time considered on the continent of Europe, as being the great seat of the reformed religion. Their magistrates were so severe in their discipline, that they put a banker to death for being guilty of adultery; and another person condemned to be
- e whipped for the same crime, having appealed for a mitigation of his punishment to the council of two hundred, was so far from receiving it, that he was put to death likewise by their sentence. In all religious disputes, the Genevois divines were the umpires, and they furnished preachers and ministers to all the reformed states in Europe. In the year 1564, Calvin died, and his corpse was attended to the grave by almost all the inhabitants of Geneva. Nothing remarkable happened in that state till the year 1566, when James Paul Spiffame was put to death at Geneva. He had been bishop of Nevers, and had retired to that city on account of his embracing the reformed religion. He had, at his own request, been admitted a citizen; and he was so much esteemed for his learning, that he was sent as a missionary into France, for the propagation of protestantism. During his absence a suspicion
- f arose of his wanting again to reconcile himself to the church of Rome; and it was discovered that, being married, he had antedated his nuptial contract, that he might enable his son, whom he had by his wife before marriage, to inherit his large estate. Being imprisoned upon this charge, he was examined, convicted, and put to death, upon his own confession. It was, however, believed by many, that his chief crime consisted of his having disoblighed Catharine de Medici, whose influence with the syndics procured his execution.

- THE duke of Savoy, in the year 1567, procured from the Bernois the restitution of Gex, Gaillard, Terny, and Chablais, on condition of the inhabitants being indulged in the profession of the protestant religion. That same year the duke d'Alva being to pass through Savoy, the duke of Savoy endeavoured to engage him in an attempt to make himself master of Geneva, and for that purpose raised a considerable army. His design taking air, many of the French protestants repaired to Geneva, and offering their services for the defence of the city, they were formed into companies, under proper commanders; and such other precautions were taken, that the duke, without making any attempt upon the city, proceeded proceeded to Islanders. He was no sooner gone, than the foreigners at Geneva, who had been formed into seven companies, marched to the relief of their brethren in Gex and Verfey, and took possession of both places, which were abandoned by their garrisons. Soon after this Geneva was again visited by the plague, and other natural calamities; but nothing remarkable happened in its government till the year 1578, when Henry III. of France made an alliance with the Swisses, in which Geneva was included, as being the key and bulwark of Swisserland. It was stipulated by this alliance, that in case that city was besieged, the cantons should send a sufficient number of men to its assistance at the king's charge; and, on the other hand, that the city should suffer his troops to pass through it, marching orderly in rank and file, granting no retreat or passage to his majesty's enemies. This treaty was concluded at Soleurre, betwixt the king and the cities of Bern, Soleurre, and Geneva; Zurich was afterwards comprehended, at the suit of the sieur de Cocumartin, ambassador from the king to the Swisses^a.

IN the year 1582, the duke of Savoy renewed his attempt to make himself master of Geneva, being encouraged thereto by a Dauphinois, who lived at Toncn, and pretended that he had confederates, who would open the gates of the city as soon as the Savoyards should appear before it. The duke upon this raised a number of men; and one Lance, who commanded in the quarter of St. Gervais, undertook to give his troops admittance into the city; but gave information of what he had done to the council, after he had got all the money he could from the duke. The Savoyards were to be commanded by the count de Raconis, who advanced to Gex, where the Dauphinois, who had some reason to be suspicious of the event, left him. This defection made the count believe that he was betrayed; and though he found the gates of St. Gervais open, he durst not enter, but retired to Terny and St. Julian. The truth was, that Geneva at that time was plentifully furnished with Protestant soldiers both from France and Swisserland, besides natives, who were well prepared to receive the count, had his army entered the city. He, on the other hand, being at the head of a considerable army, of which fifteen hundred were raised out of the popish cantons, resolved to attempt something against the city by open force; but he was defeated in all the attempts he made, and obliged to retire after plundering the neighbouring villages. Upon his retreat an enquiry was made after his accomplices, and a vintner, with three others, were beheaded on that account.

Case of the Jews.

ABOUT this time the Jews suffered a violent persecution both in France and Germany, and fixed their eye upon Geneva, as the most commodious situation in which they could settle. They offered to repair thither to the number of eight or ten thousand; to build houses in a quarter that should be allotted them, which they were to fortify and garrison at their own charges; to serve with the other citizens as soldiers; to pay a yearly tribute, and to raise their proportion of all other taxes. A considerable number of the Genevois were strongly disposed to accept of this offer; but prejudice and prepossession prevailing, it was rejected, and the Jews were obliged to purchase their peace with the Germans.

Natural calamities in Geneva.

THE year 1584 was distinguished by a most dreadful hurricane, earthquakes, and tempest, that happened in Geneva, and all over its neighbourhood, which buried a great number of men, castles, and houses. In October, the same year, the city of Zurich, considering Geneva as the key of the Swiss cantons, entered with it into a perpetual alliance; the memory of which is preserved by a Latin inscription in the town-house, and the same was celebrated by great rejoicings at Geneva. Next year an extraordinary famine succeeded, which carried off a vast number of the Genevois, and the fields were filled with numbers of villagers, expiring with hunger. The effects of this calamity were long felt, and encouraged the duke of Savoy, in the year 1588, to apply to the pope for assistance, to make himself master of Geneva. His holiness received the Savoyard ambassador with great respect, but consulted the bishop of la Cave, who was a Genevois by birth, as to the practicability of the proposal. The bishop giving his opinion against it, his holiness answered the ambassador, that he would not expend the church's treasure in advancing the duke of Savoy's temporal concerns; but that he was ready to assist him in reducing Geneva to the power of the church. The duke communicated this answer, with which he was highly exasperated, to the Spanish ministry, who dissuaded him from having any connection with his holiness; upon which he resolved to attempt the thing by force; but the Genevois, at this time, found a powerful ally in Henry III. of France.

Duke of Savoy seizes Saluces.

THE duke of Savoy, taking advantage of the distracted divisions of that kingdom, had seized upon the marquise of Saluces; and Henry sent Harley sieur de Sancy, one of his ministers of state, to persuade the Genevois to break with the duke. Sancy offered, in his master's name, not only to furnish them with troops, but to bear all the charges of the war, and that they should keep all the conquests they should make. This matter being laid a before the council, some of the members thought the proposal too hazardous to be embraced; but the advantages attending it were so evident, that it was agreed to by a great majority. The inducement was, that the duke had shewn himself an open enemy to their state; that by complying with the king's request, they would obtain advantages for the Protestants in France; and that they would be sure of the friendship of the prince palatine, and the Swisses, during the war.

FROM Geneva, Sancy proceeded to Switzerland, where he induced the Bernois to declare war against the duke; and the Genevois being furnished with some able officers from France, took the field with six companies of foot, and three troops of horse, commanded by two Frenchmen, Quitry and Baujeu. In the night time they surprized and took Monthoux, and b in the morning they took the castle of Bonne, which is situated at the entrance into Focigny, from the Genevois country. They then broke down some bridges in the Chablais, to prevent the enemy's approach, and at last laid siege to the important castle of St. Joire, which belonged to the baron of Hermance. This nobleman had been the capital enemy of the Genevois, and the contriver or manager of the chief enterprizes against them. The duke of Savoy, little expecting that the Genevois would have acted offensively, had made no dispositions for saving the castle, which fell into the hands of the Genevois, and with it all the material papers relating to the operations of their enemies against their city. On the 7th of April they pursued their good fortune, by besieging and taking Gex itself, the governor and garrison of which they sent prisoners to Geneva. By this time, the duke of c Savoy being alarmed at the progress of the Genevois, dispatched Sonaz, his governor of Remilly, with eight troops of horse, and nine companies of foot, to recover the places they had taken. He presented himself before Bonne, which was defended by one Bois for the Genevois; and though its garrison did not exceed ninety men, he durst not attack it. In the mean time the Genevois, under Quitry, besieged La Cluse, situated at the foot of mount Jura; but Quitry found the place so strong, that the garrison held out till it was relieved by Sonaz. In this siege, which was very desperately carried on by the Genevois and Bernois, they lost the baron of St. Lagier, and some of their best officers.

AFTER this, the headquarters of the Genevois was at Cologny, in the neighbourhood of La Cluse, where they were joined by colonel Erlach, with some auxiliaries from Bern; and lay- b ing aside all farther thoughts of besieging La Cluse, the whole army marched back to Geneva, where they were joined by some reinforcements from Soleurre and the Grisons. They then, about the middle of April, besieged and took the castle of Tonon, having transported their artillery thither by water, with several other strong places in the Chablais. After that they laid siege to the fort of Ripaille; but the duke of Savoy came to its relief with three thousand men. Though the Genevois appeared as principals in this war, yet the numbers they brought into the field were very inconsiderable, compared to those of the French, the Swiss, and the Grisons, for their army amounted in the whole to ten thousand men. They were, however, far from being united, and the French behaved but very poorly; but the Genevois and the Swiss acted so bravely, that Ripaille, though the garrison consisted of five e hundred men, was obliged to capitulate. After this the French army withdrew to Franche Comte, and the Bernois ordered three thousand men to protect the conquests that had been made in the bailliages of Vaud and Chablais. The withdrawing of the French had almost ruined the affairs of the Genevois. They saw themselves burdened with the charge of a war, while their treasury was empty, and their magazines exhausted. The duke of Savoy, on the other hand, had great resources, and by this time had raised an army of about eight thousand men, the command of which he gave to the baron of Hermance, who immediately retook the castle of St. Joire, and some other places in the Chablais, and besieged Marcouffy, which made a vigorous defence, and was relieved by a party of three hundred Genevois. The latter, however, upon the main, found themselves unable to maintain the f places they had taken, and therefore abandoned them all, excepting Bonne and Monthoux, or Monthon. They at the same time began to raise a fort near the bridge over the Arve, in the neighbourhood of their city, in which they were interrupted by the duke of Savoy, at the head of two thousand horse and foot, but he was repulsed with loss; as he was in two vigorous attacks which he made upon the Genevois castle of Terny, belonging to the abbey of St. Victor. The duke, to be revenged, ravaged the adjacent country; and bringing up his heavy artillery, he began a furious cannonade against the castle, which being old and defenceless, the garrison was obliged to surrender, on promise of having their lives spared; but this capitulation was infamously broken by the duke, who ordered them all to be hanged.

g THIS breach of faith exasperated the Genevois, who were now much better soldiers than the Savoyards; and, notwithstanding the inequality of their numbers, they had the better in all encounters. The duke was again repulsed at the fort near the Arve, and five hundred Genevois musqueteers beat four thousand Savoyards, upon the plain of Ouattes, half a league who are exasperated with the duke of Savoy.

league distant from the same fort, killing two hundred, amongst whom were several general officers, with the loss of no more than two men, and four or five wounded of their own. This desperate engagement obliged the Savoyards to keep for some time within their intrenchments. The duke, hearing that the van of the Bernois, under colonel Erlach, was advancing to Geneva, attacked them in the village of Escoran, near La Cluse, but was so warmly received, that he was obliged to retreat with loss. About the same time he was forced to raise the blockade of Bonne, and to abandon the village of Feling in Focigny, where part of his army was quartered. Notwithstanding those partial advantages, the duke continued greatly superior to the Genevois, even though they had been joined by forty companies of Bernois auxiliaries, commanded by the advoyer of Vatteville: but the duke's army lying between that reinforcement and the Genevois, he redoubled his efforts against the latter, before they could be joined by their auxiliaries, and made repeated efforts against the fort on the Arve and Bonne, but all without success. In the mean while, some of his counsellors proposed a peace between him and the canton of Bern; but his demands being very high, only a three weeks truce was concluded, to the infinite prejudice of the Genevois. The truce being expired, the Genevois at last were joined by their auxiliaries, and both fell into the country of Focigny, where they took several forts; the Savoyards, in the mean while, making reprisals in the lordship of St. Victor, where Bois, one of the best officers of the Genevois, was killed.

Death of Henry III. of France.

THE assassination and death of Henry III. of France, which happened about this time, put the duke of Savoy upon invading Provence. He had been disappointed in his design of subduing the Genevois; but thinking it dangerous to leave Bonne in the hands of his enemies, he besieged it, and battered it so furiously, that the garrison was obliged to surrender, on promise of having their lives saved; but the duke as usual broke the capitulation, and put them all to death, excepting Mercier the minister, who was reserved, and afterwards flayed alive. It is hard to say what the consequence might have been, had the duke pursued this advantage; but he was intent upon his expedition to Provence. Finding the Genevois resolved not to submit to him, he built a fort at Verfoy, which commanded the navigation upon the lake; and leaving it under the government of the baron of Serra, he withdrew his army beyond the mountains, as the Bernois did to their own country. Upon their retreat, the Genevois found themselves in a most deplorable situation, by having lost the navigation of the lake. The governor of Verfoy threatened to oblige them by famine to come with halts about their necks, and make their submission to the duke his master, which they were sensible must be the case if they could not take Verfoy. Their force in Geneva was at that time eight hundred foot, two troops of horse, two troops of light horse, and one hundred and fifty volunteers, all of them commanded by the sieur Lubigny, a Frenchman. They had for some days harrassed the garrison of the fort by false alarms, and on the night of the 7th of November they resolved to attack it, as they imagined that the garrison of the castle would be then fatigued. They divided their little army into four parts; and after performing public prayer, they marched out upon the expedition with petards and scaling ladders. Their greatest dependence, however, was upon seventeen resolute soldiers, who with iron crowes in their hands, conducted by a peasant, forced their way by a narrow passage into the body of the place, where they overthrew all before them, while the division without had leisure to break open the gate, and scale the walls; and entering the place, the governor, with the loss of two hundred men, was driven into the castle, which he was in a day's time obliged to surrender, to the great joy of the Genevois, who immediately set fire to the place, and destroyed all its fortifications, and carried the provisions and ammunition, which they found in it in great abundance, to Geneva. The rest of the winter was spent in skirmishes of no great importance, farther than as they served to render the Genevois excellent soldiers.

Progress of a new war.

In which the Genevois are successful.

IN the beginning of January, 1590, the Genevois, who still kept the field, after beating a party of the Savoyards, were repulsed in an attack they made upon the castle of Bastie, near Verfoy; but bringing up their heavy artillery twelve days after, they took it, and demolished it. Soon after they reduced the castle of Monthoux, and by way of reprisal, they put the garrison, who were the inveterate enemies of Geneva, to the sword. About the same time they took the city and castle of Gex, and repulsed the Savoyards in two fresh attempts which they made upon their fort on the Arve. In April, Lubigny, the Genevois general, took the castle of Pierre, near Farges, which had been a great thorn in the side of Geneva, and then he once more formed the siege of La Cluse. The place was exceedingly strong, and a great body of Savoyards under Don Amadeo, a natural son of that duke, was advancing to relieve it. Lubigny, however, took his measures so well, and pushed his attacks so warmly, that the governor of the place, a Piedmontese, having only twenty-eight soldiers left, surrendered the fort, which Lubigny entered on the twenty-first of April. Soon after Amadeo arrived with his army before the fort, and perceiving, by a discharge of artillery

- a tillery from the walls, that it was in the hands of the Genevois, he carried, through the cowardice of one captain Esgaillon, a post in a neighbouring mountain, a post which commanded the fort, and rendered it untenable by Lubigny, who was forced to abandon the same, after blowing up part of the fortifications. He carried his army back to Geneva, where Esgaillon, by the sentence of the council of two hundred, was, notwithstanding the great interest made for him, beheaded for cowardice. Upon Lubigny's retreat, Amadeo repaired the fort of La Cluse, and ravaged the bailiwick of Gex; but the Genevois, by the friendship of the bailiff and people of Nyons, got safe home three barks laden with merchandizes, and ten thousand crowns in ready money, which the Savoyards endeavoured to intercept. After this many inconsiderable actions happened on both sides, in which the
- b Genevois generally had the better; but they were repelled in an attempt they made upon the castle of Brant, in the bailiwick of Tonon. Some days after, the Savoyards endeavoured to carry off three hundred head of cattle from the bailiwick of Gex; but Lubigny obliged them to abandon their prey, with the loss of one hundred and twenty of their best men, their cavalry taking refuge in La Cluse: while the Genevois lost only a single man. Two days after, Don Amadeo sent a message to Geneva, to know what number of Savoyard prisoners were in that city, and complaining, that the Genevois carried away even his drummers. The Genevois, who had about four hundred Savoyard prisoners, in their turn reproached Amadeo, for the barbarous manner in which he made war upon them, not sparing even their women and children. At this time the Genevois were at a great loss in being
- c deprived of Lubigny, who had been bruised in an encounter, and was obliged to keep his bed. Being the only officer amongst them who understood discipline and military affairs, the Genevois soldiers grew licentious, and were defeated in several encounters; in one of which they lost two hundred of their best men by ambuscades, which Amadeo had laid for them, within a league of their city. The Genevois historian ^a says, that such of their troops as were wounded and carried to the hospital, instead of being cured, had their wounds poisoned by a villainous surgeon, who was afterwards executed. The Savoyards, however, lost more men in proportion than the Genevois. This defeat threw the city into such a consternation, that it was expected every moment the Savoyards would enter it sword in hand; but Lubigny, notwithstanding his illness, went round the fortifications in his night-
- d gown, and made such dispositions as prevented farther ill consequences.

The Genevois worsted.

- ON the 23d of August, the sieur Clugny, baron of Conforgien, arrived at Geneva, and took upon him the command of the troops of the republic. To keep up in the minds of the Genevois, the high opinion they had conceived of his activity and courage, the very night of his arrival he put on board some barks three companies of foot, with which he intended to surprize the city of Evian; but the citizens being provided to receive them, the barks were obliged to return, after making some booty. The Genevois, by this time, had conceived a contempt for their enemy, which had almost proved fatal to them. Hernance observing the little caution with which they proceeded, concealed his force, and lay upon the defensive in Focigny, where the Genevois were informed by the peasants of the coun-
- e try, that he had not with him above four hundred troops. The Genevois were so much convinced of this, that one hundred and fifty foot, and one hundred and thirty horse, issued out of Geneva to carry in their enemies vintage harvest; and notwithstanding all the admonitions of Conforgien, proceeded so inadvertently, that they were completely surrounded by the Savoyards, and must have been intirely cut to pieces, had they not been disengaged by Conforgien, who foreseeing what had happened, had his troops in readiness, and not only brought off the foragers, but obtained the most complete victory the Genevois had ever gained over the Savoyards, after a dispute of three hours, in which the Savoyards lost in killed, wounded, and prisoners, five hundred men; while the loss of the Genevois amounted to about ten foot soldiers, one trooper, and fifteen wounded, but not
- f dangerously. This victory was of the greater importance to the Genevois, as their enemies were resolved to have given them no quarter, and were so sure of conquest, that their officers had dressed themselves in their richest cloaths and armour; so that the spoils which the Genevois carried from the field, were very considerable. It was observed, that Conforgien began and finished all his actions with public supplications and thanksgivings to heaven, performed on the field.

The war renewed.

The Genevois victorious.

- TOWARDS the end of October, the war between the Genevois and their enemies became so desperate, that both sides came to a resolution to give no quarter. The Savoyards had been reinforced by Neapolitan, Spanish, and Italian auxiliaries, who, if possible, hated the Genevois worse than the Savoyards did, and three companies of them lying at Crusille, a
- g town about three leagues from Geneva, they filled all the neighbouring country with devastations and cruelties. On the 29th of October, Conforgien marched out of Geneva, at the head of his troops to surprize this nest of barbarity ; but his march being discovered a by the Savoyard peasants, part of the garrison stood upon its guard, whilst others had such a contempt for the Genevois, that they loitered in the town, which was sacked by the Genevois, who put them all to the sword, and made a vast booty. The castle, however, still held out, and all the neighbouring country being alarmed, Conforgien, after killing about one hundred of the enemy, retreated with the loss of three soldiers and a lieutenant. The rest of the year was spent in actions of small importance, in which the Genevois burnt some Savoyard villages.

Farther operations of the war.

ON the 1st of January, 1591, the Genevois being reinforced with some French troops under Sancy, their army amounted to two thousand men, with which they laid siege to the castle of Buringe; but were attacked in their camp by three hundred Savoyard horse, b of whom they killed sixty, and repulsed the rest. The siege was then carried on with such vigour, that the garrison desired to capitulate, but could obtain no other terms but their surrendering at discretion; upon which they made their escape out of the place, which was immediately taken possession of, and demolished by the Genevois. The next besieged Tonon, which they took on composition, and found in it the value of six or seven thousand crowns of gold ; and they afterwards took Evian, and plundered the neighbouring country. Those successes inspired the French with intolerable licentiousness ; and while they were lying dispersed about the country, news came that their enemies, consisting of Savoyards, Spaniards, and Italians, to the number of six thousand foot, and about one thousand horse, were advanced as far as Roche to attack them. The French and Genevois generals, Sancy, c Quity, and Conforgien, were then encamped at Buringe ; and hearing of the enemies approach, they called in their parties, and strengthened their army, drawing the garrisons out of the neighbouring places. The duke's army was commanded by Don Amadeo, Olivarez, an experienced Spanish captain, Sonaz, the marquis of Treffort, and the count of Chateau Neuf. The opinion of Olivarez was against attacking the French immediately, for he said their own disorders, and want of provision, would oblige them to retire, and he was joined by Don Amadeo ; the other two generals, however, were for cutting the French off without suffering them to retreat, and alledged, that their own army would mutiny for want of pay, if they were not led to action ; upon which the attack was resolved on, on the 12th of March. By this time the French and the Genevois had gained a position which secured their communi- d cation with Geneva, and were very advantageously encamped. The Spaniards, however, made so furious an attack, that they entirely defeated five hundred French; and their whole army must have been defeated, had not this first advantage encouraged Sonaz, and the count of Chateau Neuf, to advance so far into the plain with thirteen hundred musqueteers, that Conforgien charged and routed them before they could fall back upon their main body, which at last they did with great difficulty, with the loss of their leader Sonaz, and three hundred men, of whom one hundred were gentlemen. When night drew on, the army of Savoy passed the river at Buringe, but broke down the bridge, for fear of being pursued ; while the French, who had suffered a good deal in the encounter, retired to Franche Comte. The rest of the campaign was spent in mutual inroads, in one of which the e baron of Hermance was made prisoner by the Genevois, and carried to Geneva, where he was confined till the February following, when he paid eight thousand crowns for his ransom.

A peace proposed.

IN October, 1592, the baron of Conforgien returned to Geneva, and resumed his command. After several military operations, in which he was generally successful, he had some conferences about a peace with the baron of Hermance, and being disgusted with the severe four manners of the Genevois towards his men, he returned to France. Upon his departure, the marquis of Treffort encamped with eight hundred men at Lancy, near the new fort upon the Arve ; and being forced from thence, the Genevois demolished that village. In the mean while Conforgien, upon the invitation of the Genevois, returned to f that city ; but a truce for three months had taken place between the French king and the duke of Savoy, to which the Genevois were invited to accede, which they accordingly did, on the 16th of September, 1593. In a few days after, six of the Swiss cantons sent their deputies to Geneva, to persuade the magistracy there to a peace with the duke of Savoy. This proposition was rejected ; but the truce was continued for two years, during which time, the French king being in no condition to assist them, the Genevois demolished the fort upon the Arve. This compliance had the effect to open a kind of a communication between the Savoyards and the Genevois ; and they appeared less intractable towards one another than they had been for many years. In the year 1597, a report spread that Theodore Beza, the great pastor of Geneva, had turned Roman Catholic, and that the Genevois g had sent deputies to Rome to be reconciled to that see. This idle report arose from the effect of the truce, which had been concluded two years before. That being expired, hostilities recommenced between the Savoyards and the Genevois, who were now deprived of a of the assistance of France; but the duke being as unable as the Genevois were to continue a war, those hostilities soon ceased, and new conferences for a peace were set on foot.

At last a treaty was concluded between the French king, the king of Spain, and the duke of Savoy, in which the Swisses and their allies were comprehended on the part of France. The duke of Savoy denied that those general terms comprehended the Genevois, who were not named in the treaty; and the French king insisted as strenuously that they were. This difference was likely to be attended with serious consequences; for Villeroy, the French minister, by his master's order, signified, under his own hand, that his master never would depart from the comprehension of the Genevois, under the title of allies to the Swisses; and he dispatched Chapeaurouge, the Genevois deputy, with letters to the re-
b public, intimating that he never would forsake them; and that if they were attacked by the duke of Savoy, he would defray all the expences of the war. Those dispatches were so agreeable to the council, that upon reading them their great guns were discharged, and a public thanksgiving was celebrated in the city.

This year the plague broke out again in Geneva, but not so fiercely as before; and the Genevois had the mortification to perceive, that the greatest part of their brethren of Tounon had reverted to popery, partly through the persuasions of one Cherubin, a priest; and partly through the power of their sovereign the duke of Savoy. That prince perceiving the crown of France to be in earnest to maintain Geneva in its independency, at last persuaded the Genevois magistrates to agree to a meeting for discussing that affair at Hermance.

c His deputies were the sieur Jacob, one of his lieutenants; the president Rochette; the president Berliet, baron of Bourget; Lambert baron of Terny; and Marin earl of Viry. The deputies of Geneva were, the counsellors, Maillet, Dausin, Leff, and Roset, together with the secretary John Sarrafin. The conference was long, solemn, intricate, and learned; the matter was debated verbally, and in writing; and the papers interchanged on this ac-casion, exhaust all that can be said on this subject. Nothing satisfactory, however, resulted from this conference, only the French king, by a letter to the duke of Savoy, dated November 11, 1599, again insisted upon the Genevois being comprehended as his allies in the late treaty; and acquainted the duke, that he had taken them into his peculiar protection.

d THE duke perceiving the French king to be steady in his resolution with regard to the Genevois, endeavoured to shake him in point of interest. The French king urged him to restore the marquisate of Saluces; and the duke took a journey to Paris, to treat on that affair. He applied to the pope's nuncio, to whom he gave a commission to offer to give up the marquisate, provided the king would abandon the defence of the Genevois. The nuncio attacked Henry on this head, with all the subtlety of his profession; but in all his arguments he still went upon the presumption, that the dukes of Savoy had an original and uncontrovertible right to the sovereignty of Geneva; and from that he inferred, that the duke had as lawful a claim upon that as Henry had upon the marquisate. His arguments made no impression upon the king; for he disputed the duke's right, and told the e nuncio, that in protecting the Genevois he only followed the example of his ancestors, and the dictates of gratitude; concluding, that he could not, without staining his honour and that of his crown, abandon them or suffer them to be oppressed by the duke. This resolute answer put an end to all farther conferences on that head; and the king and duke disagreeing in other respects, both parties took the field. The king had the advantage of the campaign; and having stripped the duke of almost all Savoy, he laid siege to St. Catherine's fort, that had been but lately erected within two leagues of Geneva, near Sonzy, and was of infinite detriment to the Genevois. This castle was a regular fortification, and of so much importance to the Genevois, that they appointed a solemn deputation to the king, with Beza at its head, to beg that he would give them leave to demolish it. The f duke de Sully, a protestant, and one of the best servants ever any king had, was then both the first minister and the friend of Henry, whom he convinced that all the maxims of policy, as well as honour, led him to protect the Genevois. The duke in person introduced the deputies to his master; and Beza, that aged venerable reformer, in a speech he made on the occasion, shewed how well he had studied the most fulsome adulation of heathen and popish orators to their sovereigns, but without directly mentioning the main point of the deputation. Henry in his answer spoke like a friend and a gentleman: he assured them, that they might depend on the good offices of the duke de Sully, whom he took by the hand; and added, it must be a very unreasonable request which they could make, and he not grant it. To cut off any farther unnecessary formalities, he whisg pered in the ears of the deputies, that he was no stranger to the purport of their commission; and he assured them, that fort St. Catherine should be demolished as soon as taken.

The French king favours the Genevois.

As does the duke de Sully.

THIS noble open behaviour of the king, had it not been for the considerate generosity a of the duke de Sully, must have been inconveniently expensive to the Genevois. It transported them so, that they threw open their gates to the French army, and kept open table for their officers, so that no fewer than four thousand French were reckoned in one night to be in the city. The duke of Sully, both by his example and authority, discountenanced this resort, by returning to the camp himself, and ordering all the officers and others to follow him. In the mean while, the trenches being opened before fort St. Ca- therine, the garrison capitulated; and having marched out with the honours of war, Sully blew up the bastions; and the Genevois serving as pioneers, so effectually demolished the fort, that, in two days' time, not a vestige of it remained. Henry gave six pieces of cannon, which were found in the fort, in a present to the Genevois. b

Peace of Lyons.

NEXT year, by the interposition of the pope's legate Aldobrandini, an accommodation was made between Henry and the duke of Savoy at Lyons, by which Henry agreed to hold the county of Bresse, which he had conquered, with Gex and other acquisitions he had made, and to leave to the duke the marquisate of Saluces. Gex was then held by the Genevois, who earnestly begged of Henry to remain in possession of it; but all was to no purpose, for they were obliged to resign it; but Henry, by way of compensation, again declared them to be his allies, and that they were under his protection. This accommodation between Henry and the duke, was far from reconciling the Savoyards and the Ge- nevois. The former found means to get possession of some villages belonging to the Ge- nevois; but were disappointed in their attempts upon others; and the Genevois thought c them of so little importance, not to mention that their right to them was doubtful, that rather than break the peace, they suffered them to remain with the Savoyards; but an event was now at hand, the most important of any in the Genevois history.

History of the famous scalade
of Geneva.

IN the year 1602, a kind of jubilee was celebrated at Tonon, belonging to the duke of Savoy, and finely situated on a river by the lake, about eighteen miles distant from Geneva.
The resort to this festivity was very numerous; and amongst others were some Frenchmen, who, mingling with the Savoyards, understood that a scheme was in agitation for surprizing Geneva. They communicated their discovery to the Genevois magistrates; but they disregarded it at first, as being improbable. At last they complained to the sieur Albigny, who was governor on that side of the mountains for the duke of Savoy, who gave them the d strongest assurances that his master was determined, at all events, to observe the late treaties of Vervins and Lyons, made with the king of France, in which the Genevois were included, but not mentioned. The Genevois seemed to be satisfied with those assurances;
and their credulity had almost cost them their liberties.

THE plot for surprizing Geneva had been formed originally by the Jesuits and violent Romanists, who considered that city as the seat and shelter of heresy; and during the Tonon jubilee, they had bound the undertakers of it to execute it, by solemn oaths and sacraments. The duke himself omitted no means to render it successful. He caused troops to defile towards Focigny, without being discerned, and particularly the regiment of the baron of Laval d'Isere, which was made up of French fugitives, banished their country e for their crimes, and ripe for any desperate enterprize. Brunaulieu, who was lieutenant-colonel, undertook to reconnoitre the place; and after taking the height of the walls, and the dimensions of the ditches, he assured Albigny, that the undertaking was not only practicable, but easy to be accomplished. To render the Genevois perfectly secure, and likewise to form a party amongst them, the duke sent the president Rochette, his counsellor of state, with a commission to Geneva, where he proposed to the magistrates, the heads of a new and a lasting treaty between them and his master, which had such an effect, that the Genevois even neglected to place the usual guards at their gates, and upon their walls.
Notwithstanding the duke's secrecy, the affair was intrusted into so many hands, that the Genevois had repeated informations of a blow that was to be speedily struck against them; f but they disregarded all advice of that kind, and treated a man as a visionary for assuring them that their enemies were actually upon their march to attack them. The night between the 11th and 12th of December, was pitched upon for the execution; and Albigny, about six in the evening, put his troops in motion at La Roche, Bonne, and Bonneville.
In their march they endeavoured to secure all the peasants, lest any of them should carry intelligence to Geneva; but some of them escaping, endeavoured to alarm the guards, who continued to despise the information. Every thing was provided with the utmost precision, for the success of the undertaking, which was proposed to be performed by scalade. Brunaulieu, and some of the chief officers, had bound themselves in the most solemn manner, not to return alive if they were not successful. Petards were provided, g the ladders on which the scalade was to be performed were blackened, to prevent their being perceived, jointed, and fortified with iron, and accommodated with pulleys, for their more easy management, and three hundred resolute troops, who were to mount first, were

a were armed at all points with breast-plates, helmets, pistols, and cutlasses; some of them were furnished with great steel hammers, which served as hatchets at the same time, and pincers for pulling nails and bolts. They were to be supported by another party, armed with half-pikes and musquets. The duke himself came incognito post over the mountains to Tremblieres, within a mile of Geneva, that he might animate his men, who approached to the city without meeting with any considerable obstruction, though they were sometimes alarmed by their own fears and superstition. The main body was left at Plein Palais, a delightful walk in the suburbs of Geneva, while Brunaulieu, with the three hundred we have mentioned, advanced to the escalade. At first they were startled by springing a flock of wild ducks; but being provided with hurdles, they passed the ditch of the quarter called Corraterie, and raised three ladders against the wall, near the watch-tower of the Monoye-gate. The reader is to observe, that within the wall was a large void space, which was left unguarded, and which terminated in a gate towards the city, called Tartas, which generally stood open. Sonaz, the son of him who was killed at Monthoux, was amongst the first to mount the wall; but a stone happening to fall from it, knocked him down and stunned him. Albigny and one Alexander, a Scots Jesuit, stood at each side of the ladder, the first encouraging the assailants by the promise of booty, and the latter by the hope of heaven, and giving them, by way of talismans, slips of paper, inscribed with texts of scripture, for their preservation. Their exhortations were so effectual, that about one in the morning Sonaz, Attignac, and six others, had mounted the wall, and in an instant were followed by two hundred more. The first eight who mounted entered the gate of Tartas, walked through the streets unperceived, and found that every thing was quiet; while the rest concealed themselves in the void of the Corraterie, it having been agreed not to proceed to farther action till day-break, that they might the better know what they were about, and give the Spanish and Neapolitan auxiliaries, who were at some distance, time to come to their assistance. This precaution seems to have ruined their enterprize; while the duke was so confident of success, that he dispatched messengers through Savoy, Piedmont, and Dauphiny, with an account that he was master of Geneva, which was for some days believed.

Confidence of the duke of Savoy.

NOTWITHSTANDING all the precaution of the assailants, a centinel in the tower near the Monoye-gate, informed his corporal that he heard a noise; upon which the latter sent out a soldier with a lanthorn to reconnoitre, and he seeing some men approach, fired his piece, but was immediately knocked down; upon which the centinel on the tower fired his piece likewise, to alarm the main-guard, which consisted of no more than six men. This discovery did not disconcert Brunaulieu, who, by this time, had passed the walls likewise. He divided those who had got in into four parties; one was to seize the New Gate, one that of Tartas, another that of Monoye, and the fourth, the entrance to the town-house, till petards could be brought for blowing up the New Gate, so that the main army might enter in a body from Plein Palais. Thirteen men had been placed to guard the New Gate, which was then the chief one of the city; but they were no sooner attacked e by the Savoyards, than ten of them discharged their pieces, and ran to alarm the guards at the town-house, La Four, and the gate of Rive. They were so closely pursued, that it was with difficulty they could shut the gate of La Trielle behind them. The Savoyards upon this returned to the New Gate, where one of the three guards, who had hid himself upon the top of the tower, let down the port cullice, which prevented the petard from taking effect. In the mean while, all the quarter about the gate of Tartas, which was the only one now in possession of the Savoyards, was alarmed by a vigilant citizen. Part of the citizens were employed in barricadoing the streets, and part in endeavouring to retake the gate, where a sharp conflict began, and several were killed on both sides; but the assailants, at last, were obliged to return to the New Gate. It was still pitch dark; and f both parties in general using the same language, the confusion was prodigious, the Savoyards purposely calling out, as if they had been citizens, to march to the Rive, for the enemy was there. By this time they had forced open the gate of Monoye; but they found a barricade behind it, defended by citizens, who killed some of them, and obliged others to retire to the Corraterie, where they began to plunder the houses. The scaling-ladders all this time remained at the wall that joins the tower of Monoye, with a bastion called Oye, which last the Savoyards had not attempted; and one of its embrasures flanking the ladders, a Genevois gunner discharged a shot so happily, as to destroy or carry most part of them off. The troops that were waiting at Plein Palais mistook the noise of this shot for that of the petard, which was to have been their signal for advancing; and thinking that all was their own, ordered their drums to beat, and rather ran than marched towards the New Gate. Finding it shut, they hastened to the ditch of the Corraterie, where they thought their scaling-ladders were still standing. While they were in the ditch, the Genevois gunner made a second discharge upon their flank, from a cannon loaded with small small shot, while a resolute party of the citizens, attacking the Savoyards, who were still endeavouring to force open the New Gate, drove them into the open part of the Corraterie. Here every Genevois became a hero. A taylor performed wonders with a two handed sword; and a woman split the skull of one of the enemies officers. In short, while they were thus shut up in La Trielle, fifty-two of them were killed. Brunaulieu obstinately refused at first to retreat, and was killed. At last his party, imagining themselves still possessed of the sure means of escaping, retired to the wall where they had left their ladders; but finding none there, they were forced to throw themselves down, by which many were wounded, and some killed. By this time the citizens had found means to mount a battery of cannon upon the platform of La Trielle, which bore directly upon Plein Palais, and routed all the Savoyard army there. Albigny having no hopes of success, ordered a retreat, which his troops performed in great disorder to Bonne. When the duke of Savoy was informed by Albigny of the ill success of this enterprize, all he said was, "That he had made a fair flourish."

The Savoyards executed.

In this attempt the Genevois made thirteen prisoners, amongst whom were three of quality, Senas, Chaffardon, and Attignac; and being considered as no better than common robbers, all of them were hanged, and their heads, as well as those who had been killed in the enterprize, were placed on the walls of the city, by order of the council of sixty, the whole amounting to sixty-seven. This attempt cost the duke of Savoy two hundred of his best troops; but the Genevois had no more than thirteen killed and thirty wounded. Beza was now grown so old, that he had heard nothing of the tumult; but next day, after viewing the slain along the Corraterie, he mounted the pulpit, and preached a thanksgiving sermon, ordering the 124th psalm to be sung; a practice that has been kept up ever since in Geneva on that anniversary, which they still observe. The tranquility of the city being somewhat restored, there was the strongest reason for believing that the Savoyards had a correspondence with some men of note within the walls; and two syndics, who had disregarded the advices of the enemy's approaches, narrowly escaped being torn into pieces by the people, who were greatly divided about the choice of the succeeding syndics; but they at last fixed upon four who were unexceptionable.

Apology of the duke for his attempt.

THE Genevois having returned public thanksgivings for their deliverance, which they commemorated by inscriptions and other institutions, applied themselves to guard against the like surprizals for the future. They wrote letters to Bern and the other Protestant cantons of Switzerland, informing them of all that had happened; and they immediately sent twelve hundred men to their assistance. They wrote likewise, in the same strain, to the sieur de Guiché, governor of Lyons, imploring the French king's assistance, in case Albigny should renew his attempt upon their city, as they were apprehensive he would. This letter was laid before the French king, who, till he read it, had believed that Geneva was actually in the power of the Savoyards. Being undeceived, he wrote them a letter full of friendship and affection, promising them that if the duke of Savoy should again molest them, that he would not only send them assistance, but if it was necessary, that he would march in person to their relief. As to the duke of Savoy, all Europe reproached him for his insincerity and treachery towards the Genevois; but he made use of two kinds of apologies to justify his conduct. He excused it, at the Roman Catholic courts, from his zeal to introduce the true religion into Geneva; and he ordered the count de Tournon, his resident with the Swiss cantons, to apologize for it to the government of Bern, by pretending that the Genevois had refused to pay him his lawful tolls and customs, and had mal-treated his officers. The Bernois magistrates disregarded this apology so much, that they returned no answer to it; and had not the count and his secretary left Bern, they would have been insulted by the populace. It is said, that the pope himself disapproved of the duke's attempt; and the Genevois, in the manifestos they published upon the occasion, shrewdly observed, that a prince, who, like the duke of Savoy, had been guilty of perjury, gave but an indifferent specimen of his regard for religion. The duke, however, omitted no means to preserve the friendship of the Bernois, and the other Protestant cantons.

HE found this the more necessary, as he was so far from laying aside his designs against Geneva, that he straitened it by his garrisons on all quarters. But the Genevois being reinforced, not only by their Bernois auxiliaries, but by some troops from France, manned their walls so as to prevent all future surprizes, cut down their trees about their city to take away all shelter from their enemies, and in their turn invaded the dominions of Savoy, where they took St. Genis d'Aoste, and made incursions to the gates of Chambery itself, which they were very near taking.

- a THE French king Henry IV. was the real friend of the Genevois. Being sensible that they were unable to support themselves, he ordered de Vic, one of his ministers, to endeavour to bring them over to the thoughts of a peace ; but in so gentle a manner, that they could not perceive that he assumed the smallest superiority over their government. De Vic was received in Geneva with great marks of distinction ; but he found many of the leading men strongly disposed to continue the war with the duke of Savoy. De Vic, however, by a little management at first, brought them to conclude a truce, which was a kind of prelude of a negociation for a peace. This met with great difficulties ; for though the duke of Savoy wanted peace as much as the Genevois did, yet the pride of the court of Spain, which declared itself to be the duke's protector, would not suffer him to stoop to the terms of the Genevois. The negociation therefore was several times broken off and resumed ; but at last the count de Fuentes, the Spanish governor of Milan, sent one Sebastian Culebro to Geneva, where, obtaining admittance, he produced his credentials, by which it appeared, that his Catholic majesty was determined to declare war against the Genevois, unless they made peace with the duke of Savoy. The Genevois, elated by their late successes, were ready to have bid defiance to this menace ; but the French king interposed, and treated so effectually with the Genevois allies amongst the cantons, that a peace at last was concluded at St. Julien ; but more to the joy and satisfaction of the Savoyards, than of the Genevois. Both parties thus laying down their arms, they resumed their pens. The Savoyards were the aggressors, by publishing treatises tending to revive that duke's claim to the sovereignty of Geneva ; but they were answered by Sarrazin, by order of the Genevois magistrates.

The French king proposes a peace.
A. D. 1603.

- In the year 1604, a prosecution was commenced against Philibert Blondel, who had been one of the syndics when the Savoyards attempted to scale the walls of Geneva. Having amassed a fortune of forty thousand crowns, by means for which no body could account, the people suspected him to be a traitor, and in the pay of the duke of Savoy. At first he was tried upon a charge of misdemeanors ; and it was proved, that in the night of the scalade he had been remiss in his duty, for which he was fined two thousand crowns. He refused to submit to the sentence, and his effects were seized to make good the fine. He still stood on his justification, and fresh evidence coming out against him, he was fined three thousand crowns more. This additional censure was worse than death to Blondel, who was equally haughty, vindictive, and avaritious ; and he was resolved to die in prison rather than pay the money.

History of Blondel,

- A FRESH prosecution was commenced against him, and it was proved, that he held a correspondence with the duke of Savoy ; that he possessed an estate under him, for which he paid neither rent nor taxes ; that a lanthorn, with his mark on it, was found in the city ditch the day of the scalade, besides several other strong circumstances of treason. This drew upon him another fine of two thousand crowns, and he was sentenced to lie seven years in prison. All this severity was far from daunting Blondel ; and the principal evidence against him being a peasant, who used to manage his correspondence, he attempted to win him over by money ; but that failing, he found means to have him imprisoned ; and the fellow continuing to stand by his former evidence, Blondel suborned one of his jailors, who strangled him in prison ; but being apprehended and put to the rack, he laid all the blame upon Blondel. The latter, according to the detestable custom in Geneva, was put to the rack likewise. Though torments upon torments were multiplied upon him, nothing could be extorted from him, but that he was guilty of the murder, and of having offered his service to the duke of Savoy ; upon which he was hanged and quartered, and died as impenitent as he was unpitied. After his execution the magistrates fortified their city, so as to render it less liable to sudden attacks for the future.

- In the year 1605, died Theodore Beza, the successor of Calvin, in his functions as a minister of the reformation. His credit with the reformed was so great, that he was commonly called the pope of the Hugonots ; and his disposition was more amiable than that of Calvin. Soon after his death, an incident happened which threw the Genevois into vast perplexities.

perplexities. Henry IV. the French king, who had been their father and protector, sent the sieur de Ncrestan, to desire the Genevois to grant him a place for building a fort, or an arsenal, to secure their city against future surprizes. Such of the Genevois as had been accustomed to look upon the French as their friends and protectors, espoused this request; but the more considerate looked on it, if complied with, as a prelude to the loss of their liberties; and they very truly observed, that the future kings of France might not all of them possess the disinterested, virtuous, and noble sentiments of Henry IV. Not being willing, however, to shock their august benefactor with a flat refusal of his request, it was referred to the council of two hundred, and by them to the general council. Henry was generous enough to interpret those delays at once as a mark of respect for his person, and of their backwardness to comply with his request; and he ordered his ministers to press it no farther. He even, that very year, in June 1606, granted to the Genevois letters of naturalization, to free them from the Aubeine, and other taxes.

THE independency of Geneva became now so much the object of attention amongst the Protestant powers; that this year the landgrave of Hesse made the citizens a present of twelve thousand crowns, as the prince palatine did of three thousand, for building a bulwark near the lake; to defend and fortify the gate of Rive, which was accordingly completed; and the munificence of the two princes was commemorated by an inscription upon the work. The rest of this year, and the two next, were spent at Geneva in domestic and religious regulations. In the year 1609, one Carrai, the common serjeant of the city, was broken alive upon the wheel, for carrying on a correspondence with the court of Savoy, which he informed of all that passed at Geneva, and for other detestable crimes.

Conspiracy of Terrail and Bastide

A MORE dangerous conspiracy now broke out. A French gentleman, called Terrail, a man of courage and quality, having been guilty of murder, was obliged to fly France; and having spent some years in different armies, particularly in Flanders, he, together with one Bastide, another Frenchman, and an excellent engineer, in travelling through Italy came to the court of Savoy, where they were well received by that duke, who was no stranger to their characters and qualifications. After some conversation he acquainted them, that he was far from having dropt his designs against Geneva, and that he was willing to engage their assistance in making them successful; which they willingly agreeing to, his highness made both of them very generous presents; and Bastide was sent to Geneva, where he viewed all the new fortifications, and then returned to the duke. Both he and Terrail agreed, that it was practicable to surprise the city; and at last, Terrail's proposal was to make themselves masters of the gate leading to the lake, and that of La Rive, which could not be done without great difficulty, and their being thoroughly informed of the nature and situation of the place. For this purpose both of them passed over to Evian, where they had an opportunity of informing themselves by the boatmen, and other persons trading to Geneva, of the nature of the watch that was kept at the gates, and other particulars which they wanted to know. In a few days they returned to the duke; and it was agreed to prepare five large flat-bottomed boats, which should be laden with wood, piled up in such a manner as to conceal two hundred men in each boat; and it was proposed to defer the execution till the following May, during which time Terrail and Bastide were to repair to Flanders, to provide men on whom they could depend; for they proposed to have in readiness several bodies, both of horse and foot, in the neighbourhood of Geneva, to second their main enterprise.

THE indiscretion of the conspirators, before they left the duke of Savoy's court at Chambery, occasioned the discovery of their design. Terrail's valet overheard some suspicious expressions that passed between him and Bastide; and at the same time he discovered they were often consulting a draught of Geneva. He imparted his observations to his brother in that city; and by his means the magistrates, who had some dark intimations of it before, were put upon their guard. They informed themselves all they could concerning Terrail's person and intentions, and even privately procured his picture, which they sent copies of to such bailiffs and magistrates as they could trust, of those places through which they were informed he and Bastide were to pass. With some difficulty they were known, and arrested at Yverdon, a little town belonging to the Bernois; and though Terrail offered the soldier who knew him one thousand crowns to favour his escape, yet they were first imprisoned, and then put into the hands of one of the syndics, who carried them to Geneva. Bastide being put to the rack, confessed the whole, as did Terrail likewise; upon which the former was hanged, and the latter beheaded. Some doubts were held concerning the legality of those executions; but they were justified by the magistrates, who affirmed, that the sufferers had no right to any protection from the laws of nations, which they had forfeited, by entering into such a conspiracy in time of peace. Notwithstanding this apology, it would perhaps be hard to ascertain what degree of credit is due to a discovery that is extorted from the rack.

and the conspirators executed.

- a It is certain, that the jealousy which the Genevois entertained of their public liberty, hurried them sometimes into precipitate measures. An Italian, one Giovanni, accused one of the chief counsellors of corresponding with the duke of Savoy, who had his picture in his closet. The counsellor being brought to Giovanni, the latter candidly owned that he was not the person he expected to have seen. This acknowledgment, however, did not save him from being hanged for calumny and imposture. After his execution his information was discovered to be right, there being another person of the same name with the counsellor he had cleared, and who kept up a close correspondence with the duke. Upon this discovery the attorney-general wanted that a new process should commence against the real person; but the evidence being executed, the affair was dropt. Giovanni wrongfully executed.
- b THE Genevois sustained a great loss by the death of Henry IV. of France, who was no sooner assassinated than the duke of Savoy renewed his preparations against Geneva. But the preservation of that city became now the common cause of Protestantism itself. The reformed churches of France made large collections, which they remitted to the Genevois, to assist them in fortifying and defending their city. The queen-mother of France, who bore them no good will, complained of those remittances made by French subjects; but Anjorrand, the Genevois deputy at the court of France, proved to her majesty, that the late king, by the treaty of Saleurre, had permitted his Protestant subjects to assist the Genevois with their persons and estates. His reasons being accepted of, monf. de Soubize, of the house of Roban, and monf. de Bethune, nephew to the duke of Sully, with other leaders of the French Hugonots, repaired to Geneva, which they fortified as completely as the nature of its situation could admit of, particularly the gate of Rive, the weakness of which had often endangered the city. It was about this time that a new conspiracy was formed by one of the Genevois officers, for putting St. Anthony's bulwark into the hands of the Savoyards; but the treason being overheard by a French Protestant, the traitor was seized and executed. Those precautions, however, had so much effect, that they discouraged all the attempts of the Savoyards; and the French auxiliaries of the Genevois were permitted to return home, Geneva being then thought to be out of the reach of danger. For some years after this, nothing remarkable occurs in the history of Geneva, but natural or accidental events; such as fires, famine, plagues, and pestilence. The most severe plague happened in the year 1615; when about four thousand Genevois died of it, most of them of the meaner kind of people. Death of Henry IV.
- d DURING this public calamity, the duke of Savoy was remarkably attentive in assisting and relieving the Genevois; and his conduct was such as gave them no kind of room for believing that he had any design upon their state. In the difference that happened between him and the duke of Nemours, who was supported by the Spaniards, the Genevois took part with the duke of Savoy, and sent him considerable supplies of troops, as well as arms and ammunition. Not contented with this, the magistrates (though by the treaty of St. Julien they might have refused it) gave him leave to quarter his troops along the banks of the Rhone, in the neighbourhood of their city; and the Genevois were so fond of serving under him, that many of them offered to act as volunteers in his army, till the government began to grow apprehensive that their city would be too much weakened. The truth is, the duke of Savoy, at this time, had more reason to dread the Spaniards than the Protestants, and therefore he made an alliance with the Bernois, who sent three thousand men to his assistance, while he in return renounced all his claim upon the county of Vaud. The Genevois favour the duke of Savoy.
- e THE Genevois, by the perpetual resort of French Protestants to their city, had now acquired several useful manufactures; but their historian hints, as if they had been greatly discouraged by their magistrates, which obliged some of the chief manufacturers to remove to Yverdun, where they carried on their trades, to the great prejudice of Geneva. The marquis of Lans was then governor of Savoy, and he endeavoured to debauch one Chenalat, a Genevois of great figure, who undertook to undermine a house near St. Leger's gate, so as to give admittance to the marquis's troops. This plot was discovered by the relations of Chenalat, who received five hundred pistoles in hand, with a promise of twelve thousand crowns more; upon which he was arrested, tried, and executed, though he denied to the last his having any other design than that of extorting money from the marquis. Next year the Genevois sent two of their professors of divinity, John Diodati and Theodore Trochin, to assist as their deputies at the synod of Dort; and upon their return to Geneva, each was presented by the states with a medal. In the year 1621, the Genevois were alarmed by the vast warlike preparations made by the duke of Savoy. D'Alincourt, the French governor of Lyons, sent an account of them to his court, who ordered him to give the most early intelligence, if any attempt should be made against Geneva; and in the mean while that city received additional fortifications from Motet, an engineer sent them by the prince of Orange, and a French gentleman of the name of Ferrault. Next year a national synod of the Protestant churches being held at Paris, and the Genevois being extremely willing to conform in all Treason of Chenalat.
Synod of Dort.

all respects to the French reformed, their pastors wrote a letter to the assembly, to acquaint them that they were willing to abolish all the unimportant points of practice that still subsisted between them and their French brethren; and Trochin their minister, by order of the council and consistory, informed the people from the pulpit of the reasons for this compliance, with which they appeared to be satisfied. a Difference

with Savoy.

IN the year 1624, the duke of Savoy pretending there was a scarcity of corn in his own dominions, prohibited his subjects to transport any grain to Geneva. The Genevois considered this prohibition as an infringement of the treaty of St. Julien, and on their part prohibited the carrying out of iron, salt, and other commodities into Savoy. Wake, the English ambassador to the duke of Savoy, happening at that time to pass through Geneva, made up this difference, when it was likely to proceed to an open breach, by persuading the duke to take off his prohibition. b

Jealousy of the Calvinists.

NOTWITHSTANDING the late conformity between the Genevois and the French Protestants in matters of religion, it is certain that the former still retained a strong aversion to the Lutherans. The marquis of Bade, a German Lutheran prince, being obliged, on account of his religion, to leave his own country, retired to Geneva, where he lived with a Lutheran minister in his family, who was, by the council, indulged in the exercise of his religion within his house. The other Lutheran Germans in Geneva hearing of this, resorted in such numbers to the marquis's house, that the Genevois taking the alarm, complained to their magistrates, and said they made no doubt of soon seeing the mass read in their city, after such indulgence being extended to the Lutherans. This ridiculous affair became at last so serious, that it was laid before the council of twenty-five, who ordered a syndic and the lieutenant to repair to the marquis, and entreat him not to suffer his house to be open to the citizens in time of worship. The marquis more mindful of his past, than his present, situation, and proud of his high quality, far from taking this message in good part, lifted his hand to strike the syndic, and insisted that, being a prince, and Geneva a city of the empire, he had as much authority as their magistrates had in that city. This boisterous behaviour being reported to the council, the permission that had been granted him was withdrawn, and the marquis in a rage left Geneva, and retired to Tonon, belonging to the duke of Savoy, where he met with that indulgence under a bigoted Roman Catholic prince, which had been denied him in a Protestant city. c

Refugees in Geneva.

NEXT year another illustrious exile took refuge in Geneva; his name was George Erasmus of Tzernembel, an hereditary baron of the marches of Sclavonia and Carniola, who had been formerly counsellor to the emperors Rodolph II. and Matthias I. and one of the directors of Bohemia. This nobleman having embraced the party of the unfortunate elector palatine, in his attempt upon the crown of Bohemia, was, upon that prince's defeat, obliged to fly with his wife and daughter to Geneva, oppressed with age, infirmities, and indigence. He had left his son to collect together the shattered remains of his fortune; but soon after his arrival, he heard of his being drowned, and that all he had in the world had perished in the wreck. Upon this, the magistrates and church of Geneva gave him a monthly support, which, upon his death, they continued to his family, and buried him suitable to his quality in St. Peter's cloister. d

ABOUT the same time, the Spaniards having made themselves masters of Portugal, Emilia of Nassau, princess of Orange, sister to prince Maurice, and widow to Don Emanuel, son of Anthony king of Portugal, came to Geneva with her six daughters, who were married to private gentlemen in the county of Vaud. While she dwelt there, she made a figure no way corresponding with her birth and quality; and at last she retired to an estate which she purchased near Nyons. When she died she was buried in St. Peter's church at Geneva. About the same time the sieur d'Aubigne, who is famous for the history he published, his courage, his military talents, and above all for his zeal in the cause of the reformation, fell into the displeasure of the French king. His son had been perverted by the Jesuits, and was no friend to his father, who, hearing that a warrant was out to apprehend him, concealed all his ready money, amounting to about thirty thousand ducats, in the saddles of his horses, and fled to Geneva, where he was, on many accounts, a welcome guest. Being eminently skilled in military architecture, he superintended all the fortifications which were raised for the defence of the city while he lived in it; and being eighty years of age at the time of his death, he was buried in St. Peter's cloister, where his tomb is to be seen, with an excellent Latin inscription on it composed by himself. f

NOTHING material happened at Geneva till the invasion of Germany, by Gustavus Adolphus king of Sweden, who dispatched Racbe, one of his ministers, to engage the Protestant cantons of Switzerland in his interest, and to assure the Genevois of the great regard he had for their state and city. The progress and fate of that great prince have been mentioned in other parts of this work. His ambassador resided for some time at Geneva, where he was received with all the honours that were due to the greatness of his master, and his own merit. g a mark. But though Geneva, at this time, was crouded with sufferers for the cause of religion, and though the principles of the reformation ought to have led its magistrates to detest all persecutions for the sake of religion; especially capital ones, yet a case of that kind happened in the year 1632 that made a great noise.

b NICHOLAS ANTOINE, or Anthony, a native of Berry in Lorraine, had, for about seven or eight years, inclined to Judaism; and had not only endeavoured to persuade his family, who seem to have been originally Jews, to return to that religion; but had applied himself to the Jews of the city of Metz, to be received into their number; and they referred him to those of Venice. In his journey thither, he had found means to make a convert of a young student of Sedan, whom he carried with him to Italy. Being arrived at Venice, the Jews of that city, either from prudential reasons, or, which is still more probable, because they saw Antoine's brain a little touched, gave him very little encouragement, and referred him to the Jews of Padua; and both of them were of opinion that he ought not to insist, as he did, upon being circumcised, as it might bring them under the lash of the civil government, and that the best thing he could do was to dissemble, because he might live amongst the Christians, and yet be a Jew in his heart. Antoine appeared satisfied with this advice, and returned to Geneva, where he applied to the study of divinity and philosophy, in which he distinguished himself to great advantage in the public disputations. In a short time he came to be chief regent of the college, and afterwards to be the minister of a church near the city. Thus far goes the narrative part of his process.

*History and condemnation

c THE criminal part of it charged him with having taken an oath to live and teach according to the profession of the reformed churches, and yet to have lived and prayed after the Jewish manner, not daring to make an open profession of his belief. "That instead of preaching Jesus Christ, according to the oath he had taken, he had only insisted in his pulpit on the explication of the Old Testament, and falsly wrested and applied passages thereof pointing to our Saviour, and appropriated them to other persons, and above all in his last sermon; from whence it followed, by the just judgment of God, that he the said Anthony became deprived of his senses, and ran about the field like a distracted person, and came bare-legged into the city, uttering horrid blasphemies against our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: that, after he had been under the hands of physicians, and carefully looked after d in the hospital of this city, coming again to his senses, and being out of his mad fits, he had persisted in his blasphemies against the Holy Trinity, and the person of our blessed God and Saviour, maintaining, as well by word of mouth as writing, that Jesus Christ was an idol, and that the New Testament was but a mere fable. He hath confessed, that in administering the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, in the exhortation to the people, he said only, Remember your Saviour: and that, in reciting the words of the Apostle's Creed, where our Saviour is mentioned, he pronounced not those words, but muttered them betwixt his teeth^a." He lastly was charged with obstinately persevering in his opinions and blasphemies, with having renounced his baptism, writing a treatise against the Holy Trinity, and the like crimes.

e WE shall not presume to form any conjectures on the nature of the evidence which proved those allegations; but admitting it to be ever so strong, the record of the process itself seems to leave no room to doubt that the criminal was insane. The sentence of the syndics and council of the city against him, says, "That he, forgetting the fear of God, hath been guilty of the crime of apostacy and high treason against God his creator and saviour, having fought against the Holy Trinity, denied our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, blasphemed his holy name, renounced his baptism, to embrace the Jewish religion; and hath been perjured in dogmatizing and teaching his damnable doctrine; a case and a crime deserving the greatest punishment. For these and other causes moving the said lords, sitting in the tribunal of their ancestors, according to ancient custom, having the fear of God and f the Holy Scriptures before their eyes, and having invoked his holy name, that they might thereby be able to make a right judgment, beginning, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, do, by this final sentence, which they have committed now to writing, condemn the said Anthony to be bound and led to the place of Plein-Palais, to be there fastened to a stake on a pile of wood, and strangled, according to the usual manner, and afterwards to have his body burnt and consumed to ashes, and thus to end his days for an example to others; declaring, moreover, his goods confiscated to the city, and charging the lord-lieutenant to put the said sentence into due and entire execution^b." This sentence was accordingly executed.

g CARDINAL Richlieu was then first minister of France; and he so far abandoned the politics of Henry IV. that he entered into a treaty with the duke of Savoy, to whom he offered to relinquish the protection of Geneva, and to put him in possession of it at the expence of France, if the other would give up Nice by way of exchange ; but many reasons dissuaded the duke from an exchange, which must have given to the French the only sea-port he had, and a ready admittance, at any time, into his dominions. Thus the Genevois once more escaped being slaves under the house of Savoy.

Duke of Ro-
han's death.

ONE of the greatest honours that Geneva has to boast of is, that the great duke of Rohan before his death, chose it for the place of his retreat. This gave so much umbrage to the cardinal, that he persuaded his master to desire the duke to reside at Venice. The duke excused himself from obeying this order, because the passes were all shut up ; but to prove that he had no such intention as the cardinal suspected, he took the command of the duke de Weimar's army, and fought the battle of Rhinfeld against the imperialists ; and there, though he got the victory, he lost his life, for he died soon after of the wounds he received, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. This great man, before his death, ordered his body to be interred at Geneva, where a magnificent marble tomb, with an elegant Latin inscription, was erected for him by his duchess, daughter to the duke of Savoy. The duke, during his residence at Geneva, had been a great benefactor to the city, and adorned Plein-Palais with a magnificent walk. His son Tancred was, a few years after, buried in the same tomb ; but the duke's daughter having obtained a decree of the parliament of Paris, declaring him illegitimate, the inscription relating to him was erased.

Genevois renew their alliance.

ALL this while the Genevois and the cantons of Zurich and Bern lived in the utmost harmony together ; and in the year 1638 they agreed, that they should, from time to time, formally renew their alliance. In the year 1642, it was the turn of the Genevois to entertain the Swiss deputies, who arrived in their city on that occasion, where they were received by all the citizens, under arms, and a profusion of public honours. The next remarkable incident in the history of Geneva, happened on the 19th of January, 1645, when a prodigious wind drove back the waters of the Rhone and the lake in such a manner, that people could pass on foot from the gate Monoye to the isle. This wind was so violent, that it did prodigious damage to the inhabitants, by carrying away house-tops, blowing down chimnies, and plucking trees up by the roots. This year the suburbs of St. Gervais were fortified by a bulwark, and adorned with an inscription, composed by Jacobus Gotofredus, which some have admired, notwithstanding its puerile antitheses. This Gotofred was, however, a man of learning ; and having been syndic five times, he made great collections of materials relating to Geneva, from which Spon composed great part of his history. He died in the year 1652. Diodate, who had been sent to the synod of Dort, died before him. He was famous for translating father Paul's history of the council of Trent, and for having been chosen professor of Hebrew in Geneva, when he was but nineteen years of age : he was likewise professor of divinity there ; and was so much esteemed in the synod of Dort, that he was one of the six who drew up its canons ; he was seventy-three years of age at the time of his death. In the year 1651, the overflowing of the Arve was so great, that it swept away most of the bridges ; and in December there was an earthquake, but without any fatal consequences. In the year 1653, some of the subjects of Bern, in its German territory, rebelled against the magistrates of that city, under one Leuberg, and made such a progress, that they actually blocked it up, and reduced it to great danger. In this extremity the Bernois applied for assistance to the Genevois, who sent them three companies of one hundred men each, under the captains Debons, Corne, and Dumont. This assistance came so seasonably, that the insurgents were defeated, Leuberg was quartered, and many of the ring-leaders were hanged. The same year one Gautier was, at the suit of the republic of Venice, arrested and executed at Geneva, for having murdered a Spanish family, and pillaged the vessel that was carrying them to their own country.

Cromwell
writes to the Genevois.

ALL this while the Genevois seem to have enjoyed a happy tranquility, notwithstanding the inhuman persecutions of the duke of Savoy's Protestant subjects in the vallies of Piedmont. While those persecutions were raging, Cromwell, who was then protector of England, to raise his character with his own party, wrote a Latin letter to the magistrates of Geneva, dated June 7, 1655, from his palace at Westminster, in which he told them, " That the extreme miseries to which the duke of Savoy had reduced the Protestants, in the vallies of Piedmont, had so far moved him with compassion, that he had ordered collections to be made throughout all England, that he might give proofs of the great charity of that nation towards the afflicted brethren. And forasmuch as these collections required some time, and the necessities of these poor people admitted no delay, he hath therefore judged it meet to send, in the mean while, the sum of two thousand pounds sterling out of his own treasury, which sum he ordered to be paid into the hands of the officers of Geneva, to distribute it to them who had most need, according to their prudence, supposing they would readily ac-

a cept this trouble in their neighbours behalf, as in whose miseries he believed they had a fellow-feeling, beseeching God to strengthen all those who profess the orthodox religion, that they may maintain their common cause, and assist one another against their enemies, in which service he shall be glad to be employed." Cromwell afterwards sent Morland, one of his ministers, to do all the service he could to those poor Protestants; and on that occasion he passed several months at Geneva, where the inhabitants conceived a high opinion of Cromwell's power and zeal for the Protestant religion.

Next year the cantons, who professed the Roman Catholic religion, had a war with those of Zurich and Bern, who insisted upon the inhabitants of certain independent, or as they are called, individual bailiwicks, enjoying the exercise of the Protestant religion. Geneva sent their allies another body of three hundred men, under the command of the captains Debous, Girard, and Fabry, who assisted at the siege of Rapperswil; and a peace being concluded, the Genevois auxiliaries returned home. Next year the Genevois began to fortify the mount of St. Victor, before the bastions of Pin and St. Anthony; but though at first the inhabitants of all ranks, females as well as males, worked incessantly upon the fortifications, yet it was found that they were either too extensive to be completed, or, if completed to be manned, upon which account the work was discontinued. It was about this time that the French king came to Lyons, and the Genevois laid hold of that opportunity to congratulate him upon his recovery from a late sickness, and to entreat him for the continuance of his favour and protection to their city. The sieurs Voy sine and Pictet, were chosen to execute this commission. They had a most obliging answer, and assurance of farther protection from his most Christian majesty, who had presented each of them, at the same time, with a gold chain and a medal, and they in return made him the usual presents of their city, which consisted of trouts taken in their lake, weighing forty or fifty pounds each. Next year the Genevois, who daily saw cogent reasons for being on their guard, again applied themselves to the fortifications of their city. They first carried on a work in the form of a half moon, in the same place where they had left off before; and, in digging, many urns and medals were found, which proved the antiquity of the city of Geneva. Perceiving there was a necessity for farther fortifications, that their city might gradually receive all the strength its situation could admit of, and being sensible, at the same time, that their own finances were very unequal to the expence of such works, they sent the famous sieur Turretin, their professor of divinity, into Holland, that he might procure money from their friends there; and the states were so generous, that public collections were made all over their dominions, by which one hundred thousand franks were raised, and Turretin carried them to Geneva. This sum enabled the Genevois to resume their works, and the Dutch money served to build the first bastion near the Rhone, which is called the Dutch bastion; and an inscription, engraved on a marble pillar, is erected, to commemorate the gratitude of the city, for the assistance it received from the states-general. Ivoy, an engineer, who afterwards was in the service of the prince of Orange, had attended Turretin into Holland, and had drawn the plan of four great bastions royal, with courtines, on the side of Plein-Palais, inclosing them from the Rhone to the bulwark of St. Leger; this plan takes up no less than seventeen hundred paces in compass, and was inclosed and finished in ten years.

The bishop of Geneva, though deprived of all jurisdiction, spiritual as well as temporal, within that city, still resided at Anecy, and exercised his authority over all those places which formerly belonged to his bishopric, and were not immediately possessed by the Genevois, who considered all the lands that had belonged to the canons of St. Peter and the abbey of St. Victor, as their own property. By the treaty of Lyons, in the year 1601, when Henry IV. exchanged the marquisate of Saluces for the country of Gex, he reserved to himself all the ports of the Rhone, from Geneva as far as Lyons. By this reservation, the sovereignty of Chansy and Avouilly, situated on the Rhone, and belonging formerly to the abbey of St. Victor, became his, as did the village of Moin, which had belonged to the chapter of St. Peter; while the property of all the three remained with the Genevois.

The Genevois had foreseen that this reservation might some day or other bring them into a good deal of trouble, and laying their apprehensions before Henry IV. he shewed himself, as he did on all occasions, so much their friend, that he ordered matters to be expedited; by which he remitted this sovereignty, which was indeed but an empty title, to the Genevois, as he had no title to the property. It happened, either by design or accident, that those letters never had been registered in parliament; and, in the year 1661, the bishop of Geneva, taking advantage of the omission, applied to the French court for leave to settle curates in those villages, which he said lay within his diocese, though subject to the crown of France. His plea was so plausible, that before John Lullin, who had been appointed agent for Geneva to oppose him, could reach the French court, the bishop had obtained a decree in his favour; and Bouchu, the intendant of Burgundy, came to Gex in February 1662, to see the same carried into execution. When Bouchu arrived at Gex, he understood that that the Genevois were then actually soliciting the court of France to have the decree suspended; upon which he deferred the execution of his commission. In the mean while, Lullin was so active with the French ministry, that, after an attendance of two years, he carried his point. The bishop was disappointed, and the villages remained on their former footing.

Danger of Geneva from the duke of Savoy.

THIS favour done the Genevois in so important a matter, made them take all opportunities of doing honour to the French; and when the duke of Crequi, in the year 1664, passed through Geneva, on his return from his embassy at Rome, they omitted no mark of respect or magnificence, that could testify their regard for his most Christian majesty; and indeed it must be admitted, that Geneva, more than once, owed her freedom and independency to the protection of France. Every day produced new disputes and quarrels between the Genevois and the officers of the duke of Savoy, who were instructed for that purpose; and those differences gave him a pretence for saying, that as the treaty of St. Julien had been so often violated, it was not binding to either party. He stood, however, too much in fear of France, directly to violate that treaty, till such time as he could be in a condition to make himself master of Geneva. With this view, in the spring of 1667, the militia of Savoy, and a body of horse, called the Savoy regiment, consisting of five hundred gentlemen, had orders to be in readiness to take the field at an hour's warning; and a body of regulars, under the command of the marquis of Pianezze, were quartered at Anecy, Remilly, Salanche, Cluse, Tonon, Evian, and other places about Geneva. As all those towns were above four leagues (the distance prescribed by the treaty of St. Julien) distant from Geneva, the inhabitants had no right to complain, though they saw plainly by the dispositions that were making, that the duke was meditating a blow against their city.¹ They were confirmed in this, when they understood that the duke had furnished all the militia, who were before a naked defenceless people, with arms, ammunition, and military stores of all kinds, and had ordered them to be exercised every week. To preserve a communication between those forces and Geneva, a stone bridge was erected over the Arve at Tremblieres, not above an hour's sail distant from that city. But the most formidable part of his preparations consisted in those he was making on the lake, where by the assistance of seamen and workmen sent from Nice, he built three flat-bottomed boats, in a kind of a dock which he had made at Bellerive, a delightful village, lying upon the lake, in the neighbourhood of Geneva, and which he gave orders for securing with a chain and palisades, besides a fort that was flanked with two bastions. The Genevois complained, that the erecting this fort was an infraction of the treaty of St. Julien, because it was within four leagues of their city. The Savoyards, who had on this occasion brought over some of the Swiss cantons to their side, pleaded that the building at Bellerive was not a fort, because it had no ditches round it, and that it was intended only as a storehouse for their salt; as to the bridge at Tremblieres, they pretended that it was built to avoid the water-carriage of that commodity through Geneva, which they found dangerous and inconvenient, and that they intended to transport their salt in waggon by land to Bellerive, from whence the flat-bottomed boats they had built there, were to convey it to the Chablais, Valois, Fribourg, and other cantons, which used to be furnished by the Savoyards with salt.

A. D. 1667.
Precautions of the Genevois in guarding their city.

THOSE plausible pretexts did not amuse the Genevois; they had undoubted intelligence that the duke had an intention to make another attempt upon their city, both by land and water, and that he must succeed, if they did not prepare against the worst; they likewise more than suspected, that his royal highness (for so the dukes of Savoy were now called) had correspondents in the city, and that he would attempt to surprise, rather than besiege them. The measures they took to disappoint him, shewed wonderful precaution and sagacity. Their garrison was strengthened by an addition of ten men to each company, and thirty draughted from the usual guard of citizens, who were relieved once in twenty-four hours by a like number. The grand rounds set forth every quarter of an hour, besides the usual watch, four beades and two fort majors; so that the centinels could not sleep upon their posts; the out-watches at the same time were reinforced, and some were placed in boats upon the lake. The gates were furnished with new portcullises, bars, and pallisades, and other engines, both of offence and defence. All the hedges and trees within musquet-shot of the city were cut down, especially those towards the gates of Rive, that none might approach it unperceived. A private watch was instituted at the same time, by the council of two hundred, who had it in charge to search all strangers. The centinels were every where doubled, and they who stood at the draw bridge were furnished with coats of mail to prevent their being stabbed. Chains were drawn across the lake, which were guarded by citizens, and no boat was suffered to pass without a signal from those appointed to search it, that there was no danger. Other guards were appointed, to pierce and examine all the hay-carts and heavy carriages that came into the city.

- a THE Genevois, on this alarming occasion, excused no citizen residing there, who was able to bear arms, from acting as a soldier. The arms of every house-keeper were diligently examined, and they were obliged to furnish themselves according to their abilities with musquets, swords, powder, bullets, and all kinds of provisions. No inhabitant was to appear without a sword by his side; and all merchants and tradesmen were to have their arms lying on their counters in their shops, that they might be ready at a moment's warning. All the ordinary horses of the city were mustered, and two hundred of the richest citizens were obliged to keep each of them an able horse extraordinary. Those horses were commanded by Nodé Balthazar; and a great number of French, whom the inhabitants could depend on, offered their service in defence of the city. To procure intelligence of the enemies designs, a secret committee of seven persons was instituted; their business was to send spies into the enemies country, that they might learn their motions, and to take cognizance of all affairs, but those that were of so great importance as to require being laid before the general council.
- b

- THE precautions of the Genevois did not even end there; they sent for aid to their allies of Bern and Zurich, who raised a considerable body of troops for their assistance; and to render them as little burdensome as possible to the Genevois, they were quartered in the cities and boroughs upon the lake, so as to be ready at an appointed signal. For the greater dispatch, the Genevois built a large galley, and the Bernois built two others, one of them carrying fourteen, and the other ten guns, and each capable of carrying two hundred men.
- c All this while, the fortifications of the city were receiving new works. The heads of the corporations of merchants, artists, and other professions, spared no expence for that purpose; and the professors of divinity, with their scholars, went round with four drums before them, and not only worked in their own persons, but hired workmen according to their abilities, some ten, and some twenty; nay, a rich Dutch merchant, who happened to be then at Geneva, brought along with him two hundred workmen, whom he paid.

- THE ardour of the Genevois at this time to come to action with the Savoyards, was wonderful, and many seemed to be sensibly mortified that they had no opportunity of shewing their courage by the duke declaring war. This was the more to be expected, as he had kept on foot upon the confines of Savoy a large body of troops ready for action, at an expence that was but ill suited with the state of his finances, for above nine months. But his royal highness was no stranger to the preparations that were making to receive him, and therefore chose to lose all his preparations rather than make an attempt, which he thought could end only in increasing and exasperating his enemies.

- WHILE those warlike preparations were carrying on, the communication between Geneva and the duke of Savoy's dominions was still kept open; and a difference fell out, which was prosecuted in another manner than by arms. In March, this year, the curates of Megny and Choulex, two places belonging to the duke of Savoy, administered the sacrament to a sick person at Coursinge, a village belonging to that duke, all but the house where the sick man lay, which was under the jurisdiction of the Genevois lordship of Jussy. The matter in itself was inconsiderable, but it happened at so critical a time, that both parties had their reasons for rendering it important. The Genevois government ordered Colladon, their first syndic, to inquire into the matter; and taking some examinations on the spot, he ordered the two curates to appear before him by a certain day. This was at best but a capitious kind of proceeding; and the senate, as it is called, of Chambery, not only cited Colladon to appear before them, but published a declaration against him by beat of drum, and even ordered him to be apprehended and brought to trial. This extraordinary proceeding induced the Genevois council to send Liffort, another syndic, to make their complaints to the president La Perouse, who then commanded in Savoy, and to lay before him their evidences of that particular house being within their dominions; but the president would neither give them admittance, nor hear their reasons. The Genevois then carried the matter before the Swiss cantons, not so much because the latter had any jurisdiction in it, but that they might clear their own conduct; which the Savoyard ambassador to the same cantons, endeavoured to impeach and blacken. As the Genevois perhaps did not find that their conduct had been very defensible they deputed, towards the end of the year, Andrew Pilet and John Dupan, to attend his royal highness in person at Turin, and to make an end of the difference. The duke received the deputies very obligingly, but remitted the matter to the president and other commissioners, who used so many trifling delays, that the deputies spent three months at Turin to no purpose. At last the French king sent a letter by Lionne, one of his ministers, to the magistrates of Geneva, desiring the Genevois, for the sake of peace, to drop their pretensions upon the house; and this request being seconded by Servient, the French ambassador at Turin, they complied.

WHILE this affair was in dependence, and even before the Savoyard forces had retired from the neighbourhood of Geneva, an affair happened, which was so little to the credit of the moderation of the parties concerned, that they expunged the transaction out of their records, as an atonement for their imprudence. All we know of it from Spon is, that during the absence of the syndics, the auditor, John Sarrazin, presided, December 7th, in their place, over both the council of two hundred, and that of twenty-five. The latter council repented this; and thus the government was split into two factions: that of the council of two hundred, which was backed by the citizens, as that of the council of twenty-five was by the garrison and soldiers, by whose assistance Sarrazin was arrested and thrown into prison. The council of two hundred complained, that he suffered for no other crime, but because he had presided in their assembly; and they convened the people in St. Mary's church, that they might rescue him by force; the lesser, on the other hand, drew out the garrison, and both parties were ready to come to blows, when the matter was compromised, though we know not how; the prisoner was discharged, and the city restored to quiet.

Diffensions

THE next remarkable incident that occurs in the history of Geneva, was a most dreadful fire, that happened in the night time of the 27th of January, 1670, amongst the houses on and near the bridge over the Rhone, and which threatened the destruction of the whole city. The houses being built of timber were consumed in two hours time, and one hundred and twenty persons perished in the flames. Many threw themselves into the Rhone; but at last the conflagration was stopped from spreading by the towers of Monoye and the isle, but not till it had done so much damage, that the channel of the Rhone between the isle and the city, though two hundred and sixty feet broad, was filled and dried up by the ruins of the houses. Liberal collections were made by the people of Geneva, who raised six thousand crowns; and likewise by their allies of Bern.

NEXT year the prince elector palatine paid a visit to Geneva, where he resided four months; during which time nothing was wanting that could contribute to his entertainment. Amongst other diversions, one ought not to be forgot. Their largest galley was fitted out and manned by the young Genevois; and the prince, with part of the council, received on board of it. After the company had diverted themselves with fishing upon that delightful lake, they landed at the castle of Kosette, where a splendid feast was served up; during which the prince was waited on by the young Genevois of the greatest distinction, as the lords of the council were by the prince's attendants. After dinner the prince and his company landed, and walked on the side of the lake under a general discharge of artillery, answered by drums and trumpets from thirty boats that attended the galley. During this excess of joy, the Genevois magistrates had, for the diversion of the prince, contrived the matter so, that when the smoke of the cannon blew away, all of a sudden a frigate appeared with an Algerine flag on her main top, and manned with fifty pretended Moors, and attacked the great gally. Upon this a sea-fight ensued, in which the Algerines were defeated, and were led prisoners in triumph to Geneva by the prince, who at night entered that city under another general discharge of all the cannons on its ramparts. Soon after he fell sick, and public prayers were put up for his recovery, through all the churches of Geneva. His health being re-established, he set out for Grenoble, the citizens and garrison being in arms, and lining the way for him as he proceeded, the council attending him in a body till he left their territory.

A new plot

IN September 1673, the chief syndic found at his house (on his return from church) a letter, which a person unknown had left in his absence; the contents whereof were, "That, upon a proviso of a proportionable reward, he would make such a considerable discovery, that the public safety depended on it; and if they desired to speak with this person next morning about it, the superior of the convent of the capuchins of Gex would inform them where he was; but if they neglected this advertisement, they might be certain of finding the city, in a short time, reduced to the greatest extremity." This letter being laid before the council, the president Dunant was sent by them next morning to Gex, where he had an interview with the writer, who, after some conversation had passed between them, appeared to be the contriver, as well as the discoverer of the design; which Dunant understood was for a new attempt on the city, and had been communicated to the duke of Savoy, who had affronted the discoverer, which was the reason why he was willing to reveal it to the Genevois government; but he insisted upon being rewarded for his discovery with a sum equal to one thousand pounds sterling, and to have a place assigned him where he could live in safety. Dunant acquainted him, that he had no power to treat with him upon such conditions, and that his best course would be to repair to Geneva, where he could treat with the magistrates themselves. The other then desired a letter of safe-conduct; but Dunant told him, that no such was ever granted by the magistrates of Geneva; but that he was authorized to engage the public faith, that he might

a come into the city on the same security that others had done before him. The man was contented with this very ambiguous security, and next day presented himself before the magistrates of Geneva, informing them, that his name was John Baptiste Noroy, of Noroy, in Burgundy; that he had found out an easy way by which he could surprise Geneva; that he had gone to Piedmont, where he had communicated the same to the duke of Savoy some months before; and that, after having a private conference with him at Rivoles, the duke told him, that he thought the undertaking was too hazardous; that he had a score of pensioners in Geneva; that some of them even sat in the council, and that the juncture was very improper for entering into a war. He thanked him, however, for his discovery, and gave him ten pieces of gold by way of reward. To confirm all he said, he b produced letters under the hand of the duke of Savoy's secretary, and other noblemen of that court.

Upon farther examination it appeared, that Noroy's scheme was to have introduced, without suspicion, four or five hundred men, all of them unarmed, into Geneva, where they were to be lodged in private houses, and have arms delivered them, and lie hid till the day of the execution of their enterprize, which was to be in sermon-time, about eight of the clock. All those people, who were hid, coming out with their arms, were to divide themselves into several parties, three of which, consisting of about eighty men a-piece, should speedily seize on all the doors of the three churches, and not only hinder the people from coming out, but in the fright would constrain them to get up upon the top of the c churches, and by this means there would be no place needing a guard, but only the steeple stairs; another company should scour the streets, and kill the citizens, who being not at church would come out of their houses to rally themselves; the rest were to set upon a certain gate of the city, which being not succoured by any citizens, might be easily won; which being done, there should be let in forces, who were to march all night, that they might be at the gates at the hour of this execution. Upon farther examination, he gave two reasons for making the discovery; the first was the slight put upon him by the small reward he had from the duke; and the second was, his having been refused the government of Geneva when it should be taken, and his being scoffed at for making the demand.

The plotter discovered.

b ALL those discoveries were made only to the council of twenty-five. Noroy was pressed by them to name the duke of Savoy's pensioners in Geneva. He declared, that he was totally ignorant both of their names and persons, and very sensibly added, that considering the manner in which the duke treated him, it could not be supposed, that he would be let into a secret of such importance. His answers and discoveries perplexed the council so greatly, that they sent him to prison, and laid the whole affair before the council of two hundred. Their opinions were greatly divided; some imagined, that Noroy was no better than a firebrand, to sow divisions amongst the citizens; some voted, that he should be put to the rack to force him to discover the traitors, and some that he should be put to death; while a few were of opinion, that the public faith being engaged for e his safety, he ought to be set at liberty. This opinion, though the most agreeable to justice, was opposed by others, who observed, that Noroy had made his discoveries through pique and disappointment, and that he deserved no favour; adding, that an incendiary like him ought to be confined, for fear of farther mischief; and that the promise which had been made to him, being general and ambiguous, he might be put to death, without any imputation lying upon the public faith. After long debates, it was carried to avoid both extremes; and Noroy was, by the mercy of the council, shut up in perpetual imprisonment.

In the year 1674, the princes Philip and George, brothers to Charles, landgrave of Hesse Cassel, came to Geneva, where George, who was but eighteen years of age, died of the f small pox. As the inhabitants of Geneva had always expressed the greatest regard for the house of Hesse, they testified their concern by the magistrates ordering an intermission of all public business for eight days. The body of the deceased was deposited with great funeral pomp in St. Peter's chapel, the magistrates and ministers attending in mourning, where it lay for eight months, and it was then carried to Hesse Cassel. Next year, the lease granted to the farmers of the salt, who paid twenty thousand francs a year to the public, being expired, they were required to pay more money. The farmers refused to comply, and joined with the Savoyards, who pretended a right to impose a capitation duty upon every subject of Geneva, for the quantity of salt he was supposed to make use of. The Genevois resented this imposition, and sent a quantity of salt under a guard to Jussy, which g the Savoyards complained of both to the court of France, and the cantons of Switzerland, as an invasion of their privileges; and at the same time they mustered their militia, and laid up magazines of arms, ammunition, and provisions, for invading Geneva. The Genevois, on the other hand, stood upon their guard, and were justified in what they had done done both by the court of France and the Swiss cantons; the French king particularly sent them a most obliging letter, promising their republic the continuance of his friendship and protection. The Savoyards, however, had so great interest at the court of France, that the Genevois were obliged to send John Dupan and Amy de Chapeaurouge, to solicit for them both in Switzerland and the French court, where they were opposed by Leonardi, the duchess's regent of Savoy's resident. His allegations were answered by the Genevois deputies, and the cantons seemed to be satisfied. Notwithstanding this, the late farmers, whose compact still subsisted with Savoy and France, pretended they had a right to oblige the subjects of Geneva to take salt from them. The intendant of Burgundy came to Colonges, with a design to make the villages of Chancy, Avouilly, and Moric, take the king's salt, and likewise all the houses dependent on Geneva, including the country of Gex; to wit, in the villages of Malagny, Rassin, and others. Not contented with this, he ordered guards into those villages, who took away the Genevois salt, and obliged the inhabitants to take that commodity at Gex. Rosette was then resident from Geneva at the court of France, and was ordered to make remonstrances on this proceeding to his most Christian majesty, who referred him to be examined by Pomponne, one of his ministers. He had several conferences with the Genevois resident and deputies, but without any effect; till Stoupe, a native of Switzerland, and ambassador from the States General, prevailed with the king to give leave to the villagers of Chancy and Avouilly, to take their salt from Geneva. After this Rosette died, and was succeeded by the sieur Fabri, who solicited his most Christian majesty for an extension of the salt privileges; but he obtained nothing but good words and a gold medal; the inhabitants, all but those we have already named, being obliged to take their salt from Gex, which belongs to France. In this manner the Genevois lived for some time under the protection of France; and the mother of protestantism in Europe has been defended by the first Roman catholic power. We are not, however, to imagine, that this kindness is shewn to Geneva on its own account, far less on that of her religion. The French are awed by two considerations from subverting the liberties of Geneva. The first is, lest such a subversion should draw upon them the resentment of the Swiss cantons; and the next, lest the king of Sardinia should become master of that republic, which, small as it is, would render him very powerful. For some years, no considerable incident, excepting a few bickerings between the citizens and magistrates, has happened in Geneva; but those are of too little consequence to deserve a particular relation. It is certain, however, that even within these few years, the Genevois narrowly escaped being sacrificed to the ambition of France, particularly during the late war, while his most Christian majesty was engaged in supporting the interests of his son-in-law the prince of Parma. The friendship of Geneva became of so much consequence, that provided his Sardinian majesty would join with France and her allies, his most Christian majesty offered to put the king of Sardinia in possession of Geneva. This design, by the vigilance of the British ministry, came to the knowledge of the Genevois, and they immediately demanded the stipulated succours from their allies the Swiss cantons, who accordingly held them in readiness. The proper signals were likewise concerted for giving the alarm in case of an attack. Those precautions at that time probably saved the liberty and independency of Geneva as a republic. The Dutch interested themselves in the affair, and reproached cardinal Fleury, then first minister of France, with the same. The cardinal indeed denied it; but there is little doubt that had it not been for the precautions of the citizens, the design must have succeeded. The French, without being disconcerted at the discovery, still piqued themselves with being the supports and the bulwarks of the Genevois liberty. At present, his Sardinian majesty is so far from affecting any superiority over the Genevois, that no longer ago than the year 1755, a treaty passed between them for a mutual exchange of several vassal lands, which were most convenient for both parties.

The HISTORY of MILAN.

S E C T. I.

Containing an Account and Description of Milan. Rise of the Visconti Family. History of Archbishop Otho; Matteo the Great; Galeazzo I. Azzo; Luchin; Archbishop John; Matteo II. Galeazzo II. Barnabo; John Galeazzo I. Duke of Milan; John Maria; and Philip the last of the Visconti Family.

a HAVING been very full in our history of Florence, which comprehends, by its various and extensive connections with the other Italian states, a great part of their history, we shall, in order to avoid needless repetitions, confine our history of them to those transactions that have been already mentioned, as closely as the thread and order of the narrative will admit of.

THE duchy of Milan is bounded on the west by Savoy, Piedmont, and Montferrat; by Switzerland on the north; by the territories of Venice, the duchies of Mantua, Parma, and Placentia, on the east; and by the territories of Genoa on the south. For all the purposes and conveniences of life it is the most desirable country in Italy. Its soil is exceeding fertile; its pastures the richest in Italy; its climate moderate and healthful, equally void of the extremes of heat and cold. The face of the country abounds in lakes and rivers, stocked with variety of all fresh-water fish. The chief lakes are three, viz. that called the Lago Maggiore, (anciently the Lacus Verbanus) Lago di Lugano, and the Lago di Como. Nothing can be more beautiful than the borders of the Maggiore, which are planted with vineyards upon rising grounds, and every where interspersed with fine summer-houses and villas, and the vineyards are ornamented by plantations of chestnut-trees. In this lake are two islands, called the Borromean Islands; Isola Bella, and Isola Madre. The former, the soil of which was all imported into it by water, at a vast charge, is so beautiful, that the whole looks like the work of enchantment, and contains a magnificent palace. The latter contains a palace likewise, which is remarkable for its fine paintings. The Isola Bella was, in the middle of the last century, a mere barren rock; and the buildings and improvements made upon both are owing to the counts of the Borromeo family. The Lago di Lugano is twenty English miles in length; and that of Como, from north to south, is thirty-six Italian miles. The chief rivers of the Milanese are the Po, the Tesin, the Adda, and the Sessia; and besides these four rivers, the country is intersected with canals, made and carried on, at a vast expence, for the benefit of communications and water-carriage. The duchy itself is divided into thirteen parts. 1. The Milanese Proper. 2. The Paveese. 3. The Lodesan. 4. The Cremonese. 5. The Comasco. 6. The county of Anghiera. 7. The vallies of Sessia. 8. The Novarese. 9. The Vigevanasco. 10. The Lomelline. 11. The Alexandrin. 12. The Tortonese. And, 13. The territory of Bobbio. No country in the world has undergone a greater variety of revolutions, or has been oftener the seat of war, than the Milanese, which is a melancholy proof of its vast importance. It is fitted by nature for carrying on all kinds of manufactures; so that the natives can live in great power and plenty, without any foreign commerce; while the commodities they produce, particularly cloth, silk, and linnen, stockings, gloves, handkerchiefs, steel, chrystal, agates, and jewels, make the balance of trade in their favour, with their neighbours. The Milanese, upon the whole, were it under a mild and prudent government, would be one of the richest spots in the world, though in breadth it does not extend to above one hundred English miles, and in length to one hundred and twenty. Its ancient extent, however, was much greater; and the wealth, splendor, and riches of its ancient princes and inhabitants, are visible, by the astonishing works they have left behind them, notwithstanding the perpetual ravages of the wars they were engaged in.

THE city of Milan from its largeness, populousness, and magnificence of its public structures, has acquired the epithet of The Great; and at present it is justly reckoned one of the finest cities in the world. It is ten miles in circumference, though great part of the ground within the walls is laid out in gardens; and in the beginning of the present century it was said to have contained three hundred thousand inhabitants; at present it is said to contain two hundred and fifty thousand. It stands upon the little river Olana,^a and has the advantage of two navigable canals, with the rivers Adda and Tesin, the first of which was the work of the celebrated Florentine painter and architect, Leonardo de Vinci. The citadel of Milan is a regular fortification, and one of the strongest in Italy. The narrowness of the streets, in some places, spoils the beauty of the city, and their paper windows gives their noble houses a mean appearance. Here are twenty-two gates, two hundred and thirty churches, of which ninety-six are parochial, ninety convents, one hundred religious fraternities, and one hundred and twenty schools. The nobility here appear with great splendor, and the manners of the inhabitants are more easy and free than in any other part of Italy. The cathedral of Milan is an astonishing Gothic pile of marble, five hundred feet in length, and two hundred in breadth: its roof is supported^b by one hundred and sixty white marble pillars, each three fathom round, and valued at ten thousand crowns a-piece; it is filled with a prodigious number of statues, some of which are prodigiously fine; and though its foundation was laid in 1386, since which it has been constantly building and ornamenting, yet it is now far from being finished. The treasury of this church is of an immense value; and the chrystal case, enclosing the body of St. Charles Borromeo, is looked upon to be invaluable. Next to the churches, all of which are very noble, the college founded by St. Charles Borromeo, and that founded by Frederic Borromeo, where sixteen professors teach gratis, deserve attention, as do many other seminaries of learning erected here. The palaces of the archbishop and the viceroy, and some others of the Milanese nobility, are very magnificent; and the revenue of the great hospital, which is^c said to contain four thousand patients and poor, and is a very noble structure, amounts to above twenty thousand pounds sterling a-year. In short, even the mention of all the buildings and curiosities in Milan that deserve public attention, would require more room than we can spare. We cannot, however, omit mentioning, that at a small town called Moussa, on the river Lambro, is preserved the famous iron crown with which the ancient kings of Italy, and afterwards the emperors of Germany, who had pretensions upon Lombardy, were crowned. It is so called from an iron ring on the inside, though the crown itself is of gold, and enriched with jewels. It is by much too small for the head of a grown person. Its height is about three fingers, and it has neither points, nor rays, nor ornaments of any^d kind.

THE Milanese, though subject to an arbitrary government, still preserve their senate; but they are under the controul of a governor, or vicar-general, which office is now in the house of Modena, which thereby is now become very considerable in Italy. This governor fills up all the great offices of power and profit. The military governments of the city and citadel of Milan are independent of each other, and every town or city of consequence in the duchy has a common council, out of which twelve acting magistrates are chosen; but these are subordinate to the imperial governor.

Pavia. THE Pavese, which is the second division of the Milanese, though great part of it now belongs to his Sardinian majesty, is called the Milanese garden, for its beauty and fertility. Its chief city is Pavia, anciently called Ticinum, from its situation on that river, and lies^e twenty miles to the southward of Milan. It was formerly the capital of the Longobardic kingdom, and is still remarkable for the broadness of its streets, the houses of which are far from being magnificent, for the beauty and richness of some of its churches, and for its university, which had Charlemagne for its founder, and for several other literary institutions. Here is a bishop's see, which was once the richest in Italy, but is now dependent on the pope; and upon the whole the city is gone to decay, its trade being ruined through the exactions of the government. The few objects within it worth the public attention belong to the clergy, or monks, and the church and convent of the Carthusians are inexpressibly noble, the court of the convent being one of the finest in the world, and surrounded by a portico supported by pillars, the whole a mile in circumference.^f

THE chief town of the Lodetan is Lodi, famous for the richness of its pastures, which produce the celebrated cheeses, erroneously called Parmesan. It lies on the Adda, and contains a castle, fifty-three convents, colleges, and chapels, with about twelve thousand inhabitants, who carry on a trade in a kind of porcelain. It is a bishopric, and the city is spacious and well built. The ancient Lodi, though once a flourishing city, is now a place of no note, having been destroyed, out of spite, by the Milanese, though it was afterwards repaired by the emperor Frederic Barbarossa.

Cremona. CREMONA is the chief city of the Cremonese, and lies forty-five miles south-east of Milan. It stands on the north side of the Po, which joins, by a canal, with the Oglio. Though it is five miles in circumference, and in general well built, with spacious squares^g and broad streets, it is neither rich nor populous. It has a bridge of boats over the Po; and besides the cathedral, which is magnificent, it contains sixty-two convents, churches, a and chapels, and five alms houses. The rest of the divisions of the Milanese require no particular description, though, upon the whole, the country is beautiful and rich by nature, with a peculiar salubrity of air, so that almost every foot of it is improvable. Notwithstanding its present ruinous condition, it can raise an army of thirty thousand fighting men, and its revenues are computed to be annually three hundred thousand pounds sterling.

ANCIENTLY the duchy of Milan, containing the north part of the Old Liguria, was called Insubria, from its inhabitants the Insubres, who were conquered by the Romans, as they were by the Goths, who in their turn were driven out by the Lombards of Gaul and Germany, about the year 572. Didier, the last king of the Lombards, was taken prisoner b by Charles the Great, who put an end to the Longobardic kingdom, and appointed the governors of Milan. Those governors being distant from the court of their masters, the successors of Charlemagne, soon affected to be independent, which brought upon that country a severe chastisement from the emperor Frederic Barbarossa; for he levelled the walls of Milan to the ground, about the year 1152. The history of that emperor is foreign to our present purpose; but under him lived a nobleman, one Galvian^a, who was descended from Otho, a Milanese, who, together with William prince of Montferrat, served in the crusade, when Godfrey of Bouloign took Jerusalem, and who killed, in single combat, a Saracen general, whom he stripped of his helmet, which was adorned with a serpent swallowing a youth, and this, ever after, was the badge of that family. His grandson c Galvian having the courage to oppose the emperor, he was taken prisoner, and carried in chains to Germany, from whence he made his escape, and returning to Milan, he died in the service of his country. From him descended another Otho, who was born at Innori, a small village near the Lago Maggiore. His family, at the time of his birth, was but low, and all their possessions were confined to four inconsiderable villages in the neighbourhood, of which Innori was one: but according to Paulus Jovius, they formerly had large possessions near Milan itself; but their house had gone to decay, through the misfortunes of the times. Otho IV. was then emperor of Germany, and our Otho soon distinguished himself to great advantage, both by the strength and beauties of his mind and body. When he grew up, he went to Rome, where he was received into the family of cardinal Ostavian Ubaldini, an eminent prelate, who was employed in the greatest posts. The cardinal being sent ambassador to France, young Otho was so much in his favour, that he carried him with him as his private secretary, an employment which he discharged with vast address; so that the cardinal, who himself was aspiring to the popedom, considered Otho as destined for something that was very great. In the mean while a Milanese nobleman, one Torreſs, or Torriano, a person of vast ambition, putting himself at the head of the popular faction in the Milanese, had driven into exile Leo Peregi, the bishop of Milan, who died at Lignano; and Torriano, having put to death, or banished, all the Milanese nobility, established the government of the people there. Ostavian, who was himself of a noble Tuscan family, some years before had been prevented by Torriano from endeavouring to carry out of the treasury of St. Ambrose's church at Milan, a carbuncle, or jewel of vast beauty and value, which he pretended to reserve to adorn the papal tiara. This bred an inveterate enmity between them. Ostavian, by virtue of his legatine powers, nominated Otho to the archbishopric of Milan, and his nomination was confirmed by pope Urban IV. Ostavian's intention, by this nomination, was to humble the power of the people, which Otho effectually did. Milan was at that time divided between two factions, that of Torriano, and that of Francisco Sepri, who had put himself at the head of a great party, who detested Torriano's cruelty and haughtiness. Otho was designed by the pope to crush both. One Stefanardo de Vicomercato^b, who wrote the life of this Otho in verse, and who seems to have been his contemporary, gives us a very indifferent idea of Otho's virtues. Other writers f give us the highest opinion of Torriano and his modesty. Being at the head of the popular faction, he no sooner heard of Otho's nomination to the archbishopric, than he immediately seized upon the archiepiscopal palace and all his effects, and employed them in forming the canal from Pavia to Milan; but the party of the nobility having now obtained a head from the pope, in the person of Otho, began to form cabals, and write letters to their friends in Milan for reuniting their strength; and Otho, who had the temporal, but not the spiritual revenue, which the pope received for himself, having got together the face of an army, advanced towards the Lago Maggiore, and took possession of Arona, a strong post near that lake. Upon this Torriano marched all his troops out of their garrisons, and with his general Palavicini, he shut up Otho and his party both by land and g water, in Arona, so closely, that Otho was obliged to abandon the place, and to leave his party to make the best terms they could for themselves. After this Torriano demolished the castles of Arona, Anghiari, and Brescia, but soon after died. He was succeeded by his brother Philip, who procured himself to be named podesta, or pretor of Milan, for ten years; and taking advantage of the civil dissensions at Como, he took possession of that principality. Notwithstanding his successes, the party of the nobles, or patricians, under Otho, daily gained ground, and drove Philip to have recourse to all kinds of arts and alliances to confirm his authority, by matching his relations into the noble Milanese families, and to please them, by dismissing Palavicini from his command in the army. Palavicini, incensed at this affront, became the declared enemy of the Torriano party. About this time Charles of Anjou, brother to St. Lewis, king of France, was called into Italy by Urban IV. to make head against Manfred. In his march he was received by Philip Torriano with great distinction and hospitality, and furnished with cloathing, arms, and other necessities for his army, to induce him to declare against the nobles; and to ingratiate himself the more, he made Embarra, a Frenchman, governor of Milan. Soon after Philip died in great reputation for his courage, though he appears to have lost ground in the affections of his people.

History of Napi Torriano.

PHILIP was succeeded by Napi, or Napoleone, one of his own family, but a sworn foe to the nobility, whom he proscribed and put to death on all occasions. Succi, the head of the Vistari family, was then prince of Lodi, and befriended the distressed Milanese nobles; for which he was besieged in his capital by Napi, who took it, and put him to death, with as many of his friends and family as fell into his hands, bestowing the sovereignty of Lodi upon the family of Tisfraga, the enemies of the Vistari. By this time Palavicini, the head of the Milanese exiles, was dead, and they repaired for protection to William marquis of Montferrat; upon which Napi passed the Tesin, and stormed Vigevano, to strike a terror into the marquis. Those vigorous proceedings roused Clement IV. who had succeeded Urban IV. and he both interdicted and excommunicated Milan, and all the Milanese of Napi's party, so that all the churches in that city were shut up; his holiness, at the same time, enjoined the inhabitants to return to their allegiance under archbishop Otho.

He loses his popularity.

NAPI had now lost a great deal of his popularity by his unamiable cruel manners, and the inhabitants were not proof against the papal fulminations. Otho, on the other hand, was now the main prop of the nobility; the marquis of Montferrat not daring longer to patronize them; and being supported by the pope, he discovered a great and an enterprising genius; so that the very mention of his name was observed to strike terror into Napi. The exiles, at this time, had rendezvoused near Vercelli, to the government of which (it then belonging to the Milanese) he nominated his nephew Paganini, a young man, resembling himself in all his bad qualities, and his hatred of the nobility. It was easy for the nobility to perceive, that Napi's intention, by this nomination, was to drive them out of Vercelli; and while Paganini was on his march to his new government, they opposed him in a body, and put him to death. Paganini's body was carried to be buried at Milan, and the news of his death so greatly exasperated Napi and Embarri, that they are said to have put to death all the friends and relations of both sexes of the noblemen who fell into their hands, as victims, upon the tomb of Paganini, and to have sent them in waggon-loads to be buried with their ancestors. It was even with difficulty that Musca, Napi's son, prevailed on his father, by swearing that he would put himself to death, if his suit was not granted, to pardon a physician of the noble party. Napi, however, perceiving that his cruelty was every where detested, threw the whole blame of it upon Embarra, whom he expelled from his government, in which he had grown extremely unpopular by his vices. To keep well with Charles of Anjou, who was now on the throne of Naples, he sent his brother Francesco, with a most magnificent attendance, to congratulate him upon his successes. Francesco was most graciously received by Charles, who bestowed upon him the honour of knighthood, with a considerable commission in his army; and upon his return to Milan, he eclipsed Napi himself, in the splendor of his appearance and the manner of his living. At this time, the party of the nobles under Otho was reduced to the utmost distress. He himself, and his friends, having spent all their substance, wandered about from place to place, his holiness being unable, through the situation of his affairs, to give them assistance. Otho, however, who betrayed no marks of despondency, still found resources in his own courage and constancy, which so greatly re-animated the spirits of his party, that they chose for their general Squarcini Burri, a man of great eminence and courage, whose daughter was married to Mathew Visconti, afterwards called Mathew the Great. At the same time they renewed their confederacy with the marquis of Montferrat, who was son-in-law to the king of Spain. The marquis agreed to this confederacy, chiefly with a view of making himself master of the Milanese.

His cruelty.

Archbishop
Otho distressed,

NAPI had in his pay several bodies of French and Germans, which had followed the earl of Flanders into Italy, and, after the death of their leader, chose to serve in the fruitful

- a fruitful plains of the Milanese, rather than under Charles in Naples. To counterbalance their experience in military discipline, Burri was sent on a solemn embassy from the marquis, to persuade Ferdinand to assist the exiles with a body of troops. As Ferdinand had then great differences with Charles, Burri obtained the assistance he desired, which consisted in six hundred horse and a body of foot, who landed at Genoa, and from thence they marched to join the marquis of Montferrat. This reinforcement from so powerful a prince, re-established the hopes of Otho and the Milanese exiles; and they marched in a body against Vigevano, then possessed by Napi, and besieged it. The siege at first was carried on merely by the archers and cross-bow men, who drove the defendants from their walls; but being afterwards provided with wooden defences, Burri thought fit to abandon the siege, and to pass the Tesin, that he might carry the war nearer to the gates of Milan. Upon his retreat, he was attacked by a sally from the garrison, but with so little caution, that the Spaniards facing about, must have got possession of the town, had not the portcullice been suddenly let down. Many of the garrison, however, were put to the sword, and, after that, the exiles and Spaniards desisted from their attempts; but in their retreat they surprized a strong post that was held by the Milanese and the Comese. Otho and Burri, becoming masters of this post by the Spanish horse fording or swimming over the Tesin, treated their enemies with the utmost humanity, and gave them their liberty; but, with all, exhorted them to reinstate the nobles and their archbishop in their rights. This lenity rendered Otho and Burri wonderfully popular at Milan and Como, to the great mortification of the Torriani. Pursuing their advantage, they entered the territory of Lomellino, and from thence proceeded to that of Sepri, and at last they made themselves masters of all the open places in the neighbourhood of Milan.

- NAPI* all this time was not idle; he drew together his forces, and summoned his allies, the Parmesans, to his assistance, and at the same time a great body of French mercenaries were advancing to his assistance. The latter, however, whose rendezvous was at Carrati, were so little upon their guard, that they were surprized by Otho and Burri. Most of them being taken prisoners, were stript of their baggage and arms: but the victors, in their turn, falling into the like disorder, gave their captives an opportunity of recovering their arms; while Napi, all of a sudden, attacked them so vigorously, that they lost all the advantage they had obtained, and it was with difficulty that the Spanish horse escaped across the Tesin. Napi might have pursued his victory with great effect, but was contented, being afraid of ambuscades, with obliging his enemies to repass the Tesin, but with very little loss. Napi, however, we are told, exercised great severities against the party of the nobles who had joined Otho, and whose possessions lay within his jurisdiction, by demolishing their castles.

- CLEMENT* IV. was still pope, and to him Otho again applied for assistance; his suit was seconded by the cardinals, who thought that his holiness could not begin his reign more auspiciously than by restoring Otho, and the Milanese nobles, to their rights. Upon this, Clement wrote in very strong terms, threatening the Torriani with his indignation if they did not instantly admit the archbishop, and his friends, into Milan; and, upon their continuing obstinate, he shut up their churches, and laid them under excommunication. By this time Napi began to be hated by the Milanese, who exclaimed against his rebellion to the pope. This induced Napi to appoint an embassy for mitigating the pope's anger; but his holiness not only refused the ambassadors access to his person, but commanded them instantly to depart out of the papal territories; upon which they repaired to the court of Naples, to prevail with that king to become their intercessor with his holiness. Charles readily accepted of this office, and appointed ambassadors of his own to repair to the pontiff, who was prevailed on to admit those of the Torriani into his presence, on pretence that they had been always zealous votaries to the holy see, and enemies to emperors. In the audience which succeeded, both the Neapolitan and the Milanese ambassadors represented Otho as being a mere freebooter, at the head of a party of robbers, and launched out into such invectives against him, as greatly disgusted the cardinals, who were most of them friends to Otho. The latter was, at that time, at the court of Rome; and being present at this audience, he was permitted to reply to the charge against him, which he did by recriminating upon the cruelty, craft, and ambition of the Torriani. Both parties being heard, his holiness declared, that he would send a legate into Lombardy to adjust all differences between them; in which case he promised to relieve Milan from its excommunication. Otho attended the legate to Milan, where Napi behaved with so much address and dissimulation, that the city was relieved from its ecclesiastical censures; but without his suffering the archbishop to intermeddle in any affairs, either of church or state, every day producing some new evasion of the pontifical decree. In the mean while, pope Clement died, and a vacancy of the pontifical dignity succeeding for some months, Napi applied to the emperor Rodolph, whom he invited into Italy, and to be crowned at Milan.

Diffimulation
of pope
Gregory X.

This invitation was accepted of with great readiness; and Rodolph constituted Napi his a governor and vicar-general in Lombardy, sending to him at the same time a fine body of German horse, the command of which was given to Cassoni, Napi's nephew. This happened about the time when Gregory X. was raised to the pontificate. The reader in another part of this work will find the circumstances of this elevation. Otho, perceiving the juggling of Napi, threw himself at the feet of the new pope; and Gregory not only promised to confirm all that his predecessors had done in his favour, but intending to visit his native country of Piacenza, he took Otho with him, and paid a visit to Milan, in his journey. He was received there by Napi with so much respect and pomp, that, in order to compromise matters between him and Otho, he raised Raimond, nephew to the former, to be patriarch of Aquilcia. There seems on this occasion to have been great b management on the part of the pope (A), he knew the consequence of having Napi in his interest, and of breaking the connections between him and the emperor; and it has been said (B), that he gave his consent that Otho should be assassinated privately at Piacenza, in the pope's own house. This design being discovered to Otho by a waiter at a tavern, he fled out of Piacenza by night, and retired to Lyons, where the council being finished, he returned to Italy. It is, however, pretty improbable, that his holiness was accessary to the design of assassinating Otho; because the latter, upon his return from Lyons, again put himself under his protection. But it is generally agreed, that Gregory shewed no relentment at the decree for putting Otho to death, in case he should return to Milan; and that he ever afterwards considered him as a troublesome creditor, teasing him c for the performance of his own and his predecessor's engagements. Outwardly, however, his holiness paid so much respect to Otho, that the nobles of his party, which was every day gaining ground in Milan, flocked to the papal court upon its return to Italy; but, to the inexpressible astonishment of Otho and his friends, when the pope was preparing to enter Milan, he received an order to stop at Biello, a town near Vercelli, lest his return to Milan should disturb the public tranquillity in that city. Otho was obliged to comply with this bitter command, and concealed his resentment, but without losing his courage. Gregory was received in Milan with a vast profusion of honours; and his horse was led by the reins by Napi and Francesco, under a magnificent canopy, supported by twelve young Milanese noblemen. Before he departed from that city, he made a long apology d to Otho's friends, that the state of affairs in Christendom did not admit of his doing Otho justice, because of the power of the Torriani, which was equal to that of the greatest kings. In short, he advised them to be patient under their misfortunes, but without giving them any other hopes of redress, than that he would find a more proper opportunity to settle their affairs. The truth is, Otho and his party were considered at this time to be Gibelins; and the Guelphs looking upon the Torriani as their leaders, had actually submitted to be their slaves. The same humour prevailed in other parts of Italy; which was now filled with noble exiles. At the head of the Guelph party were the pope, Charles king of Naples, and the Torriani. All the comfort Otho could obtain during his long and painful exile, was an order from his holiness, to be reinstated in part of his revenues, as archbishop. But, as Jovius observes, he had such an invincible fortitude of mind, that his hopes increased at the time when other exiles despaired. While he remained at Biello, pope Gregory, who had sided with Guelphs or Gibelins, as it suited his interest, died at Arezzo in 1276. e 1276.

his credit,

His death united the party of the Milanese exiled nobles, who flocked to Otho, and chose for their leader Godfrey count of Langusco, a noble Pavian, and an inveterate enemy of the Torriani family. The latter was, at this time, in the summit of their power, being equally courted by the pope, the king of Naples, and the new emperor of Germany; and by their situation they actually held the balance of all Italy. Langusco was rich and powerful, and took into his pay many German and other mercenaries, at the head of f whom he advanced towards the Lago Maggiore; all the towns through which he marched, opened their gates to receive him, through the interest of the Visconti family, which was seated in that country. Amongst other places, the important towns of Arona and Angbiari submitted to the exiles; and Otho himself, at the head of a considerable detachment, made an irruption into the county of Sepri, now belonging to the city of Milan, lying between the Tessin and the Olon, all which country he entirely reduced. By the thread of the history, the unpopularity of Napi, at this time, sufficiently appears, and that his real power was confined within the walls of Milan, as he had lost so considerable a territory without almost striking a stroke. He summoned all his allies to his assistance, and drew

(A) Muratori observes, in his notes upon Vicomercato, apud Murat. tom. ix. p. 81. that the Torriani were at that time under no necessity of privately assassinating Otho, because they had publicly rendered it

a to the field the military chariot of Milan, in token that he was determined to conquer or to die. He added to the fortifications of the city, and he gave the command of it to his brother Francesco, who banished some suspected citizens, confined others, and obliged the rest to give hostages. He himself took the command of the main body; and sent his son Cassoni (C), with a body of German horse, to check the advance of the enemies. He then marched towards Anghieri, and encamped on the banks of the Guasara, which empties itself into the Lago Maggiore; while Godfrey, Otho's general, encamped on the opposite shore. Napi's army marched in two divisions; the first was commanded by Cassoni, who expecting his father was at hand to support him, attempted to pass the river; but was opposed by Godfrey, who, in making a noble defence, was carried down the stream, and made prisoner. By this time Napi came up with his division, and then the rout of the exiles became general. Theobald Visconti, the father of Matthew, who was afterwards called the Great, with thirty-four nobles, were taken prisoners: and it is said that Napi shed tears of joy, on seeing the noble actions of his son in the engagement. Napi's victory being complete, he sent to consult his brother Francesco how he should dispose of his prisoners; and he advised him to cut off the heads of every one of them. This barbarous resolution was opposed by Cassoni, who was for milder measures; but the Germans having lost their general Lauser in a single combat with Godfrey, demanded his blood in revenge; upon which Godfrey, Theobald, and the thirty-four nobles (D), had their heads struck off, and they were sent from the field of battle piled up in a common waggon.

c THIS defeat greatly affected Otho, who was Theobald's uncle, and served only to increase the barbarities perpetrated by both parties on each other. When Otho, who was at some distance, received the news of it, he seemed to preserve his usual firmness of mind; and though he shed some tears to the memory of his nephew, he told his friends, that he did not doubt the Torriani, in revenge of their barbarity, would soon experience a fatal reverse of fortune. In a few weeks after, the people of Como, provoked by the repeated cruelties of their podesta Accursio Cutica, one of Napi's creatures, took arms, and imprisoned Accursio, whom they threatened to put to death, unless Napi would set at liberty one of their countrymen, Simon of Locarna, whom he had made prisoner some years before, and had confined him, like a wild beast, within a den. Napi, having a regard for Accursio, gave orders to set Locarna at liberty; as not thinking he could long survive the severities of his imprisonment. He obliged him, however, to swear, never, from thenceforth, to carry arms against the house of Torriano; but, as Francesco had foreseen, he no sooner found himself at liberty, than he declared, that he did not think himself obliged by an oath that had been extorted from him by cruelty; and from that hour he devoted his life to revenge against the Torriani. Locarna, being a man of great interest, brought vast numbers to join Otho against the Torriani, and he was followed by all the people of Como. Otho was still at Vercelli, where he held his head-quarters, and provided horses and arms for those who joined him. Understanding that the Torriani had been so elevated by their late victories, as to be very remiss in guarding the important fortrefs of Sepri, and taking advantage of a dark night, he passed the Tesin, and made himself master of the place. This success gave great lustre to his arms, and in a few days he again extended his quarters to the neighbourhood of Milan. Napi immediately ordered a chosen body of veterans, commanded by himself, and the German mercenaries, under his son, to take the field, and the rest of his troops and auxiliaries to follow him. He was inexpressibly mortified to understand, that an enemy, whom he had so often subdued, and whose cause he lately thought to be irrecoverable, should again give him disturbance; and he bent the whole of his resentment against Otho, who upon his approach called in all his parties, and entrenched his army under the walls of Sepri, which he kept behind his back, with a strong garrison, to retire to in case of necessity. Otho was too strong to be attacked in his trenches; but Napi, in order to draw him out of them, sent for his battering machines, which he applied to the walls of Sepri itself. The garrison making a gallant resistance, Otho called a council of war, where it was unanimously resolved to take advantage of the consternation of Napi's troops, and to charge them before they could recover themselves. This was executed with so much vigour, that his army was entirely defeated; nor could either Napi or his son, who was at the head of the German cavalry, rally them, so greatly discouraged they were with the resistance they met with before the town. Otho, it is said, did all he could to stop the carnage, and it was owing to him that the loss of the Milanese was so small as it was. Napi and Cassoni, upon reviewing their army, found it still so strong, that they determined immediately to renew the fight and in great distress;

from which he recovers.

but is again overpowered.

(C) Muratori, ubi supra, thinks that his real name was Casson; perhaps it was Gaston.

(D) Paulus Jovius, in his lives of the twelve Visconti princes of Milan, ed. Steph. 1548, p. 37, makes them but twenty-two; but Viccomercato, whose authority is preferable, makes them thirty-four; nor was Langusco one of them, as Jovius says he was, he dying in the battle.

while

while Otho's troops were in a state of security from their late victory. Early in the morning, therefore, Napi renewed the battle with so much success, that his German horse took Otho's cavalry unprovided; and having put them to flight, the infantry were easily defeated; and thus, says Jovius, it is difficult to say whether, within the space of a few hours, they acquired most glory, or suffered most disgrace. As to Otho himself, after exposing himself to the greatest dangers, he put himself at the head of his cavalry, and retired to Como.

He retreats.

THE inhabitants of that place fearing the resentment of Napi, whom they had deserted, refused to receive him within their gates, but furnished him with all kinds of necessaries, and with skilful guides, who enabled him to make his retreat towards Lago di Lugano; so that he reached a strong camp at Zornigo, a small village, with a wood on his rear. Here he remained for some days in safety, and sent expresses to all his friends, to inform them of his situation; but being obliged to decamp for want of provision, he moved to Canobi, a plentiful town, on the borders of the Lago Maggiore. At first the inhabitants refused to receive him; but Otho represented his case so pathetically, that they not only received him within their walls, but devoted themselves to his service. It was no sooner known that Otho was safe at Canobi, than the Milanese exiles again flocked to his standard; and Napi's soldiers being contented with stripping their prisoners, great numbers of them, tho' naked and half starved, repaired to Canobi: amongst others, he was joined by Locarna, who followed him by the track of his carriages. Otho's spirit seemed to grow with his difficulties and distresses; and though he had been five times vanquished in battle, he prepared to make another attempt. The reader is to observe, that he was at this time sixty-five years of age, and he was almost destitute of money, and that the fate of war had deprived him of most of his friends and followers. His constitution, however, was healthful: he had enured it to be in all kinds of fatigues: he looked upon defeats and disappointments to be so many incentives to fresh attempts; and the wonderful vigour of his mind raised him friends, even amidst the Alps and Appennines, where many noble families, who lived in a kind of an independency, furnished him with horses, arms, cloaths, money, and all kinds of carriages: he was even joined by numbers of volunteers, who were fond of serving under so extraordinary an old man, particularly from Vercelli and Novara. The marquis of Montferrat himself, notwithstanding his former defeats in the same cause, having reduced Alessandria and Tortona, entered with him into a fresh alliance. This prince somewhat resembled Otho in his character of perseverance, and retained in his pay the remains of the veteran Spaniards, who had been sent him by his father-in-law. Experience had taught him, that there was a necessity for a naval force to drive the Torriani out of Milan. The care of providing and commanding that was committed to Locarna, who acquitted himself perfectly well in both capacities, while the marquis marched towards the Lago Maggiore, at the same time that Anghieri (E) was attacked by the fleet under Locarna, on board of which Otho was. This place was soon reduced; but the garrison fled to the citadel, which, after a short resistance, surrendered likewise. The marquis of Montferrat had, by this time, reached the Lago Maggiore, and both sea and land forces laid siege to Arona, which they plied so hard with their machines and engines, playing from batteries on the land, and the decks and masts of the ships, that the garrison capitulated to surrender, if the place was not relieved in three days. This capitulation was scarcely signed, when news was brought that Cassoni was advancing at the head of the German horse, and the Milanese veterans. Upon this, the marquis drew up his army to the best advantage, and was joined by all the hands that could be spared from the ships. Cassoni, seeing the advantageous posture of his enemies, and that their best troops were posted in the front, drew up his men so as to flank Otho's army with the worst of his troops, but supported by one wing of his German horse; so that by making a circuit, they broke into the rear of Otho's army, with terrible shouts, and even fell into Otho's camp, putting all before them to the sword. This obliged the marquis to alter the disposition of his battle; but it was now too late, for Cassoni charged him so vigorously with the front line of his cavalry, that his army was completely broken, though with no great loss, because the ships received his fugitives. The marquis's tent was taken on this occasion, but he himself retired in pretty good order, with his cavalry, to Pavia; as Otho and Locarna did, with the remains of their infantry, to Como and Novara. Upon the whole, it appears, both from Sigonius and Stephanardus, that the marquis behaved very poorly in this battle, and that, in fact, he fled without striking a blow.

He is joined by the Comese and other states.

THE Comese, who had revolted from the Torriani, had put themselves under the protection of Locarna, but without declaring in favour of the Milanese exiles. On the arrival of Locarna at Como, great debates ensued whether the Comese should not immediately declare

(E) Stephanardus makes no mention of the taking of Anghieri on this occasion.

a for Otho, and call in his army to protect them against the resentment of the Torriani. This consideration was enforced by motives of compassion and generosity; and notwithstanding the opposition given to it by the faction of the Viti, it prevailed through the address and eloquence of Locarna. The Comeſe, all of a sudden, declared in favour of Otho, and the exiled nobles; but their two head magistrates obstinately opposed the resolution. Otho, on the other hand, was favoured by the bishop, who was of the Advocati family. Both parties at last came to blows; but that which was headed by Locarna drove their antagonists, after a brisk conflict in the streets, into the castle, and from thence out of the city, both their magistrates being taken prisoners. After this, the people levelled to the ground the houses and towers of the Viti; and Otho, who remained still at Novara, was invited

b to Como by letters from the magistrates, who were now all of them in his interest.

FROM that day Otho's cause prospered, and that of the Torriani went backward. Otho was received at Como by the bishop, who paid him the greatest honours, and lent him money out of his pocket for repairing his equipages, and recruiting his forces. Locarna was seconded by Luſſeria Ruſca, the head of the Comeſe Gibelins; and Otho's troops now wore the imperial eagle in their standard. He had learned, by repeated experience, that the court of Rome sought to make him subservient to its own ambitious designs; and that he was far safer in trusting to the emperor, who he knew was sufficiently able to protect, but not to displace, him. The Comeſe, who were then very powerful, having declared for him, their example was followed by most of the populous towns lying on the borders of c the Lago Maggiore, and in the neighbourhood; so that he saw himself soon once more at the head of a considerable army. He was joined by Ricardo Langusco, brother to Godfrey, count of Langusco, who had, as we have observed, been killed in the same service. Ricardo, who was highly exasperated against the Torriani for his brother's death, and had brought with him some chosen troops, was declared general of the army. Otho did not fail to harangue the Comeſe in the most animating and grateful terms; and was answered by the bishop of Como, who undertook in the name of the inhabitants, to stand by his rights to the utmost. Otho then took leave of the Comeſe, and marched to Icini, then a noble and populous town, but now not to be met with in maps. Here the inhabitants joined Otho with great spirit. The news of his progress gave so little alarm to Napi, that he told

d some of his guests at an entertainment, that his executioners would now have abundance of work in hanging up the rebel Comeſe, as so many thieves. He then gave orders for the march of his army, having, as usual, sent out his son Caffoni with the German horse, who seized upon Canturi, lying within five miles of Como. After various marches and counter-marches, while Otho was at Leuco, a priest, mounted on a swift horse, came up to him from Decimo, or Decio, so called from being ten miles from Milan, to inform him, that his enemies under Napi, and the heads of his party, were at Decio, where they behaved in the most riotous, disorderly manner, and observing no kind of discipline, but plundering the inhabitants, turning them out of their houses, and seizing all they had. The priest added, that Caffoni and the German horse were still at Canturi; and that it was his opinion, by e marching in the night-time, the army under Napi might be surprised and destroyed. Otho looked upon this information as a good omen, Decio having been the place where he received his education and holy orders. Being informed by his scouts that Caffoni was still at Canturi, and thereby freed from all dread of those formidable enemies, to whom he had already given three defeats in the open field, he lost not a moment in giving orders for the march of his troops. Affecting now to act only in an ecclesiastical capacity, he appeared in his sacerdotal habits, preceded by a silver cross, and committed the whole care of the expedition to Ricardo. The march succeeded perfectly well, and the scouts reported that a profound silence reigned all about, and within, Decio. They marched without lights, and arriving about the dawn of day, they broke into the town with such fury, that Napi had

f scarcely time to put on his armour; and all that Pontio, who had the chief command under him, could do, was to rally a few half-armed troops; but he was attacked by Ricardo, who put him to the sword, with most of his party, while Locarna and Ruſca attacked the other division under Napi himself. Here the engagement was pretty smart, but entirely to Otho's advantage. Several of the heads of the Torriani were killed, and it was with great difficulty that Otho could save Napi, who was taken prisoner, from Locarna's vengeance. Many young noblemen were, at the same time, made captives, most of them the descendants, allies, or relations of the Torriani family; and all the honour of this glorious day resulted to the Comeſe (F).

He defeated Napi and the Torriani at Decio.

(F) Such is the account given us by Paulus Jovius, who was himself a Comeſe, of this battle, or rather surprisal, which makes so eminent a figure in the Milanese history: but Muratori, tom. ix. p. 92. in his notes upon Vicomercato, observes that the match was very unequal, and that the Othonians (as they are called) were far superior to their enemies in number. Vicomercato likewise hints, that Pontio was not killed, but taken prisoner.

Moderation of Otho.

FEW victories obtained in the heat of a civil war, and after such provocation, on the part of the vanquished, have been more moderately prosecuted than this was. This, undoubtedly, was owing to the wisdom and policy of Otho himself, who sought all opportunities to prevent bloodshed. Locarna and Rusca had the charge of Napi, and the most illustrious prisoners, whom they carried to the castle of Baradello, near Como. Locarna, seeing his principal foe in his power, abated his resentment, but shut him up in a cage, where being deprived of every thing that could put an end to his life, his hair and nails grew to a most enormous length. It is said, that he submitted quietly to his fate, but that he interceded for a favourable treatment of his son and nephew, whom his authority had carried with him to the field; in which they were accordingly indulged.

Cassoni obliged to abandon Milan.

THE news of Napi's defeat and imprisonment arriving at Milan, Oldred, who had been left governor of the city, summoned a council of the magistracy, and ordered the people to take arms. His authority was very little regarded. Nothing was now to be heard of amongst the citizens, but the praises of Otho and the exiles, for the moderate use they had made of their victory, and the greatness of the defeat, which had cut off, or imprisoned, all the heads of the Torriani party, and rendered it impossible for them ever to recover their power. In short, Oldred found such a disposition in the citizens, that he was obliged to shut himself up in the castle for safety. Cassoni was still at Canturi, where he had an imperfect account of his father's defeat; and not knowing the particulars, he returned with his army to Milan, where he was in hopes of finding his father, or some of his friends. Being informed of the truth, and refused admittance into the city, he broke open the gates, forced his entrance, and marched, at the head of his troops, to the market-place; but not before his rear had been attacked by some of the townsmen. Cassoni, not discouraged, erected his family-standard in the market-place; but none repaired to it, or joined him, when he invited the inhabitants to assert their ancient liberties: finding, therefore, all his efforts fruitless, he retreated to Lodi, and being denied admittance there, he went to Cremona, and from thence to Parma.

Otho is received.

THE same day on which Cassoni fled out of Milan, Otho was invited into it with all the demonstrations of zeal and loyalty on the part of the inhabitants. He still retained his moderation (G); and after his entry into Milan, which was very pompous, he made a speech to the citizens so full of wisdom and clemency towards his enemies, that he entirely removed their apprehensions, and they committed the government of the city to his hands. He appointed count Ricardo to the government of Milan, and made Locarna his general, or (as he is called) the master of his horse, as being the two persons to whom he principally owed his success. He then founded some religious houses, and instituted certain festivities to commemorate the anniversary of his victory, some remains of which the Milaneſe are still said to retain. It is somewhat remarkable, that, on the morning of Otho's victory at Decio, Bnacosa Burri, the wife of his nephew Matthew, afterwards called Matthew the Great, was brought to bed of a son, who, from a cock crowing at the time of his birth, was called Galeazzo.

He reduces the remains.

OTHO being now settled in peace and prosperity, applied himself to reduce the remains of the Torriani faction, who had taken refuge in mount Orfano, so called from its standing alone in the middle of a vast plain. As the place was found by Otho to be impregnable, he was forced to block it up, by which he obliged it to surrender by famine in six months. Otho offered his protection to the garrison; but they chose to leave the Milaneſe, rather than trust to his clemency. Their departure left him at liberty to apply himself to his civil and ecclesiastical functions, in both which capacities he excelled all princes of his age; he rewarded all his friends in the most generous manner, and left nothing unattempted that could reclaim his enemies.

Of the Torri-
ani.

WHILE he was intent upon those duties, a fresh war broke out against him. The Vistari having, by his means, been restored to the government of Lodi, their opponents called in Cassoni, Godfrey, and Raimond of Aquileia, to their assistance; and being joined by auxiliaries from Cremona and Parma, they invaded the Milaneſe. Cassoni having taken and plundered several towns upon the banks of the Adda, passed the Lambro; and the danger seemed so threatening to the Milaneſe government, that they unadvisedly drew out their chariot of war, and marched to Santo Donato. Some authors pretend, that, in the mean while, Otho put himself at the head of a flying party, and advanced to Cassano, a town on the Adda, to restrain the incursions of Cassoni; but perceiving him to be stronger than he imagined, he was obliged to fly to a neighbouring village, where he was saved by hiding himself in the steeple. Whatever may be in this, it is certain that the army of the Milaneſe, who

(G) We have in Paulus Jovius a portrait in profile, which he assures us to be from an original of Otho, painted, in the castle of Anghieri, with a description of the battle. In this portrait he is represented in his archiepiscopal robes, with a cross in his right-hand, and in his left a sword of an enormous size, but of curious workmanship.

a attended the chariot of war, were defeated by Cassoni, and about twenty of their nobility were made prisoners. Cassoni, elated by this victory, carried his incursions to the very gates of Milan. Otho shewed his usual constancy on this dangerous occasion, and, without betraying the least symptom of fear, he made all proper dispositions for the defence of the city. Those precautions defeated Cassoni's sanguine expectations, that the friends of his family would declare themselves in his favour within the city; so that he was obliged to repass the Adda, and to lay siege to Bergamo. His retreat gave Otho a breathing time, and he invited the marquis of Montferrat again to join him with his troops, so as to put the success of the war on a short issue. The marquis acceded to his proposal, but upon pretty high terms; for Otho was obliged to pay him down a large sum in ready money, to give him a considerable subsidy for five years, and to declare him general of all his troops against the Torriani. This bargain being concluded, the two prefects, or podestas, of Milan, who happened that year to be Antonio Langusco of Pavia, and Lufteria Rusca of Como, raised an army, and drew out the chariot of war. On this occasion, Otho, that he might oblige as many of his friends as he could, reduced the service of the prefects from twelve to six months. Nothing happened for some time but a few skirmishes, and plunderings of open villages. At last, the marquis of Montferrat resolved to pass the Adda, and to carry the war into the heart of the enemy's country.

Success of Cassoni.

Otho joined by the marquis of Montferrat.

ARCHBISHOP Otho was then in the field, and was opposed by Raimond Torriano, whom we have already mentioned, patriarch of Aquileia. Two churchmen being at the head of different parties, it was proposed by the Bergamese, as well as their opponents, who were studious of peace; that they should confer together on that head. This proposal produced a peace, which was by no means agreeable to the marquis of Montferrat; for the Milanese, of both factions, having then an opportunity of intercourse, ran into each others arms, so that the two camps seemed to be but as one, till the marquis, by his authority, broke off their intimacy. This, however, did not interrupt the negotiations for peace, which at last was concluded on the following terms, viz. That the castles of Bepriano and Vapriano should be delivered into the hands of Conrade, an eminent lawyer, who appeared there as mediator, and the college of merchants, as being indifferent parties; that the Torriani should recover their estates, castles, and houses, but that their places of strength should be put into the hands of citizens, who had never espoused either side; and that the prisoners of both should be dismissed without ransom.

As this peace was concluded chiefly by the intervention of the marquis of Montferrat, and Conrade, Lufterio of Langusco, and Locarna, refused to agree to the last article, pretending that their prisoners in the castle of Baradello were their own property by the right of war, and that none could dispose of them without their consent. Notwithstanding this, the marquis set at liberty all the prisoners of the Torriani faction who were in his custody. Otho, on the other hand, lay under inexpressible difficulties; he knew not how to disoblige the friends and relations of his family, who by the peace were obliged to give up all the lucrative grants they had obtained of the estates of the Torriani; and at their instigation he absolutely refused to ratify the terms. Thus the Torriani were restored neither to their country nor their estates; nor were their friends in the castle of Baradello delivered. This failure of good faith seems to have been the greatest stain that Otho ever incurred in his person or government, and opened the mouth of calumny against him, insomuch that his enemies made a handle of it for gaining over great numbers of the neighbouring princes and states to their party.

Otho's failure in good faith.

ABOUT this time Napi died of filth and nastiness; being consumed by vermin in the castle of Baradello, where he had lain for nineteen months and twenty-three days. Some say, that he was dragged out by the heels, and buried in a ditch, like a beast of burden; while others affirm that he had a decent burial. Other prisoners of his family and party soon after followed him in the same manner. Those barbarities encreased the public detestation against Otho; so that Raimond, the patriarch of Aquileia, prevailed with the Venetians, and the neighbouring states, to furnish him with two thousand horse, and as many foot, who were joined by the German veterans, the Cremonese, the Parmesans, and the Lodese, under Cassoni, not to mention a great number of the Milanese themselves, who were discontented with Otho's government, on account of the injustice done to the Torriani, by which their country continued to suffer. Their defection, which was voluntary and plausible, alarmed Otho, who immediately raised an army, summoned his allies to his assistance, and laid out vast sums of money in warlike preparations. Having called upon the marquis of Montferrat to join him with his troops, he declined it by several frivolous excuses; that he might augment Otho's difficulties. It is probable that he had never lost sight of his views on the Milanese. According to Jovius, he had carried his wife to pay a visit to Otho at Milan, where she was entertained with so much splendor, and received so many noble presents, that she was incessantly urging him to aspire to the sovereignty of that magnificent city.

the marquis of Montferrat

are disappointed.

The marquis easily inclined to her suggestions, and had even gone to Spain, where he brought that king into his views, and returned with three hundred men at arms, with a body of light horse and infantry. This proceeding, together with his various shufflings and excuses, gave Otho some suspicion of his design; and he employed his nephew Matthew, who had now acquired a great character in the management of business, to sound him, and to give him a large sum of money to induce him to take the field. Matthew's arguments had so much weight, that the marquis, prevailed on partly by the gold, and partly by a sense of shame, drew out his troops, and joined Otho and the rest of his allies at Vapri. The whole formed one of the most numerous and best appointed armies that had been seen in Italy for some years, consisting of thirty thousand foot and six thousand horse, of whom above two thousand were men at arms. This formidable army, and the expedition with which it had been brought to the field, daunted Cassoni. He had depended on the backwardness of the Milanese, whom he imagined could not be brought to declare against his family. Seeing Otho's army advance, he perceived that he must either repass the river, which he could not do without exposing himself to great danger of defeat, fight Otho upon very unequal terms, or suffer himself to be shut up in Vapri. He disdained the thought of either retreating or acting on the defensive, and resolved at once to fight his enemy. Before he executed this desperate resolution, he made a short speech to his German cavalry, and putting himself at their head, he attacked the Spanish auxiliaries with so much fury, that he killed their standard bearer; but being at last surrounded by numbers, he was himself killed, and his army completely defeated, most of them being either drowned in passing the Adda, or falling in the field. This battle confirmed Otho in his government, and was fought four years after that of Decio. Cassoni was nobly buried at Vapri, where his tomb is still to be seen.

THE Lodese having been very active in favour of Cassoni, their territory was invaded by the marquis of Montferrat, and ravaged with so much cruelty, that they were obliged to purchase their peace from Otho. He then attacked the Cremonese; but this produced a confederacy against him amongst the Piacentines, the Parmesans, the *Mantuan*s, and the Reggians, who supported the Cremonese. The war was thereby protracted for some time; but at last peace was concluded for a hundred years, by which the prisoners on both sides were to be released, and the Torriani fugitives were to be suffered to have refuge in the cities and territories of their friends. The marquis, through those successes, and his Spanish alliance, made at this time so great a figure in the affairs of Lombardy, that he no longer doubted of becoming master of Milan, as Otho was now grown very old. To pave the way of his ambition, he practised with the Comese, who chose him for their governor, or potesta, for ten years; but with an express reservation as to the prisoners in Baradello, whom he was to leave in the power of the people of Como; and, by his oath, he was, at the request of the people and the Ruscan party, faithfully to make war with all their enemies as occasion should require. Having obtained this great acquisition of power, he returned to Milan with a large retinue, where he renewed his intrigues, and employed all kinds of practices to depreciate Otho in the eyes of his subjects. His manners, however, were ill-suited for such an undertaking, for he was as arrogant in his behaviour as he was insatiable in his avarice, which had involved the Milanese in prodigious expences. This rendered him unpopular amongst them, and the more as he claimed all the glory of the late battle of Vapri, and took such steps as left it no longer doubtful that he was aspiring to the sovereignty of Milan.

THE first step he took in direct opposition to Otho, was his espousing the interest of the Soracini, a family which was extremely obnoxious to the Visconti, and had always opposed Otho and his friends. He next procured Poggio, one of his favourites, to be made potesta of Milan, where two factions started up; one in the interest of Otho, and the other in that of the marquis. The latter, to strengthen his party, had by the force of gold procured the deliverance of Guido Torriano out of the castle of Baradello. The Comese reproached their friends at Milan with this escape, which gave infinite disquiet to Otho. He now plainly saw that the marquis was striking at the foundation of his authority; but he wisely resolved to dissemble, and he entertained the marquis with as much affability and complaisance as ever. By this prudent behaviour he made great discoveries of his rival's intentions, and was enabled to guard against all his secret machinations, and to weaken his party. It is probable that Otho, on this occasion, employed other means to divert the marquis from his dangerous designs; for he was most critically called back to Vercelli, on account of a civil war breaking out in his own marquisate. Upon his retreat, Otho immediately summoned a meeting of his friends, and giving his nephew Matthew his orders, he directly mounted on horseback, and advanced in armour to the potesta's palace, from whence he drove Poggio out of the city. A new potesta was nominated in his room, the Soracini were driven into exile, and their palace, which they had built out of the ruins of a the Torriani, was levelled with the ground; others of the Montferrat faction, who were less obnoxious, were banished ten miles from Milan; and thus Otho's government and credit were entirely re-established in that city.

THAT he might prove himself to be in all respects a complete politician, he endeavoured to get permanency to his power, by applying, as the Torriani had done before, to Rodolph, emperor of Germany, for his protection, and inviting him to receive the crown of Italy at Milan. Rodolph was a wise and a wary prince; and tho' he had before inclined to favour the Torriani, accepted of Otho's offer; and, without going to Italy, he took him into his alliance, and not only in the most ample form promised to assist and protect him, but sent him some troops of German horse to serve him as his life-guard; a present which was at that time of the utmost consequence to the princes of Italy. The marquis of Montferrat, over-awed by this great alliance, laid aside, for that time, his ambitious projects against Milan, and continued a war against the people of Tortona and Alessandria.

Otho's alliance with the emperor.

IN the mean while, a breach happened between the Milanese and Comefe, which unexpectedly revived all the hopes of the Torriani. The vast services performed by the Comefe to the Milanese, encouraged the former to presume a little too much upon their own importance; and having made some demands concerning limits, which they pretended belonged to them of right, and which the Milanese disallowed of, they immediately took arms; and invading Lucca, they possessed themselves of that, and several other towns belonging to the Milanese. Upon this, the latter declared war, and raised a considerable army to do themselves justice, the command of which was given to Matthew, who attacked and defeated the Comefe, killed great numbers of them, and carried a large booty in prisoners and plunder to Milan. The Comefe complained most bitterly of this treatment, which they said was more barbarous than the most enraged enemies could have inflicted. Their resentment was aggravated by the consideration that they had some time before chosen Matthew for their potesta and general of their army, and had loaded him with many extraordinary honours. The remembrance of all this, with that of the great things the Comefe had done for Milan, worked them up to such a pitch of indignation, that all of a sudden they entered into a conspiracy against the Visconti family; and not only set at liberty Musca and Herecci, the two heads of the Torriani family, whom they had detained in prison ever since the battle of Decio, but raised them to be their potestas, and furnished them with arms and money.

Quarrel between the Milanese and the Comefe.

THE marquis of Montferrat was not wanting to support the Comefe in this war, and all parties in the confederacy breathed nothing but fury and destruction to Otho and Matthew. The power and reputation of the marquis rendered him a most formidable enemy; and the keenest of the two young Torriani, in resentment of an almost eight years imprisonment, was incredible. The rendezvous of the Torriani was at Parma. The event of this war proved unfortunate to Matthew, to whom the archbishop had resigned all his power, both civil and military. The Torriani and the Comefe expelled him out of Milan; and Otho dying soon after, the Torriani became again possessed of Milan, and Matthew was obliged to take refuge at the imperial court, where he was in high favour under the emperor Rodolph, who made him his vicar-general over Milan, Como, Novara, Vercelli, Alessandria, and Tortona. As to Otho himself, he did not live to see Matthew's calamities, but died at the age of eighty-seven, in August 1245.

Conduct of the marquis of Montferrat.

OTHO was a singular instance how far perseverance and intrepidity can conquer repeated misfortunes. Though he never had been bred either a soldier or a politician, yet he excelled both in the field and the cabinet; and died without feeling any other disease than the decay of nature, amidst his friends and kinsmen.

and character of Otho.

MATTHEW was born in a village near the Lago Maggiore, on the very day that the emperor Frederick is said to have been put to death by his natural son Manfred. His father Theobald died when he was young, and he became the favourite and companion of his uncle Otho, amidst all his difficulties and distresses. In strength of body and firmness of mind, as well as in constancy under every kind of fortune, he exactly resembled Otho; but in clemency and civil virtues he exceeded him. During the course of his life, he at one time or other subdued all his enemies; but never was known to take a severe revenge upon any. He was expelled out of Milan, through the practices of the Torriani, by Alberti Scotti of Placentia, and other Italian princes, who had debauched his mercenaries. Guido Torriano became master of Milan. He was, as we have seen, received by the emperor Rodolph; but upon his death, which happened soon after his expulsion, he was, with a few friends who attended him, reduced to vast difficulties; nor did he receive any assistance from the emperor Albert, who succeeded him. Upon the arrival of the emperor Henry the VIIth in Italy, the bishop of Constance repaired to Milan, and demanded of the inhabitants that the emperor should be crowned in their city with the crown of Lombardy. This demand met with some difficulty; and while he was at Asti, Matthew and the archbishop of Milan having joined together against the Torriani, repaired to him, and swore 2 fealty. The castle of Vigevano was then held by Guido Torriano^c; but it was surprised by the emperor, which forced Guido to make an humble application to him at Novara, to make an apology for what had passed; and after that, the emperor crossed the Tesin, and sent before-hand his harbinger to prepare for his reception in Milan. His approach was extremely disagreeable to Torriano; and his majesty having reason to suspect he would be opposed, proceeded with great caution; but having entered the city, he found ten thousand men drawn up under arms, which Torriano said was to oppose Matthew and the archbishop. The emperor, however, proceeded with such caution and moderation, that he procured a reconciliation between all the three parties, and obliged them to embrace each other. Next day he harangued the people from his tribunal, and published this recon- b ciliation. After that, there was some dispute between the inhabitants of Milan and of those of Mouza, concerning the place of his coronation. But at last their own crown was carried from Mouza, where it commonly was kept, to Milan, and the ceremony was performed there in the church of St. Ambrose.

HENRY being now king of Lombardy, a consultation was held about granting him a subsidy, and Matthew voted for giving him forty thousand florins, and the empress ten thousand. Torriano, to make his court with the emperor, proposed to grant him a hundred thousand; which won the hearts of the Germans, but lost those of the Milanese.
After his coronation he made no fewer than one hundred and sixty new knights. Matthew Visconti was, at this time, at the head of the Gibelin interest in Milan; but Torriano knew so c well how to make his court to the emperor, that he was under a cloud at court. Before his imperial majesty left Milan, he made a demand of the remainder of the subsidy which had been voted to him, amounting to fifty thousand florins. This produced great commotions in Milan; and Torriano having, under frivolous pretences, refused to attend him to Rome, gave some suspicion of his loyalty. This was confirmed by the great number of soldiers entertained by Torriano, and the emperor demanded a hundred hostages for the good behaviour of the inhabitants during his absence. This proposal met with great difficulties on all hands. Of those hostages, Galeazzo, Matthew's eldest son, was one; and Francesino, the son of Guido Torriano, was the other. Though their fathers were of oppo- d site factions, yet both of them hated the Germans, and both of them had a private conference, in which they mutually agreed not to attend the emperor. This agreement was concealed by Galeazzo, but betrayed by Francesino. When the day of the emperor's departure came, the hostages refused to attend him, unless their expences were defrayed;
upon which the emperor sent Nicholas, his chief minister, to demand of the senate, that they should be paid by the public. The senate refused to agree to this proposal; upon which they were locked up by Nicholas, who, upon making his report to the emperor, advised him to put them all to death. Henry rejected this cruel proposition, and the senators were set at liberty. He took new precautions, however, against any surprize; but indeed the Milanese, at this time, were ripe for any desperate attempt against the Germans; and, understanding that there had been a compromise between the Visconti and the Torriani, e they put themselves under arms. Matthew and his son were by the emperor ordered to be arrested. Matthew was too wise to expose himself and his friends to danger, and therefore presented himself without armour to the emperor. Torriano, on the other hand, fled to his own palace, which he had fortified, and the storm broke upon him and his friends.
Their houses were besieged and rifled, and many of them were put to death. In the mean while, Galeazzo was by his father ordered to surrender himself to the emperor;
but he had declared for the Germans against the Torriani, and put himself at the head of a great body of his friends. His appearance, in all probability, saved the Germans and the emperor from being cut in pieces, the main body of the imperialists lying without the city.
The Germans by his assistance prevailing, would have put to death all the Guelphs, and the f followers of Torriano, had it not been for the moderation and wisdom of young Galeazzo, who diverted their rage, by giving up the houses of the Guelphs to plunder. This behaviour of the Visconti saved Milan from destruction, and they did all they could to put a stop to the licentiousness and avarice of the Germans. This rendered them obnoxious to the latter; and they prevailed upon the emperor to banish the father to Asti, and the son to Trevise. Thus the Germans were for some time entirely masters of the city; from which the Torriani were now expelled. Matthew, however, and his son, found friends about the emperor, and both of them were recalled with great honour.

g
According to Paul Jovius, while the emperor was at Asti, Matthew, in the disguise of a countryman, made his way to his person, and falling at his feet, implored his protection, which his venerable appearance, being then above sixty years of age, soon pro-

a cured, notwithstanding the opposition of all his enemies present. It is, however, not very clear that he did not betray Torriano in the attack which was made upon the Germans; but it seems pretty certain that he had entered into no concert with the emperor, who was at first extremely jealous of him, and planted spies upon his conduct. As to Guido, being old and infirm, it was with difficulty he escaped out of Milan, and his family lost all its possessions there. Henry then gave to Matthew the supreme command of Milan under himself; and after taking all necessary precautions for its safety, he set out for Rome to be crowned. Matthew, from that time, devoted himself to the imperial interests; and being supported by three sons, men of the most consummate abilities in the arts both of war and peace, he entirely broke the Torriani faction, and acquired so many splendid victories, that b the voice of all Italy bestowed upon him the epithet of The Great. But the envy which attended his glorious actions raised him a vast number of enemies, he being now master of almost all Lombardy. Robert, king of Naples, having taken part with the pope, declared himself the protector of the Guelphs in Italy, and Matthew, as being their head, was ex-communicated. In the mean while, the emperor Henry died by poison, as was said; but Matthew not discouraged by that, nor the other cross events which happened to him, still continued to make head against the Guelphs, whom he defeated in three battles. The first was fought at Aldino, the second on the banks of the Arbe, and the third at Monte Catino, where the brother of the king of Naples was killed, and Luchin, Matthew's son and general, gave signal proofs of his warlike genius. Marc, another of Matthew's sons, headed c the Spinolas and the Dorias, and the other Genoese exiles, and shut up Robert himself in Genoa. Upon this, Bertrand Vasco, the pope's legate, renewed the sentence of excommunication against Matthew, and, in order to exasperate the people against him, laid the city of Milan itself under an interdict. This had its effect; for the inhabitants being shut out of their churches, and deprived of all sacred rites, immediately nominated twelve ambassadors to Bertrand, to avert the pope's indignation. Most of those ambassadors were enemies to Matthew, some of them of his own family, and others under the greatest obligations to his friendship, particularly Garbagnati, and Cribelli, a man of great interest in Milan, but of a restless unquiet disposition. Matthew, on the other hand, was powerful in his family, his dependencies, troops, and riches; but being now very old, he applied d himself chiefly to aggrandize his numerous progeny, which still increased the number of those who envied and hated him. The report of the deputies who had been sent to Bertrand, who were now returned to Milan, was, that he was at the head of a great army; but that they could not prevail upon him to withdraw his censures, unless the inhabitants expelled Matthew, and returned to their old form of popular government. This report threw the populace into such a ferment, that Matthew was obliged to apply for assistance to his son Galeazzo, who at that time commanded in Placentia, and who, assembling his army, marched directly to Milan. Galeazzo was at that time in high reputation all over Italy for his valour, and very popular at Milan on account of his splendor and liberality. He was no sooner arrived in the city, than his father's enemies were confounded; and the e twelve deputies at first shut themselves up in their houses, and at length took advantage of a dark night to escape out of the city. They were no sooner gone, than Galeazzo, who was endued with great natural eloquence, called an assembly of the citizens, where he so effectually laid open the designs of the Guelph faction, that he brought all the citizens over to his own party, and resettled the tranquillity of the government.

MATTHEW was now seventy-two years of age, and being again restored to his country and government, he was too wise to think of continuing in power, which he formally resigned to his son Galeazzo, by putting into his hands the imperial standard: he then repaired to the altar, attended by all the clergy who durst follow him, where he made a solemn profession of his religion, and took an oath that he never had done any thing that could f merit the censures he lay under, through the enmity of a proud and vindictive churchman. Next day he repaired to Moufa, and there he repeated the same professions. Soon after he was seized with a fever, and ordered himself to be transported in a litter to Crescentini, where he was attended by his four sons. His dying advice was full of piety and wisdom; and he had the happiness of expiring in their embraces. Such was the devotion, or superstition of the age, that the place of his interment was kept long secret, lest, dying excommunicated, his body should be torn from the grave by the implacable churchmen.

He was succeeded in the government of Milan by his eldest son Galeazzo, who had spent all his life in arms, or in combating the intrigues of his own, or his father's enemies. He had for some time been potesta of Novara, from whence he had been driven by the Guelphs; but assembling an army, with incredible expedition, he drove his enemies to Mortara, which g he besieged, took, and razed to the ground, though esteemed one of the strongest fortifications then in Italy. This raised his reputation in arms beyond even that of his father, whom in his exile from Milan he most faithfully attended through all his fortunes, till all prospect of relieving him being at an end, he entered into the French service, in which he highly distinguished himself in her wars with the English. Returning to Italy, he gave proofs of his courage, when Azzo, duke of Ferrara, was at war with the pope. In one battle he had three horses killed under him; and though he was wounded, he mounted one of his enemies horses, and, snatching his standard, he broke through the ranks, and rejoined his own troops. This, and many other acts of valour, endeared him to Azzo, who was then one of the most considerable princes in Italy, and he gave him his sister Beatrice in marriage. This lady was handsome, but nine years older than Galeazzo, and had been left very rich by a former husband. The nuptials were magnificent beyond all expression, and such as had not for some ages been seen in Italy, and celebrated by the poet Dante, who lived at the time. The great services performed by Galeazzo to Azzo raised him to the government of Treviso; and his deportment, in every respect, was so noble and majestic, that it recommended him to the particular notice of the emperor Henry VII. upon the arrival of that prince in Italy. His father's fortune, at that time, taking a favourable turn, he commanded the Milanese troops, and was highly instrumental in reducing the greatest part of Lombardy to the Visconti family; for he drove out of Placentia, Alberti Scotti, his father's ancient enemy, and made himself master of that city. He afterwards defeated Cavalabore of Cremona at the battle of Bardi, and besieging that city both by sea and land, he took it partly by force and partly by famine. His other brothers, at the same time, made a great figure in Italy. Luchin defeated and killed Bauchio, general to the king of Naples, near the Tanaro; and the renown of the Visconti family was now so great as to unite against them the pope, the king of Naples, and the Florentines. It was on this occasion that the Swissers were invited by the Guelphs into Italy; and Henry duke of Austria, with Philip of Valois, afterwards king of France, were tempted with a promise of sharing the spoils of Milan, if they would enter into the same cause. This formidable conspiracy was frustrated by the address and courage of the Visconti family. Matthew gave a large subsidy to the Germans, by which they were prevented from entering into Italy. Philip was a young prince, full of fire and courage, and passed the Alps at the head of a very noble army, in which most of the nobility of France served. As his presumption far exceeded his conduct, it exposed him to the superior abilities of Galeazzo and his brother Marc, who was joined with him in the command of the Longobardic army, and who, by the dispositions they made, might, without danger to themselves, have destroyed the whole French army. Marc was for making the best of their advantage; but Galeazzo, more considerate, was averse to making so powerful a nation as the French were, the irreconcilable enemies of Milan. He therefore prevailed with his brother to propose a conference with Philip; which being agreed to, Galeazzo addressing himself to Philip and the other French generals, represented to them the folly of exposing themselves in a foreign quarrel; and drawing out his army, he shewed them, by its position, that the destruction of the French was inevitable if they should come to blows. He, at the same time, produced the badges of knighthood with which he had been honoured by the French king, and expatiated upon the violence that must be done to his own inclinations, if he should be forced to come to extremities with his ancient friends and allies.

His death.

His successes.

He baffles the French.

THIS artful speech had all the effect that Galeazzo could desire. The Milanese army was superior to that of France in infantry, and contained five thousand excellent cavalry. This appearance struck the French princes and noblemen with astonishment, which was heightened by the graceful presence of Marc, whom Galeazzo had left at the head of the army. In short, the French chose to make peace, and returned, with no great credit to their conduct, to France.

Revolt of Milan.

AT the time of Matthew's death, a body of German mercenaries, the successors of those who had been sent to the archbishop Otho by the emperor, still served in the Milanese, but without much reputation, on account of their infidelity and rapaciousness. With them, the agents of the pope and the king of Naples entered into a conspiracy for expelling the Visconti family out of Milan, and restoring the popular government. They were backed by Leodrisio, Garbagnati, and Cribelli, and large sums were divided amongst the Germans, who were commanded by one Roger and Anchini. Those practices had such an effect, that all Milan revolted against Galeazzo, who, with his brother Marc, fled to Lodi. Upon their departure a popular form of government took place; but it was scarcely established when the Guelphs and Gibelins in the city fell at variance; and their dissensions communicating themselves to the neighbouring country, the Guelphs seized Mouza. This division plainly evinced that the new constituted form of government would be of short duration. The heads of the republic, who were mostly Gibelins, sent Leodrisio with an army to besiege Mouza, which was defended by Tignaca. Instead of waiting to be besieged, Tignaca threw down the walls of the place, and attacked Leodrisio, by whom he was defeated, and made prisoner.

- a In the mean while, the cardinal legate had appointed one of the Torriano family to succeed Galeazzo in his government, in the capacity of a potesta. This was by no means agreeable to the Milanese Gibelins; and, upon further inquiry, it was discovered that they had been made tools to the papal ambition; nor did the legate any longer continue the pay of the German mercenaries, who hated the very mention of a Guelf. In a general assembly of the Germans, Henry Grunstein, one of their chief officers, proposed to recal Galeazzo to the government; and deputies of the greatest quality in the city were sent to invite him back, without any other conditions than that he should forget what was past; and so great was Grunstein's opinion of Galeazzo's honour, that he offered to become a hostage for the performance of all he should promise. While the deputies were treating with Galeazzo, Marc returned by night, and Lecdrifio applied to him in the most submissive terms to be reconciled to Galeazzo. Next day Galeazzo entered Milan, with the same freedom and ease as he would have returned from a hunting match, or a party of pleasure. Upon his arrival the potesta Torriano, Garbagnati, and Gribelli, fled to the legate.

The Visconti restored.

- b Soon after, the papal, the Neapolitan, and the Florentine forces being joined by the patriarch of Aquileia, who likewise was of the Torriano family, and all his friends, marched to the Adda, in order to attack Milan. Their army upon the whole consisted of forty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, and was commanded by Gasto the legate's nephew, and under him by Raymond Cardona, a Spaniard, Henry of Flanders, and Simon Torriano, all of them leaders of great reputation. The van attempted to pass the Adda, near Trezzo, with Garbagnati and Cribelli at its head; but they were opposed by Marc, who killed Garbagnati and Cribelli; but their party being supported by all the strength of the Florentines, made good their passage, and Marc being satisfied with having killed the two most inveterate enemies of his family, retired to Milan.

Their danger.

- c GALEAZZO was in no condition to withstand this invasion by himself. His two brothers Marc and Luchin, however, bravely attacked the confederates, who were double their number, and would have totally defeated them, had not Luchin been wounded, and obliged to retire from the field. After that the confederates extended their quarters to Como, and even laid siege to Milan. Galeazzo, who knew they were unable to take the city, applied for assistance to Lewis V. of Bavaria, who sent him fifteen hundred horse, under the command of Bertaldi, one of his best generals, who threw himself into Milan, and did great execution upon the confederates, by the frequent sallies he made. Perceiving that the war was like to be spun out to a great length, the confederates bribed a Swiss regiment that served under Bertoldi to assassinate Galeazzo; and the plot was upon the point of taking effect, when it was discovered by John Visconti, the younger, brother of Galeazzo, who, though in orders, took arms and defeated the conspirators. This discovery, together with the death of Gasto, discouraged the other generals of the confederacy so much, that they retired to Moussa, which had been betrayed to them by Landi, and from which Azzo, Galeazzo's eldest son, had been driven. Here they remained for some time in hopes of receiving supplies from the legate; and for that purpose they threw a bridge over the Adda. Galeazzo knew the consequence of cutting off this communication, and resolved either to effect that, or force his enemies to a battle. The latter chose to fight; and, drawing their garrison out of Moussa, they marched to Vapri, where the bridge was built, and put their army in order of battle. Henry of Flanders commanded the right wing, as Simon and Passarini did the left, which was chiefly composed of Florentines. The center, which consisted of French and Neapolitans, was commanded by Raymond, and the whole was so artfully disposed, that the heavy and light armed were of mutual assistance to each other. The Milanese were commanded by Galeazzo and Marc, and the enemy evacuated Vapri, where they left all their baggage. Galeazzo ordered it to be set on fire, and, under the cover of the smoke, he charged the confederates amidst their consternation at the loss of their baggage. Marc led on the attack, and totally defeated the division under Henry of Flanders. Galeazzo, in the mean while, was victorious over the left wing; and the center being chiefly busied in endeavouring to extinguish the flames, the defeat became general. Raymond was taken, as were the principal officers amongst the Florentines; Simon Torriano was killed, and very few of the confederates escaped being either drowned in the Adda, put to the sword, or made prisoners. The standards of king Robert, the pope, the Florentines, and the Torriani, fell into the hands of the Milanese; and it was with the greatest difficulty that Henry of Flanders, next morning, after wandering all night, reached Moussa, to which the remains of the confederate army escaped.

and defeat their enemies.

- g This place was defended by Vergusio Landi; and fearing he should receive no quarter, because he was the means of expelling Azzo, he prepared to defend it to the last extremity; but Galeazzo besieged it with so much vigour, that Landi was at last obliged to agree to give it up, if he should not be relieved in a certain time by the legate. Mean while Henry of Flanders left Moussa in despair, and Passarini Torriano advancing to relieve the place, surprised prised and defeated a body of Savoyards, but was himself intercepted and defeated by Marc Visconti; upon which Mouza was surrendered according to articles.

NOTWITHSTANDING the advantages Galeazzo had gained, he found that he must, in the end, submit to the confederacy that had been formed against him; and resolved, if possible, to make a peace, but in such a manner as that he should not seem to beg it. Raymond Cordona was still his prisoner, and being looked on by all parties to be a man of great honour, as well as address, Galeazzo privately set him at liberty, but suffered Landriano and Conti, the two noblemen who had the charge of him, to be prosecuted and banished, as if they had been accessory to his escape. Raymond performed his engagements with Galeazzo with the utmost punctuality. He first repaired to Piacenza, where he had an interview with the legate, and then to Avignon, where the pope resided; and in the presence of Landriano and Conti, the two innocent exiles, he pressed his holiness so warmly in favour of peace, that he could no longer resist his arguments, but would do nothing without consulting his ally the king of Naples. The latter strenuously opposed all pacific motions, unless Galeazzo could be brought not only to abandon the cause of the emperor, but to become a party in the war against him; both which terms Galeazzo rejected with great indignation. The peace, however, was concluded, and the war of Italy was contracted to the quarrel between Castruccio and the Florentines, who employed Raymond as their general. As Galeazzo, in the late treaty, had reserved a liberty to assist the emperor's allies, Galeazzo sent his son Azzo with eight hundred chosen horse to Castruccio's assistance, and Raymond was again defeated and taken prisoner, chiefly by the valour of the Milanese auxiliaries. It must not, however, be forgot, that Galeazzo had by this time restored Landriano and Conti to their estates and honours, but without explaining the particulars of his own management.

Galeazzo accused and imprisoned,

GALEAZZO, by the late victory obtained by Castruccio and Azzo, seemed now to be at the summit of his good fortune, when he was on the precipice of danger. His brother Marc, who had performed so many signal services to him, thought they were all requited, and entered into a conspiracy with Leodrisio to ruin him. The Florentines had now given up the government of their city to Charles, prince of Tarentum, which obliged Galeazzo to form a party of the Gibelins all over Italy, for inviting the emperor Lewis V. of Bavaria to come to their assistance, which invitation was accordingly accepted of; and Lewis passing the Alps, came to Verona, the prince of which joined in the conspiracy with Marc and Leodrisio. While the emperor was at Verona, the conspirators applied to him, and accused Galeazzo of having betrayed his cause. The emperor was so poor, that at that time he took little notice of the charge; because of the magnificent presents made him by Galeazzo when he came to Como. It was not long before Galeazzo discovered the conspiracy, and that Rusco, the lord of Como, had entered into it. The charge against him was his having negotiated a peace with the pope and the king of Naples, by means of Raymond, the most dangerous enemy to the Gibelin interest of any in Italy. When Galeazzo heard of this accusation, all he said was, "While my brother accuses me, he does not consider that he is wounding himself." These words being carried to Marc, his answer was, "I will stand to all the consequences; but, by heaven! Galeazzo has no brother, because he engrosses all power to himself." The emperor took little or no concern in this dispute, farther than to endeavour to reconcile all parties, and proceed to Milan, where he was crowned king of Lombardy by the bishop of Arezzo, and most nobly entertained by Galeazzo. He was, however, staggered by the vast offers of men and money made him by Scaliger, whose ambition led him to aspire to the principality of Milan, on pretence that Galeazzo had been guilty of treason. At last, Lewis agreed to the proposal of Scaliger, who, under pretence of doing honour to the emperor, had brought with him to Milan one thousand horse, and a large body of foot, all of them choice troops. To make the resolution more practicable, Lewis required the troops in Galeazzo's pay to take an oath of fidelity to himself, which they did, and to attend him to Rome. A high court of justice being summoned, Galeazzo, his brothers, and his son Azzo, were required to appear before the emperor. Their chief accuser was Marc, who complained in the most bitter terms against Galeazzo's tyranny; and offered, in the name of the people of Milan, to supply him with money to the extent of his wishes, if he would pronounce sentence against Galeazzo.

with circumstances of cruelty,

It happened unfortunately at this time for the latter, that his finances were quite exhausted in supplying the emperor's continual wants, which he had done for three months. This inability of his made all the Germans his enemies; so that the defence he made to his charge was little attended to. After he had finished, the captain of the imperial guards decoyed him, his son Azzo, with his brother Luchin and John, into a separate room, under pretence of having a private audience with the emperor, where they were put under a strict guard, and given to understand that they were to expect death, if, in three days time, the citadel of Mouza was not delivered up to his imperial majesty; which demand was accordingly complied with, though Galeazzo's wife had retired thither, as believing it to be the only a only place where she could be safe. A few days after, all the illustrious prisoners were carried to Musca, where they were imprisoned in a dungeon, which Galeazzo had just finished for confining malefactors. Their keeper was one Rizacci, who acted as deputy for the bishop of Arezzo, appointed governor of the castle, who behaved towards them with the utmost brutality and cruelty.

It is amazing that this revolution was effected without the least commotion; and none but those concerned knew what had happened. The whole was owing to the poverty and insatiable avarice of the emperor, and to the vast promises made him by Marc, and Galeazzo's other enemies. Next day, after the princes were imprisoned, Lewis appointed four and twenty governors, chosen out of the different wards of the city, to be a regency for Milan, but gave the command of the whole to William Montfort; he then marched towards the Bresciano, where at Orzi he summoned a meeting of all his vassals, and produced to them the proofs of Galeazzo's pretended correspondence with the pope, which contained evident marks of forgery. The Gibelin princes were struck with the fate of so great a prince as Galeazzo was, and each made his fate his own. Neither he nor his son, nor his brothers, however, received any immediate relief, and the emperor proceeded to Rome, where he was crowned emperor. The fate of the Milanese princes determined the Pisans to refuse him admittance into their city; and had it not been for Castruccio, all the Gibelin interest in Italy would have declared against him. The services performed on this occasion by Castruccio, who was now the emperor's general, and first minister, gave him an opportunity of interposing in favour of his friend Galeazzo, and was backed by the other Gibelin states, and by Marc, who now began to feel remorse for what he had done. The emperor for some time continued inexorable; but the Florentines obtaining possession of Pistoia, Castruccio threatened to abandon the imperial interest, unless the Visconti were set at liberty; and he actually retired to Lucca. Upon this the emperor found it dangerous to continue their imprisonment longer; and gave orders for their being set at liberty, after remaining in captivity for nine months. No condition was annexed to their deliverance: but the captives were given to understand, that they should pay their respects to the emperor upon his return from Rome. Thus ended an affair that reflects infinite dishonour upon Lewis, who, according to all accounts, never had convicted Galeazzo, or his relations, of the least crime to deserve the punishment they met with. His artful conduct, and the reputation he had for cunning, were the foundations of the charge against him; and perhaps the greater difficulty there was in discovering proofs of his guilt, the emperor concluded him to be the more criminal. Galeazzo had no sooner recovered his health, from his long imprisonment, and resettled his family-affairs, than he resolved to pay a debt of gratitude to Castruccio, who was then intent upon retaking Pistoia from the Florentines. We have already mentioned that famous siege. Galeazzo brought to the assistance of his friend a large body both of horse and foot; and while he himself was besieged in his works, being obliged to go to Lucca, he left the conduct of the siege to Galeazzo. Upon his return, he found the works so far advanced, that he divided the command with him, by committing his care of the operations against the city, while he himself acted against the Florentines. The town at last was taken; but the excessive heat of the weather, and the fatigue of the siege, had thrown Galeazzo into a lingering distemper, so that he was obliged to be removed in a litter to Pescia, where in three days he died, at the age of fifty-one. He was a prince of great resolution and address, and was ever fruitful in finding expedients for making the government of Milan independent in his family, by balancing the papal and imperial powers, so as that neither of them should too much preponderate in Italy. He was buried at Lucca, and was attended to his grave by his friend Castruccio, who survived him but a few days.

Death of Galeazzo.

GALEAZZO was succeeded in the government of Milan by his son Aelio, or, as he is commonly called, Azzo; who united in his own person the patience, perseverance, and civil virtues of his father, and resembled his grandfather, Matthew the Great, in prudence and foresight. When he came to the government, the Visconti family made but a second figure in the affairs of Italy, by being obliged to follow the fate of the imperialists, and losing the assistance of the famous Castruccio. Azzo entered into life under great disadvantages, being born and educated in exile. He had been left governor of Piacenza, under his father, when the latter marched to the assistance of Matthew the Great; but that city was surprised by the cardinal legate's troops; and we are told, that Azzo himself must have been taken prisoner, had he not escaped by his mother's scattering some bags of gold about the doors of her house, which gained him time for getting away. Azzo thus escaping, he put himself at the head of an army composed of Milanese, Ferrarese, and Man-tuans, and reduced and fortified the town of San Demino. He then commanded the auxiliaries which his father sent to the assistance of Castruccio, and performed many celebrated services under that great captain, who owed to him some of his chief successes. When Flo- rence was besieged, or rather insulted, by Castruccio, Azzo, in return for the bravadoes of the Florentines, when they besieged *Milan*¹, celebrated horse-races under the walls of the city, and returned to Milan covered with glory. The death of his father and Castruccio, before his family had recovered its lustre, gave him great concern; but upon the retrac-tion of his uncle Marc, he wisely made that a handle for recommending himself and his family-interests to the protection of the emperor. He went to Pisa, where his imperial majesty then was, attended by his uncle John; and being seconded by his other uncle Marc, he obtained of the emperor the investiture of Milan, upon the promise of a vast sum of money, which Lewis then stood greatly in need of, his affairs being in disorder all over Italy. Amongst the difficulties he laboured under, was the danger of his own troops revolting; eight hundred of whom had already left his service. The emperor employed Azzo to bring them to their duty; and the reader will find in the history of Florence the sequel of this affair. It appears, however, that Marc Visconti was a man of much greater abilities and consequence than he is represented to be by the Milanese historian, and did both the emperor and his family very important services upon this occasion; not only by appeasing the mutineers, but by procuring several additional privileges and immunities to the Milanese. The emperor, at this time, had made Peter de Corvaria, who took the name of Nicholas V. pope; and had not only deposed, but condemned to death the true pope, John XXII. This mock pope, by the emperor's recommendation, created John Visconti, Azzo's youngest uncle, a cardinal; but Visconti, though he did not absolutely refuse the honour, for fear of disobliging the emperor, declined to wear either the hat, or any of the outward badges of that office; which recommended him so much to the true pope, that he was first made bishop of Novara, and then archbishop of Milan.

peror admittance into Milan.

AZZO having thus, with great prudence, put his family-affairs on a proper footing, returned towards Milan; where he and his uncle, the archbishop, were denied admittance by William Montfort, who still continued the imperial governor of that city, though they were welcomed, with great acclamations of joy, through all the Milanese. Azzo, however, by the help of a little money, soon got over this difficulty; and Montfort resigning his command, returned to Germany. When Azzo re-entered Milan, he was attended by Con- rade Porcari, the imperial procurator, who had been sent by Lewis to receive the money that had been promised, and which Azzo immediately borrowed out of the chests of the city.
This Porcari, having received the fourth part of the sum that had been promised, instead of returning to Pisa, went off with it to Germany. His infidelity was a great disappointment to the emperor, as well as to the troops who were to receive the money; and he was obliged to impose immense taxations upon the Pisans. He likewise sold to Raymond, and his other Florentine prisoners, their liberties; and not only seized upon the jewels of Cas- truccio's widow, but stripped his sons of the government of Lucca, which he sold to Fran- cesco Interminelli for money.

Miserable condition of the emperor.

THOSE acts of rapaciousness, injustice, and ingratitude, but above all his miserable poverty, and the contempt in which he was held by his troops, rendered the person and dignity of the emperor very despicable all over Italy. Azzo was no stranger to this; and when his imperial majesty, in his return to Italy, took Milan in his way, he was refused admittance, both there and at Mouza. He attempted, however, to force his way into the last mentioned city; but by the swelling of the Lambro he was disappointed in his design, and thus he wandered about, a laughing-stock, through all Lombardy, till he came to Paria, where he was obliged to put up with all the indignities that had been offered him, upon Azzo paying the residue of the money he had promised him. During all the rest of his journey through Italy, he met with the most gross affronts, equally from Gibelins as Guelphs.
In the mean while, Marc Visconti, who had been sent by Lewis to his German troops as a hostage for the payment of their arrears, became their general, and recovered Lucca for the sons of Castruccio, and drove Francisco Interminelli, the imperial governor, out of that city.
After that he marched against Pisa, from whence he drove Tarlatti of Arezzo. Marc, after this, repaired to Florence, and having gloriously finished his campaign, he left Tuscany; but full of wrath against his nephew Azzo, for not having sent him money for redeeming himself out of the hands of the Germans.

MARC's reputation, at this time, was very high in Italy, where he was considered as the head of the German army there. He had, before he left Florence, entered into connexions with that people, and the heads of the Guelphs in Italy, for extirpating the Gibelin party, and making himself lord of Milan; for which he was qualified by his courage, his liberality, his majestic appearance, and many other noble affections. The vast sum of money he had spent in Florence had, probably, given Azzo, and his uncles, some intimation of his designs; so that, when he returned to Milan, being narrowly watched, it was found that he

a was tampering with his friends, and the dependents of his family, to form a party. His nephew and his relations dissembled for the present; and their forbearance encouraged Marc to bring his complaints before the public, of his having been suffered so long to remain a hostage and prisoner amongst barbarians. His resentment is said to have been kindled into a kind of madness by a love-affair. He had, it seems, carried off a noble lady from her husband; and finding that she wanted to impose upon him, he had, in the first transports of his rage, drowned her in a wet ditch; but, being still distractedly in love, her death drove him almost to madness. All those concurring circumstances are said to have convinced Azzo, and his uncles, that they were upon the eve of a civil war, unless Marc b ner, by some of his nephew's body-guards, and strangled, without any noise or disturbance, and his dead body cast out of the window, as if he had thrown himself from thence in one of his fits of despair. His body had an honourable interment, in the burial-place of his ancestors; and the Florentines and other Italians, who had attended him to Milan, were civilly dismissed.

Death of Marc Visconti.

Soon after this, viz. in 1331, John, king of Bohemia, entered Italy, as the imperial vicar; but without being attached strongly either to the Guelphs or Gibelins. He reduced Brescia and Bergamo, and afterwards became master of Parma, Cremona, Pavia, Modena, and several other places. While he was on the other side of the Adda, Azzo waited upon him with some magnificent presents, and it was not long before he had reason to apprehend, c that Italy was on the eve of a mighty revolution. The pope and John, from being inveterate enemies to each other, became now intimate friends; and it was publicly talked, that Philip, the French king, was a party in the league; and that their real plan was, to divide amongst themselves all Italy. This apprehension produced an universal league amongst the Italian states, Guelphs as well as Gibelins, at the head of which was Azzo; and each party was bound to furnish a certain proportion of strength for the defence of the whole. Scaliger of Verona, Passarini of Mantua, Obizi of Ferrara, and the Florentines, were the other parties. According to the partition of power they laid down, Azzo was to have possession of Cremona and Pavia, Scaliger of Parma, Passarini of Reggio, Obizi of Modena, and the Florentines of Lucca. At this time, the Germans were besieging Ferrara, d but were defeated by the allies; Aliprandi Pinallo being at the head of Azzo's troops. The consequence of this victory was, that Pavia fell into the hands of Azzo; he likewise recovered Piacenza from Francesco Scotti, and obliged Rusca, lord of Como, to resign his dominion over that city, in exchange for Bellizzone.

A. D. 1331.
The king of Bohemia enters Italy.

AZZO, tho' yet a young man, was so severely subject to the gout, that being rendered for some time incapable of managing his own affairs, his old enemy Leodrisio renewed his intrigues against him, and found means to debauch the German mercenaries from his service, and to engage in his practices Rusca and Scaliger; the latter of whom furnished him with money for paying the mercenaries.

THE reader can be no stranger to the practices of Leodrisio against the Visconti family; e and he pursued them, on this occasion, more vigorously than ever. Having added a great body of Milanese exiles to the mercenaries he had debauched from Azzo, he passed the Adda, notwithstanding all the opposition made to him by Aliprandi Pinalla, Azzo's general. This irruption being made in winter, filled all the Milanese with consternation. The snow lay then deep on the ground, and the inhabitants found it impracticable to secure their effects or cattle in places of safety for subsistence, so that most of them fell into the enemies hands. Azzo was not wanting to himself on this occasion. Notwithstanding his lameness, he acted with astonishing vigour and activity; he reinforced his garrisons, and chose his posts with the utmost judgment and propriety. In this he was assisted by the spies, which f he entertained about Leodrisio's person while he was at Verona, and who informed him of all the particulars of his marches, and the routs he was to hold; by which he was enabled to make head against his enemies, till his reinforcements came up from Ferrara, Placentia, and other places. As he was incapable to take the field in person, he gave the command of his army to his uncle Luchin, a prince who at this time had acquired great reputation in war. Leodrisio was, with his army, at Nervi, within twelve miles of Milan, when he was met by Luchin, at the head of the flower of his nephew's troops and auxiliaries. Both sides being equally ardent to fight, the signal of battle was given, and Leodrisio's division was entirely defeated. The Germans and Swiss threw themselves into a hollow square, and soon stopped the pursuit of Luchin's troops, which being incautious and irregular, the most forward of his cavalry were checked, a great number of his men cut in pieces, and at last g the fortune of the day seemed to go against him. Luchin did all that a brave general could do, to stop the rout; but his horse being killed, he was beaten to the ground by the battle-axes, and heavy maces of the Germans, and made prisoner. The Germans and Swiss then attacked the Placentines with so much fury, that they killed Diodati Malvicino, and Lancil-

lot Anguisola, their leaders, and put their troops to flight. But while Leodrisio thus thought himself secure of victory, Hector Panici unexpectedly arrived with a fresh body of horse, sent to Azzo's assistance by the duke of Savoy. The fortune of the day was now again changed, and the Savoyards charged Leodrisio's men with so much vigour and judgment, while they were intent only upon the spoil, that they gave them an entire defeat, and Leodrisio himself was taken prisoner in his flight, and shut up in the castle of St. Columbo; where he remained prisoner during the remainder of Azzo's life, and that of his uncle.

THIS unexpected, and indeed wonderful victory, struck the Milanese with a kind of an enthusiastic transport; and Paul Jovius himself makes no kind of scruple to say, that when Azzo's army was defeated, the good St. Ambrose, the tutelar saint of Milan, was seen in the air by many, encouraging the Savoyards and the Milanese to renew the battle. Notwithstanding this ridiculous story, Luchin obtained a most complete victory. His men, after defeating their enemies, found him bound to a tree, and under a guard of Germans, whom they defeated: His victory, however, was dearly bought: above nine thousand men, on both sides, were killed on the field of battle; and Luchin was inexpressibly affected by the loss of his brother-in-law Flisco, who was amongst the slain. But the Leodrisians suffered far more from the consequences of the battle, than they did during the heat of it; being entirely strangers in the Milanese, they were knocked on the head by the country-people, or perished of their wounds, or through hunger and cold; so that few or none of them repassed the Adda. Upon the place of battle, which was fought between the villages of Parabici and Nervi, Luchin and his brother John built a church, in commemoration of the victory, and dedicated the same to St. Ambrose. This church was, in the days of Paul Jovius, visited by the magistrates and people of Milan, with great devotion and solemnity, on the anniversary of the battle, which was the 21st of February. A representation of the action was painted on the walls of the church, where the Savoyards were easily discernible by their white crosses, the arms of Savoy. Luchin is likewise there represented in the armour he wore, which is of a very singular kind, on the day of the battle.

AFTER this decisive advantage, Azzo turned his arms entirely against Scaliger, whom he considered as the source of all his difficulties; and after giving him repeated defeats, he stripped him of Brescia. After this, he turned his thoughts towards the improving and fortifying his capital, which he did by raising the walls to a great height, and adorning them with marble dragons or vipers, the ensigns of his family. He likewise introduced into the city the streams of two small rivulets, which greatly contributed to its wholesomeness and cleanliness. He also built many sacred edifices, which are to this day the admiration of Italy and all Europe, and endowed them with great magnificence and riches, particularly with regard to church-plate and habits. He died in the month of August, when he was no more than thirty-eight years of age, so worn out with the gout, that he could not, without extreme torture, bear the weight even of his bed-cloaths. He married Catharine, daughter to the duke of Savoy, a lady of the strictest virtue and chastity; but by her he left no issue. He was a prince of great perfections, handsome in his person, liberal, and affable. Many of his statues and pictures yet remain; some of them in a taste uncommon to that age.

AZZO was succeeded by his uncle Luchin, to the universal satisfaction of all the Milanese. Luchin, though a great captain, was both prudent and religious; and his first care was to procure from Benedict XII. an absolution from the ecclesiastical censures that the Milanese then lay under. He likewise recovered the immense treasures that, during the late distraction at Milan, had been carried from Mouza to Avignon. His life having been a continued series of warlike achievements, he had received so many wounds in actions, that, when he came to the government of Milan, he was unable to head his armies in person. Notwithstanding the many noble services he had performed for his country, he no sooner took upon him the government of it, than conspiracies were formed against him by his most intimate friends and relations: amongst those, one Francesco Pusterla, a nobleman of great family and fortune, and the two brothers Martin and Pinalla Aliprandi. The two last had been general officers under Azzo, and thinking themselves neglected by Luchin, they had cast their eyes upon Galeazzo and Barnabo, two young noblemen of the Visconti family, of graceful persons, and warlike dispositions, but immeasurably ambitious, and aspiring to be masters of Milan. Martin and Pinalla having entered into schemes for carrying into execution their conspiracy, met with so many difficulties, that, before they could bring them to bear, they were betrayed by Ramengo Cassati, whom they had endeavoured to bring into their schemes. Upon this discovery, Martin and Pinalla were imprisoned, and put to the torture, and at last died of pain and hunger. The other conspirators were executed on gibbets. Pusterla, who was the most criminal of them all, endeavoured to escape to Tuscany, but was retaken, and publicly executed in the great square, with the cruel mortification of seeing two youths, his sons, executed for the same crime, before his face.

a face. Soon after his wife Margaret, who not only was accessary to the conspiracy, but had been very active in carrying it on, was condemned to perpetual imprisonment; a favour she obtained by her being of the Visconti family, and nearly related to Luchin. Upon farther enquiry it was found, that the two young noblemen, Galeazzo and Barnabo, had been privy to the conspiracy, and had embarked deeply in measures for rendering it successful. Luchin would have put them to death; but his brother, the archbishop, represented to him the consequence of such a proceeding, and how obnoxious the family must become if they embroiled themselves farther in the blood of their kinsmen; the public being by no means satisfied with the justice of Marc's death. Those considerations prevailed with Luchin to banish their kinsmen to Holland; or, in the terms of Paul Jovius, to the extremity
b of the ocean, amongst the Belgians and Batavians, to punish them for their disloyalty and perfidy.

AFTER this, Luchin grew reserved, distrustful, and morose. He seldom or never was seen to laugh. His look carried with it suspicion and jealousy, and the temper of his mind was farther rankled by the excruciating pains of the gout. The character and behaviour of his wife did not a little contribute to his disgust with the world. Her name was Fusca, and she was of the family of the Fiesques of Genoa, one of the noblest in Italy, and which had furnished two popes to the holy see. In her person she was graceful, witty, and gallant, beyond any of the Lombard ladies; but she was lascivious, gay, dissolute, and expensive beyond any woman in Italy. Luchin was in his person by no means amiable; but
c young Galeazzo was looked upon to be the handsomest man of his age, though so loose in his amours, that he had an intrigue with Luchin's wife, who made him the nominal father of a spurious but promising issue, viz. Luchin, Orsino, and two twins, Borsio and Forestini. The world must have concluded Luchin to be the happiest man alive, in his family, had not the abandoned behaviour of his wife given too much reason for the public to suspect that his children were illegitimate. Luchin was able to refuse her nothing, and being laid up with the gout, she prevailed upon him to fit out a squadron of yachts, or pleasure-boats most magnificently equipped, and furnished for all the purposes of luxury, with which she proposed to pay a visit to Venice in the carnival time, or some such festal occasion. Her companions, who attended her in this expedition, were ladies of the same character with d herself, though not quite publicly so abandoned; for the reader is to observe, that the noblemen and gentlemen of Milan were at this time so much employed in the field, that they had little leisure to attend to the morals or conduct of their wives. Luchin was then confined to his bed by his gout, wounds, and other infirmities, so that his lady had her full swing of pleasure. This happened after her lover Galeazzo had been banished. The voyage was performed with the utmost magnificence and splendour; but the excesses of the company broke through all the bounds of modesty. Fusca prostituted herself to two Venetian noblemen, in the most shameless manner, as did the rest of her companions; and their secrets were so ill kept, that, upon their return, the whole came to Luchin's ears. It was easy for Fusca, from the manner of his behaviour, to perceive that he was not only ine formed of all the particulars, but that he was meditating a severe revenge; in which she was resolved to anticipate him. She therefore administered to him a slow poison, which deprived him of the remainder of his strength, so that his death was imputed to his gout and other ailments. He lived sixty-two years, of which he governed nine, and had a most magnificent burial, in the church of St. Godard, near his nephew Azzo. Notwithstanding the severity of his government, he was most sincerely mourned by the Milanese of all ranks and degrees. He was a most excellent justiciary. He was successful in banishing faction. He protected the weak against the powerful. He took great care to have his capital and his country well supplied with all kind of provisions; and it was a maxim with him, always to carry the wars he waged into his enemy's country; by which he preserved his own in f peace and plenty. He added to Milan the principality of Parma, which he bought from Obizi Atestini, who had wrested it from the Gonzagæ and the Scaligers, for sixty thousand crowns. He obliged the Pisans to pay him an honorary tribute of two horses; one of them equipped for the field, and the other a palfrey, for the use of a lady; and likewise two foreign falcons or hawks. Before his death he was preparing for an expedition against Genoa, and had raised a numerous army for that purpose. In his private life he was modest, and left no monument of magnificence behind him, excepting a palace at Pavia; but he was contented, after his accession, to live in the house that had been inhabited by his nephew Azzo. He built, however, a strong citadel at Bergamo, on the place where a chapel stood before. He was fond of living in the country, and chose for the place of his retire-g ment a spot remarkable for the salubrity of its air, but for little else, about seven miles from Como. His favourite son was Brutio, whom he had by a concubine, and whom he intended to have made the general of his expedition against the Genoese.

Luchin's wife unfaithful to him.

His death and character.

Punishment of his wife.

BEFORE we take leave of his memory, it is proper to inform the reader, that his infamous wife was so much struck with remorse for what she had done, that she retired to a life of mortification and austerity, and confessed the whole of her wicked life. The consequence was, that Borsio finished his life in prison, as Fprestini did in exile, while the third brother Morello took service under the enemies of his country. As to Brutio, upon his father's death, he invaded the government of Lodi; but he proved so intolerable a tyrant, that the inhabitants drove him out, and he died in exile and poverty, in an obscure village.

Luchin succeeded by John
the archbishop,

JOHN, the archbishop and prince of Milan, is represented as being a finished pattern of all civil and personal virtues. His accession to the government was considered by the Milanese as a public benefit. In prudence and piety, justice and moderation, he resembled the first Otho; in constancy and magnanimity, his father Matthæw; in generosity, openness of manners, affability, address, and person, his brother Galeazzo; and his nephew Azzo, in his winning deportment, and insinuating conversation; while he possessed all the virtues of Luchin, without his severity.

A. D. 1353. who acquires
Genoa,

UPON his accession to the government, his first care was to recall from banishment his two nephews, the sons of his brother Stephen. They had, during their exile, served with great reputation in the wars of the Low Countries, and sometimes in the English armies. They appeared, upon their return to Milan, dressed in the habits worn in those countries, in which they are yet seen depicted in some of the Milanese churches, as paying their devotions in thanksgiving for their return. To render their family more stable, soon after their return they married into two powerful families; Galeazzo married Bianca, the daughter of Amadeo of Savoy; as Barnabo did Beatrix, the daughter of Scaliger of Verona, a lady of so lofty a deportment, that she generally went by the name of the queen. The first warlike adventure, after their return, was to resume the expedition against Genoa; which they prosecuted with so much spirit, that they obliged the Genoese to submit to the authority of the archbishop. Paul Jovius, on this occasion, calls the Genoese general Murtha. It is certain, that Murtha was obliged to resign his authority, whatever it was; and the Genoese were forced to accept of Pallavicini, who acted as deputy for the archbishop of Milan. Murtha had been very instrumental in bringing about this revolution; but upon his death, which happened soon after, they made one Valente, or Valens, their general, in opposition to Pallavicini. The reader, in the history of Geneva, will see the state of the Genoese affairs at that time, which was as fluctuating as the tempers of the inhabitants. The archbishop, who had done every thing to sooth them, exasperated at their inconstancy, raised an army, and again proclaimed war against them. Upon this, and some untowardly events, which happened at sea, Valente was obliged to resign his command, and the Genoese, once more, received Pallavicini as their governor under the archbishop. This new submission entirely changed the face of affairs in Genoa. Pallavicini carried with him to Genoa a strong reinforcement of troops, which not only served to garrison the city, but to man their fleet. He made them a present likewise of thirty gallies, armed, manned, and victualled at his own expence. Pagano Doria was appointed admiral of the whole, and they sailed under the flag of the Visconti family; the archbishop, at the same time, taking care to provide for the expences of the expedition. The voyage was successful beyond expectation. Doria scoured the coast of Catalonia, entered the Venetian gulph, and defeated or plundered the enemy's ships wherever he came. At last he attacked their general Nicholas Pisano, whom he defeated, and returned in triumph to Genoa, carrying with him thirty-five gallies, and thirty-four smaller vessels, with above five thousand prisoners.

and Bologna.

THIS seasonable relief filled the minds of the Genoese with such transports of affection and gratitude, that, by a public decree, they continued their government in the persons of Galeazzo and Barnabo, if they should survive their uncle the archbishop; and thus the Visconti family became sovereigns of all Liguria. About the same time Pepoli, a noble Bolognese, having seized the government of Bologna, was pressed so hard by the papal arms, that he was obliged to have recourse for assistance to the archbishop of Milan, who readily gave it him. The archbishop, however, does not seem to have acted quite disinterestedly on this occasion. He obliged Pepoli to resign to him the government of Bologna, in lieu of Crepocori and Nouantola. This acquisition of so considerable a city as Bologna, rendered the Visconti family formidable all over Italy, and at last excited a confederacy against the archbishop, between the pope, the Florentines, and the Venetians. The particulars and progress of this confederacy have been touched upon in other parts of this work. It is sufficient here to say, that the confederates prevailed with the pope to excommunicate the archbishop, and to put his dominions under an interdict. This gave the archbishop very little trouble, and he appointed Oligiano to be his governor of Bologna, who acted with so much courage and success, that he easily baffled all the attempts of the pope against that city. At last an expedient was fallen upon. The pope's legate Grisanto, who afterwards became himself pope, under a under the title of Urban V. paid a visit to Milan, and entered into a negotiation, by which the archbishop was to pay every year sixty pounds of gold by way of tribute for Bologna; others say that he was to pay twelve thousand florins a year for twelve years, and a hundred thousand florins for the expences of the year.

THE archbishop of Milan became then so great as to draw upon himself the jealousy of the emperor, notwithstanding his being the professed head of the Gibelin faction in Italy. The Florentines and he never had been in good correspondence together; and he now put himself at the head of the Ubalдини, the Uberti, and the Pazzi; all of them Florentine exiles, assisted by the governors or tyrants of Arezzo and Cortona. The whole confederacy was commanded by Oligiano, who was reputed to be a relation of the Visconti family; but was in fact the archbishop's natural son, and born at the village of Oligio, from which he took his name. Oligiano drawing together his army, marched from Bologna towards Sambucco, a village belonging to Pistoia, which he took. He then appeared before Scarperia, within twelve miles of Florence. His army was composed of about ten thousand horse and six thousand foot, besides a vast number of irregulars, who proceeded with great devastation. It does not appear, however, that Oligiano's progress was so great as the Milanese historians have given out; for the archbishop very readily entered into a proposal for an accommodation; and a truce was accordingly agreed to at the little town of Serazana, belonging to the Genoese. The manager for the archbishop was William Pallavicini, and Charles Strozzi for the Florentines. It is said, that in this congress the deputies from above sixty cities and princes appeared, and the archbishop proceeded with so much moderation and justice, that he satisfied all their demands; so that none had reason to complain. He found means even to elude with a joke the pontifical thunders. For when his holiness perceived that the peace must be concluded without his intervention, he cited the archbishop to appear before him at Avignon, under pain of excommunication. Visconti received the summons with great appearances of respect; and professing himself to be the humble son of the church, he said that he would appear before his holiness as soon as he could be attended with a proper equipage answerable to his pontifical dignity. He then gave orders for magazines to be erected all over Lombardy, and for assembling troops on the frontiers of his dominions. Not contented with this, he bought up all the provisions, and hired all the inns that lay on the road to Avignon; so that his holiness soon saw himself deprived of the most beneficial part of his revenue by the recourse of churchmen, and other strangers, being stopt up to his court. Upon this, sending for the Milanese agents, he asked what their master's meaning was by making such immense preparations, to make up a difference that might be otherwise accommodated? The agents answered, as they had been instructed, that their master was under a necessity to make such preparations, that he might do the more honour to his holiness, by appearing before him at the head of seven thousand horse, and as many foot. The pontiff understood the meaning of this answer; and replied with a smile, that the archbishop had no occasion to put himself to so much trouble and expence, and that he willingly dispensed with his appearance. Upon this answer, the archbishop ordered all the magazines, and the vast provisions he had amassed, to be gratuitously divided amongst the most reputable inhabitants of the country, or those whose circumstances were but indifferent; and thus all the religious houses and the poor were amply provided for some months. This conduct, at once generous, charitable, and wise, rendered the archbishop extremely popular in Lombardy, and procured him a number of real friends, to the great terror of his enemies.

A confederacy against him.

His management with the pope.

TOWARDS the end of his life, however, the perpetual stream of success that had attended his government, excited the jealousy of the neighbouring princes so greatly, that a new confederacy was formed against him by the families of Este, Gonzaga, and Scaliger, which had each of them been in alliance with him. They accordingly attacked him with a numerous army, and besieged him in his camp, near Modena, where, being bravely repulsed, they fell into the Cremonese, which they filled with devastations. Notwithstanding this, the archbishop had taken his measures so well, and had fortified his camp so strongly, that he threatened to make himself master of Reggio and Modena; by which he must have extended his dominions from Bologna to Placentia, all upon his own territory. But he was in the mean time seized with a slow fever, which, after various attacks, put an end to his life, in the month of September, when he was sixty-three years of age. He was buried near his predecessor the archbishop Otho; and it must be acknowledged that his reign, which lasted but seven years, was an almost uninterrupted course of felicity. We have one thing to add to his character, which was uncommon to that age, which is, that though he appears to have been far from a libertine, yet he laughed at the ridiculous pretences, and detested the tyranny of the papal power.

Fresh confederacies against him.

His death,

NOTWITHSTANDING the great abilities of archbishop John, he made a very unequal distribution of his dominions at the time of his death. By his brother Stephen he had three nephews. The eldest was Matthew, commonly called Matthew the Second. The next was Galeazzo; and the youngest, Barnabo. The two last we have several times mentioned; but the former was a prince entirely given to his pleasures, and made little or no figure in life. By the last will of archbishop John, all his territories were to be divided amongst those three brothers. Milan and Genoa were to be governed by two of them, and the rest of the dominions was to fall by lot to the third. Matthew obtained for his portion, Bologna, Lodi, Placentia, Parma, and Bobbio, together with many other rich towns and provinces. Oligiano at that time was in possession of Bologna; and the Bolognese understanding that archbishop John was past recovery, ran to arms, in order to assert their independency; but Oligiano took his measures so well, that they were defeated and capitally punished. He then repaired and fortified the citadel of Bologna, which had been begun by archbishop John; and finding himself, as he thought, secure against all opposition, he seized the reins of government in his own right, and expelled Matthew's potesta out of the city. Matthew himself was so much immeried in sensuality and luxury, that he made no attempts to recover his right, but spent his days in hawking, and his nights with women, in the most infamous course of debauchery, if we are to believe some historians of his family; and this course of debauchery threw him into a consumption, which put an end to his life in the second year of his government.

Account of Galeazzo II.

and his brother Barnabo,

It seems however pretty certain, that Valentina his mother was firmly persuaded that he was taken off by poison at Sarona, one of his country-seats, half-way between Milan and Como; for which she never ceased to curse the two brothers to her dying day. It is said, that in conversation Matthew dropt some words reflecting upon archbishop John for the division he had made of his dominions, and hinted that there could be no enjoyment of power with a partner. His words were construed so much to his disadvantage, that the two brothers poisoned him in a dish which he was very fond of. He left two daughters, but no son. His wife was Liliola Gonzaga, daughter of the duke of Mantua. His daughters were Catharine and Ursina. The former was married to Balthazar Pusterla, a nobleman of great rank and riches, and the latter to Ugoline Gonzaga, a famous warrior. This Matthew II. lies buried at Milan without a stone or inscription.

GALEAZZO II. was, as we have seen, remarkable for the beauty of his person, which he adorned with the utmost art and elegance of that time. When young, he had paid a visit to the Holy Land, where he had obtained the honour of knighthood; and while he served in Germany, he killed in single combat, a nobleman, whose device he afterwards always made use of, consisting of two torches of fire, and two buckets of water hanging by a ragged branch, which device continued in his family even in the time of the Sforzas. When the emperor Charles IV. came to Milan to be crowned, he was constituted the imperial vicar over all Lombardy, in conjunction with his brother Barnabo; and during the ceremony of the inauguration the emperor bestowed the honour of knighthood on the sons of both, though then very young. The one was John Galeazzo, afterwards the first duke of Milan, and one of the greatest princes of his time; and the other was Marc, the son of Barnabo, who made no great figure. The ceremony of the coronation being over, the emperor having received vast sums at Milan, in return for the new honours he had bestowed on the two brothers, returned to Germany. It is surprising that those two brothers, tho' men of great ambition and intrigue, had not the smallest difference with each other during the whole course of their lives; but upon the death of their brother Matthew they made an exact division of the whole heritage. Bologna fell to the share of Barnabo, which was still held by Oligiano under the protection of the pope, and gave rise to a bloody war. The Visconti family was so formidable at this time, that the Italian princes laying aside all their domestic quarrels, united against them, as did Conrad Landi, and Marcoald, two German generals, who had been left in Italy by the emperor, and who entered into the pay of the confederates. At this juncture all Italy was full of foreign mercenaries; and the two Germans had no difficulty of bringing an army into the field, with which they invaded Lombardy, and carried their ravages to the gates of Milan. Galeazzo and Barnabo were obliged for some time to put up with those insults; but at last, drawing together their troops, they gave the Germans battle at Casa, and defeated them. Marcoald was taken, and Landi escaped, after a bloody engagement, in which six thousand horse, and four thousand foot, were either killed or made prisoners.

also besiege Bologna.

BARNABO then led his victorious troops against Bologna, where he found a much greater resistance than he expected. The Florentines, the Pisans, the Ferrarese, the *Mantuan*s, and the Veronese, alarmed at the event of the late battle, ranged themselves under the banners of the pope's legate Egido, in defence of Bologna; and the marquis of Montferrat, to give Galeazzo's troops a diversion, invaded the Milanese with great fury. He took Alba by surprise, and made himself master of Pavia, from whence he expelled the Guelphs. We have in the history of Florence given an account of the arrival of the English in Italy. Besides those who served under Hawkwood, a large body was employed by Galeazzo's

a Galeazzo, and by their means he recovered Alba and Pavia, and took a monk, one Buffelario, who had incited the Pavians to revolt, prisoner. This fellow made a desperate resistance, and had become master of the city, which was with some difficulty recovered. Galeazzo had then leisure to march to the assistance of his brother, who had been defeated in several battles by the troops under the legate; so that Oligiano perceiving Bologna to be no longer tenable, gave it up to the legate, in exchange for Fermo. All this while Barnabo continued to carry on the war with great vigour, equally against the legate as against Oligiano; which induced the confederate states to send, by way of diversion, an army into the Milanese, in hopes of drawing Barnabo out of the Bolognese, and obliging him to pass the Po.

b But Ugoline having passed that river, and taken Novara, was encountered in his turn by a war of diversion. Galeazzo fell into the Mantuan, and having taken Seralio, a fortification on the banks of the Po, all the Mantuan lay open to his invasion, which so terrified the inhabitants of that city, of which Ugoline was prince, that while he thought himself in the high career of victory, he was obliged to fly to the relief of his own subjects, and to conclude a new treaty with Galeazzo and his brother.

This accommodation was far from diverting Barnabo from his design of recovering Bologna, which he considered as having been taken from him by treachery. While the fate of this war was depending, Galeazzo, whose spirit aspired beyond almost any prince of his time, resolved to raise his family by two royal matches. The first was by marrying his son with the daughter of the king of France, which match accordingly took place; and the next was, by marrying his daughter Violante to prince Lionel, duke of Clarence, the second son of Edward III. of England. This match had been proposed about the year 1366; and Humphry Bohun, earl of Northampton, was appointed, on the part of Edward, to negotiate the marriage. The affair continued in dependence for almost two years; but at last it was concluded chiefly by the intervention of Sir John Hawkwood, whom we have so often taken notice of in the course of this history, and who was afterwards married to a natural daughter of Barnabo. Galeazzo gave two hundred thousand crowns of gold, and the cities of Mondovi and Alba, in dowry, with his daughter. The marriage was concluded at Windsor on the 25th of April 1368, and Galeazzo advanced ten thousand florins as part of his expences for the treaty. The English historians pretend that Edward agreed to this match upon positive assurance given him, that the Italian states, particularly the two princes of Milan, the republic of Florence, and that of Venice, would unite in choosing prince Lionel emperor. There is nothing improbable in this, when we consider the dispositions of the Italian states, and the vast aversion they had to the German emperors; and the little danger they had to apprehend from Edward, whose power and reputation was, at this time, beyond that of any prince in Europe. The marriage was celebrated on the 29th of May in the great church of Milan. The magnificence and splendor of the nuptials were inexpressible. Above two hundred English noblemen and gentlemen attended on the bridegroom, and at every course most magnificent presents were sent to the attendants of the English prince, and such as few crowned heads in Europe, at that time, could have equalled. Amongst other presents, were no fewer than seventy beautiful horses, with rich trappings of silver and silk, massy pieces of plate, curious falcons and dogs, javelins, swords, coats of mail, breast-plates, helmets splendidly adorned and finely worked, scarfs embroidered with pearl, military belts, and a profusion of wearing apparel of all kinds, adorned with jewels of immense value. As to the entertainment itself, it was so extravagant, that when the dishes were carried off the table, they were more than sufficient for ten thousand men. We must not forget that Francis Petrarch, the famous poet of Italy, was one of the guests on this occasion. We have thought proper to mention those particulars, to give our readers some idea of the immense riches and magnificence of the Milanese court at that time.

Marriage between the princess of Milan and the duke of Clarence.

f THE English prince did not long survive his nuptials. The change of climate, and manner of living, threw him into a fever; and, after he had put his worldly affairs in order, he died at the city of Alba, not without great suspicion of poison, on the 17th of October. This suspicion was increased by many circumstances, particularly the total alteration which his elevation to the imperial dignity must have introduced into the affairs of Italy, as he could have had no other dominion there but the kingdom of Naples. The lord Edward Spencer was convinced that the duke had foul play for his life: and his suspicion fell at first upon the Visconti family; but they cleared themselves to his satisfaction, and the princess was a second time married to the marquis of Montferrat, who was assassinated by a boor upon the mountains of Parma.

Death of the latter.

g GALEAZZO had now a son grown up with the most promising appearances of genius and capacity; and the rest of his life was one continued course of prosperity. After he had happily finished all his wars, the particulars of which the reader will see in other parts of

Character, magnificence, and of this work, he retired to taste the fruits of leisure with a few studious companions, amongst whom was Francis Petrarch. By his persuasion he built a noble library, and founded the famous university of Pavia, under the patronage of the emperor Charles. Though he was naturally mild and averse to punish, yet when it became necessary, he was inexorable. An instance of this was the case of Picardoni Vassalli. This person, who was of a mean original, had attended him during his exile; and when he was restored to Italy, he, in recompence for his fidelity, had made him his chief financier, and entrusted him with his treasures. Vassalli was not proof against corruption, and oppressed the people so cruelly, that all the subjects of the Milanese joined in impeaching him. Galeazzo gave him up to justice; and, after a regular trial, being found guilty, he was hanged on a gibbet. Galeazzo refused to suffer any of his ill-gotten wealth to come into the treasury; and observed, that his crime was aggravated by the criminal's ingratitude and insensibility of the low station from which he had been raised. He discovered another instance of justice, in the punishment he inflicted upon the podesta of Vico, whom he ordered to execute the law immediately upon certain banditti and murderers, who had been condemned to death. The podesta, by the interposition of the friends of the malefactors, delayed their punishment till Galeazzo returned to Pavia. While he was there, the friends of the condemned applied to him for their pardon, which he readily granted, as thinking they had been for some time dead. Finding his mistake, he ordered the podesta's head to be struck off, before the prison-door, for disobeying his orders.

Galeazzo.

In his buildings Galeazzo was excessively magnificent, and affected both to imitate and to rival the Roman magnificence in architecture, as may be seen by the citadel which he raised at Milan, and the vast porticoes and squares which he erected for public spectacles. His bridge over the Tesin was looked upon to be a master-piece; and even Petrarch himself, who was very sparing of his compliments to great men, admired the palace he built on the north side of Pavia, so greatly, that he said, "Galeazzo in his former works had outdone the greatest potentates in Europe; but in that palace, that he had outdone himself." The whole was filled with noble pictures, and enclosed by a wall fifty miles in circumference. The great number of families that were turned out of their possessions, to make this immense work, created next to a rebellion against Galeazzo, who, it seems, was not very generous in indemnifying the possessors for what they had lost; and one Bartholo Sista, being turned out of his paternal estate, was so exasperated at Galeazzo, that he wounded him in the belly with a knife, which must have killed him, had it not met with part of his armour. The ruins of this park, and some parts of the magnificent buildings, remained in the time of the emperor Charles V. the battle of Pavia, where Francis I. was taken prisoner, having been fought within its walls. Paul Jovius has given us the Latin inscription which was upon one of its sides. At last, upon retaking Asti, and raising the siege of Vercelli, the worldly happiness of Galeazzo seemed to be complete; and he died in the year 1378, in the fifty-ninth year of his life, and the twenty-second of his reign.

History of Barnabo.

WE are now to attend the fortunes of his brother Barnabo, so called from his grandfather by his mother's side, who being of the family of Doria, famous for their exploits at sea, was thought to inherit somewhat of the boisterous unsteady temper of that element. Barnabo was in his person brave, and endowed with singular firmness, both of mind and body. He spent his time in action, and scarcely ever had a minute of respite from war; for no sooner did he finish one quarrel than another instantly broke out. He was, however, so liberal, that he was served with cheerfulness by his soldiers. His obstinacy in endeavouring to retake Bologna from Oligiano produced a formidable conspiracy against him, at the head of which was the pope. The real design of the confederates was to have exterminated the Visconti family. For this purpose they had hired English, Spaniards, French, and all kinds of foreign auxiliaries; and at last the emperor Charles IV. was called into Italy. In this contest Barnabo was twice defeated; once near Bologna, and again at Guaftalla; but he repaired his losses with wonderful address. He had a naval engagement upon the Po, in which he had so much the superiority, that he not only defeated his enemies, but built a strong fortress at Borgo, which he defended against the emperor; and laid great part of the Mantuan under water, by piercing the mounds and dykes of the Po. At last, all parties being weary of war, the duke of Bavaria undertook to mediate a peace, which ended in Barnabo being obliged to abandon his enterprize upon Bologna, and the emperor renewing his ancient engagements with the Visconti, after which he returned home with a large sum of money paid him by Barnabo.

Expences of the Visconti family.

THOUGH the latter was thus obliged to give up Bologna, which he had so long and so earnestly struggled for; yet it was some indemnification to him that he acquired Reggio, by paying Feltrino Gonzaga a sum of money for the purchase. Paul Jovius says, that during the nine years in which the contest about Bologna lasted, the two brothers of the Visconti

a conti family expended upon it no less than three hundred millions of gold; but this sum seems to be incredible, as America was not then discovered, unless we suppose the species of the money to have been very insignificant, which we scarcely can do, as the lowest gold coin we know at that time, amounted to above half-a-crown English. The same author remarks, that this vast expence was the more extraordinary, as both brothers were extravagantly fond of building. We are told, that Barnabo erected a bridge over the Adda, built of three stories, one above another. The lower was for chariots and heavy carriages, the middle for horses, and the uppermost for infantry and foot-passengers. He likewise erected a bridge of so amazing a construction, that it was carried over houses and lands, and the buildings left intire. According to Paul Jovius, some part of this surprising work was visible in his time. He built the castle of Brescia, and that of Mouza; but perhaps the noblest works he erected were the prisons of Milan, where civil debtors were confined in noble, but secure apartments, and provided with all the necessaries of life. Those particulars were not the whole of his expence. He married one of his daughters, Viris, to Leopold duke of Austria; another, Thadea, to Stephen; and a third, Magdalen, to Frederick, dukes of Bavaria. Another of his daughters he married to Frederick king of Cyprus. Another, Agnes, to Francesco Gonzaga. Another, Catherine, to his nephew John Galeazzo. Two others, Antonia and Anglefia, to Conrade and Frederick of Wirttemberg, dukes of Suabia: and he gave Lucia to Edmund, king Edward the III^d's son.

c THOSE daughters were all legitimate; but he had a numerous progeny that was illegitimate. He gave his daughter Doninia in marriage to Sir John Hawkwood, and Lucia to Landi, a German nobleman; and each of them had in apparel and fortune a million of crowns of gold. In all other relations of life, he was equally splendid and magnificent. He had five sons that were legitimate, Mark, Lodovick, Rodolph, Charles, and Mastino: all those were provided for separately and independently, with appointments befitting sovereign princes. Of natural sons he had Ambrose, Ustorgius, Palamede, Lancelot, and Sacramore, who all took the name of Visconti; and upon the death of Philip, the last male branch of the family, they were acknowledged as legitimate. Of those, Ambrose made a great figure in war; and by the assistance of the English, whom he headed upon the death of Hawkwood, he made war upon the pope, the queen of Naples, the Florentines, and the Genese, with various success. At last, while he was keenly engaged in war in the Bergamese, he fell into an ambush of mountaineers, in prosecuting some advantages he had obtained, and was cut off, to the great affliction of his father, who, in revenge, put all who had a hand in his death to the sword.

d THIS division of government proved fatal to his family. He and his brother had till then lived in the strictest friendship with each other. But after his children grew up, their desires were enlarged; and, by the instigation of their mother, the queen as she was called, they began to consider their uncle Galeazzo to be an obstacle in the way of their preferment. In those ambitious notions they were flattered by the queen so far, that they formed schemes for possessing themselves of the undivided succession; and the queen dying in the mean time, Barnabo gave himself entirely up to the madness and ambition of his sons. The vast expences of his government had, in some degree, rendered this necessary for his affairs; but he little knew the character of his nephew John Galeazzo, son to his brother Galeazzo II.

Division of their territories.

e THIS prince, one of the most artful of any in his time, had hitherto affected only the title of count of Virtue. He affected a solitary unambitious life, and even to have a turn for devotion; but in the mean time he had filled his uncle's court with spies, who informed him of the most minute particulars relating to the government; and discovered at length, that nothing but dissimulation could prevent his being deprived of life or fortune, or of both. To take away all suspicion of his designs, he reduced his table and manner of living to a narrow compass, and entertained none about his person whom he could not thoroughly trust, both in point of courage and honour. To give the greater colour to his caution, he pretended that he took all those measures to guard himself against certain ambitious courtiers, who wanted to take advantage of the inclination he had for devotion, and that it was necessary for him to keep for some time upon the defensive, at least till he should pay a religious vow; after which he intimated, that he was determined to retire from the world.

Art of John Galeazzo.

f JOHN GALEAZZO acted his part so well, that even his cautious uncle had no suspicion of his secret sentiments. He seemed to be afraid, even to a degree of religious timidity, of appearing abroad; and when he did, it was only with a caution and diffidence that rendered him next to ridiculous and contemptible. Those arts concealed his designs so well, that he several times applied to his uncle for his interest to procure him a quiet retreat, as soon as his religious vows were performed. One of those was to pay a visit to the church of the Blessed Virgin upon Monte Varezio. This was to be done so secretly, that all kinds of eye-witnesses were to be excluded. It was with difficulty that Barnabo himself, and two of his sons, were permitted to wait upon him at the gate of Vercelli, to pay him their compliments. But no sooner were they arrived there, than, upon a concerted signal, all three were suddenly made prisoners; and the private orders that had been given to the troops, who were advancing from all quarters, were immediately put into execution. The gate and castle of Jove, as had been before agreed on, served to confine the illustrious prisoners; the principal passes of the city were immediately seized; and to secure the troops in the interest of John Galeazzo, they no sooner were admitted into the city, than the houses of the chief friends of Barnabo were given up to be plundered. This and many other incidents encreased the public disorders; nor did any unanimity appear, but in the execrations that were poured out on all sides against Barnabo. The booty in plate, money, hangings, and all kinds of rich furniture, was immense. The ministers of the late government were dragged from dunghills, where they had concealed themselves, and put to various deaths; and at last the citadel itself fell into the hands of Galeazzo, who found in it a vast sum in ready money.

Tyranny of Barnabo,

FEW revolutions were ever known to be so sudden, so unexpected, so effectual, and so bloodless, as this was. It cannot be accounted for, otherwise than by reflecting on the acts of tyranny, into which Barnabo's dotage for his family drove him. He had for some years lived a scourge to his people, and every day had produced fresh instances of his rapacity and cruelty. At last his avarice exceeded all credibility; he instituted a chamber of enquiry, for punishing all who had been, for five years before, guilty of killing boars, or of eating them at another's table. They who could not redeem themselves by money were hanged, and above one hundred wretches perished in that manner; while others, who had any thing to lose, were stripped of all their substance, and obliged to labour at the fortifications, and other public works. Amongst the other ingenious arts of oppression, he obliged his subjects to maintain a great many hunting-dogs, and each district was taxed at a certain number. The overseers of his dogs were, at the same time, the instruments of his rapacity. When the dogs were poor and slender, their owners were always obliged to pay a fine; when they were fat, a penalty was incurred, for their being suffered to live without exercise. Perhaps a great part of Barnabo's cruelty and oppressions was owing to his family; but some cruelties he was guilty of, admitted of no alleviation.

who is deposed,
made prisoner,
and poisoned.

BARNABO, however, in his extreme misery, being carried prisoner from Milan to Tritici, a castle of his own building, found one person faithful to him, and that was his mistress Doninia Porra, who, when he was abandoned by all the world, shut herself up a voluntary prisoner in his chamber, and watched over him to the last day of his life, which lasted seven months after his degradation. It is reported, that he was poisoned in a dish of lentils, of which he was fond, and died in the arms of his beloved Doninia, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, and the thirtieth of his government. His body was buried at Milan, and his tomb was adorned with an equestrian statue of white marble, representing him to the life, but without any inscription; though that of his wife, who died before him, had a most magnificent one.

THE reader, after what is said, can be at no loss to form a character of Barnabo, who certainly out-did all the princes of his age in magnificence and liberality. He was a man of undaunted spirit, and proof against both reverses of fortune. The vast treasures he expended, and the continual flow of his liberality, seems to countenance an opinion, that certain sources of treasure were shut up after the discovery of America, either by commerce taking a new turn, or by the old channels of it being discontinued. Be that as it will, it is certain that Barnabo's expences were so intolerable, that they drove him into rapaciousness, which seems to have been the cause of his own and his family's destruction.

Character of John Galeazzo,
first duke
of Milan.

JOHN GALEAZZO, the first duke of Milan, gave early in life so many proofs of strong judgment and genius, that it was a common report that they were too pregnant to be lasting. If we are, however, to form our ideas by the writer of Petrarch's life, no great dependence is to be laid on such appearances. We are told, that that poet, while at Galeazzo's court, when this John was no more than seven years of age, was, by a kind of divine instinct, chosen by the boy to fill his father's seat, as being the wisest personage in the company. This accident might have been unobserved, had the thing happened to a person of less consequence than Galeazzo proved afterwards to be, or had it been delivered by any other than a fanciful Italian author, who magnifies every thing into miracles. It is certain, however, that Galeazzo, through the care of his father, had a most excellent education. He was early initiated in all kinds of arts and sciences that were proper to form his mind; and his own application and genius kept pace with the cares

a cares of his tutors. His education was digested into a regular system, under the best tutors that that age afforded; and every part of it gave strength and solidity to another. His father had seen a great deal of life, but was sensible that his genius had not been cultivated by study to the best advantage, which made him the more careful of his son's education. Being taken out of the hands of nurses, he was put into those of the most learned men, and the greatest philosophers of that age. The reader is to observe, that the liberal arts were at this time but in their twilight, and the troubles of Greece had driven into Italy the learned Byzantines, to whom literature owed its revival. The reader, in another part of this work, will see the occasion of those learned Greeks opening public schools in Italy. It is incredible, how eagerly the Italians embraced the calls of learning. We have already mentioned the case of Florence; but if that city had the honour of reviving the Greek erudition, it is certain that Milan gave it its encouragement; and it was there that one of the most noble academies, or rather universities in Europe, broke forth all at once. In the civil law Baldus was eminent, and the two Raphaels, Fulgosius and Comensis, together with Signaroli Amadeo. In philosophy, Hugh of Sienna, Blasius of Pellicani, a Parmesan, were eminent, the latter being an excellent astronomer, and well versed in optics. The three chief professors of physic were Marsiglio of Santa Sophia, Sillanus Niger, and Antonio Vacca. Chryseolas of Bizantium, whom we have already mentioned, was eminent in the knowledge of the Greek language; and from the great encouragement given him at the court of Milan, he opened schools in that city; but Peter Philargi of Crete, who was afterwards pope, under the title of Alexander IV. was, perhaps from the great eminence to which he afterwards arrived, considered as being at the head of the academy.

A.D. 1350.

Young Galeazzo was the principal object of attention of all those learned men. A regular academy was now founded at Pavia; noble salaries to the several professors were appointed, and apartments assigned them for the education of youth. A fine library was erected, composed of the best authors in languages, arts, and sciences, in which the students spent their time, while they were not attending the public lectures. It happened fortunately for young Galeazzo, that this early initiation in the study of the liberal arts, rendered them at last habitual to him. He went through his exercises in common with the meanest student; and being kept ignorant of all the luxuries and avocations of life, but those which his health absolutely required, he had no emulation but to excel in learning, and in those studies that could contribute to render him a great prince. His intervals of leisure from study were not spent in gaming, hunting, or any of those diversions that enervate the mind; and he abstained from the company even of those buffoons which formed the chiefest delight of the Italian courts in those days. All his recreations tended to health alone, without excess of any kind.

Plan of his education,

Such was the plan of Galeazzo's education; so that it must have been next to a miracle, if he had not turned out an extraordinary person. The reader, however, is not to imagine, that in this scheme of education, those exercises were omitted that become a prince. Riding and bodily exercises of all kinds succeeded the more sedentary studies; but none of them were considered as detached from the general plan of educating a prince and a warrior. In short, according to Paul Jovius, in forming him very little was left to chance, all fell in with the great idea of fitting a great prince for the cabinet, as well as the field. Even his conversation had that tendency; and his amusements, though they would have been severe studies to any other but himself, became habitual delights.

GALEAZZO's education was in every respect so common, that it comprehends matters that seemed to be remote from literature. Having in his father's life-time an independent fortune of his own, he accustomed himself to keep exact and regular accounts of all his receipts and disbursements, which he ordered regularly to be entered in a fair legible manner. He was equally careful in examining into the private characters of his officers, and had secret censors appointed, who rewarded or punished them according to their merits. His great maxim was, that one of the chief secrets in life was to connect military and civil knowledge, so as to make them depend on each other. He was so exact an economist, that he could, at one glance, examine all his public and private expences, and he never failed to know, even to a farthing, the real state of his finances. In like manner, he every day reviewed his growing as well as his actual expences, and he kept regular journals of all events that arose in his government. But though Galeazzo was exact, yet he was not little. He seemed to be an economist, only with a view of knowing how much he could spend; nor did he suffer the minutest incidents to pass unobserved. His generosity appeared to be unbounded to those who served him well, either in war or peace; and he was, in short, an eminent instance of the force of education and method, without restricting himself in the most liberal expences, that munificence itself could desire.

SUCH is the character and description, that Paul Jovius has left us of this extraordinary prince; nor is it easy to perceive, that it has been in any degree exaggerated. If Galeazzo was not so great a conqueror as some of his contemporaries, that is to be attributed to his philosophy and constitution. He laid the foundation of his military knowledge amongst the English, while they served in the Milanese, under his father and his uncle Barnabo. When he was twenty-three years of age, he was by his father put under the name of Count of Virtue, in possession of Novara, Vercelli, Asti, and Alessandria, by which his territories became exposed to the marquis of Montferrat, who always was the enemy of his father's family, a restless ambitious prince. As his father had some reasons not to appear openly against that marquis, Galeazzo and he had a war together, without the father seeming to concern himself in it; but he was betrayed by the Guelph faction; for the cause of the marquis of Montferrat was espoused by the Savoyards, though that prince, then the count de Maurienne, was uncle to Galeazzo; and the Fiesques of Genoa taking part with the marquis, invited to their assistance the pope's troops, who besieged Galeazzo in the castle of Vercelli, and reduced him to such straits, that he was unable to resist the united force of his enemies, and obliged to give it up. His difficulties were increased by the defection of Sir John Hawkwood, who took part with the Florentines, and joined with them and the pope; so that Galeazzo was conquered; and all his troops being cut in pieces or taken prisoners, it was with the utmost hazard that he escaped out of the hands of his enemies.

His misfortunes,

ALL those misfortunes happened during the life-time of his father; but his conduct was so unexceptionable, that he rather gained than lost reputation by them. When his father died, he intirely altered his conduct; and pretending that his ill successes in war discouraged him from attempting any thing farther in person, he resigned the command of his armies to his generals. To give the more countenance to this retirement from the labours of the field, which was, in fact, occasioned by the practices and visible ambition of his uncle Barnabo and his family, he pretended that he had his horoscope cast (a practice then very common in Italy) and that it had been foretold him, that he could make no kind of figure in a war, and that a private inoffensive life was his only sphere of action. He gave out at the same time, that he was resolved to retire from all kinds of public business; and it was in this interval, that he effected the wonderful revolution we have already taken notice of, and which rendered him the sole master of Milan. But all his affectation did not prevent his employing the ablest generals, and the best troops he could find in Italy, as the reader may see in the history of Florence; so that at last he made himself master of Pavia, the particulars of which we shall not here repeat; we shall therefore keep to generals.

In a few years the course of Galeazzo's victories seemed to threaten the utter subjection of all Italy to his power. At last, the emperor Ladislans formally created him, by patent, duke of Milan; an honour to which none of his predecessors had till then attained, though virtually they were so before. According to Paul Jovius, the ceremony was performed by sending him a ducal cap and a scepter. This rendered him the most potent prince at that time in Italy. His troops were incomparably the best disciplined, armed, and paid, of any upon the continent; and his character, in point of prudence and politics, drew to his service all the generals of the greatest reputation in Europe; so that even sovereign princes served under his banners, or rather princes, who, though not sovereign in a literal sense, knew no superiors. He dispossessed the Scaligers of Verona and Vicenza, and the family of Carrara, of Pavia, by taking the elder Francesco prisoner, and carrying him captive to Mouza. He likewise reduced Treviso, Feltri, Bellano, Trent, and all that mountainous district, under his power. The people of Perugia and Assisi revolted to him from the pope. The Siennese having been long fluctuating between the Florentines, the papal power, the imperialists, and the Neapolitans, submitted to him, as did the Pisans, and at last the Lucqueses themselves.

His quarrels with the Florentines.

THE Florentines were the most concerned of any people in Italy, to prevent the growth of this enormous power. They were then in high reputation, and the only state who was capable to make head against Galeazzo; but unable to do any thing of themselves, they were obliged to have recourse to their neighbours. They endeavoured to stir up a kind of a crusade against Galeazzo, and for that purpose sent their ambassadors all over Europe, to excite not only the Italian, but other states, to a sense of their danger, which they said was too threatening to be longer confined within the bounds of Italy. This rendered that country the seat of a most terrible war, in which the French and the imperialists were equally involved. The Florentines would willingly have kept fair with Galeazzo, and had actually celebrated festivities upon his receiving the ducal honours; but perceiving that he assisted their enemies the Pisans, both parties continued for some time in a state of neutrality, though each underhand supported the party that seemed to be the most favourable

a ble to it. According to the Florentine historians, Galeazzo had formed a dangerous conspiracy, by which he intended to effect a total revolution in Florence, by letting loose a gang of banditti, to make themselves masters of that city; but this conspiracy was timely discovered and prevented by the punishment of the conspirators. There is, however, sufficient grounds for believing the parties accused to have been innocent of the charge, and that the whole was the contrivance of one faction against another. Galeazzo, at that time, was carrying on a war in Lombardy, where he was defeated, and forced to raise the siege of Mantua; upon which he was obliged to recal his general, count Alberigo, from Lombardy; but by that general's address, all the disadvantages they had sustained were soon repaired; though, on the other hand, Paul Savelli, the head of the Milanese troops, b who had taken possession of Pisa, was intirely defeated; and had it not been for the vast address of Galeazzo, who prevented a sincere reconciliation between the Florentines and the Pisans, by condemning the conduct of his own troops, an intire union must have taken place between Pisa and Florence. In a short time Galeazzo recovered his affairs, so as to become more formidable than ever, and the league against him was once more renewed, with the addition of the Venetians. Galeazzo was too great a politician to be alarmed at this confederacy. He knew that the Venetians were insincere in their professions, and that they hated the Florentines. The prosperous condition of his affairs, however, now that he was in a fair way of making himself master of Mantua, prevailed upon him to listen to the terms of accommodation; and conferences were held at Pavia for c that purpose; but in the mean time, by a sudden mutiny at Perugia, he became master of that city, and threatened Arezzo itself. It was easy for Galeazzo to perceive, that, while he kept within the bounds of moderation, he could stop the progress of the Venetians in Tuscany; and to give a fairer pretext to his cause, he offered to conclude a ten years truce, as it was impossible to bring matters in a shorter time to a definitive treaty between him and the Florentines. The proposal was accepted, but with no very sincere intentions on either side. On the conclusion of this truce, the Florentines dismissed their army, and Galeazzo made a shew of doing the same; but his troops being intirely devoted to him, pretended that they served for pay, and that they could not starve; they therefore, by his connivance, took up their quarters in the Siennese, and instigated the d Ubertini, and the other lords of petty fiefs, to take up arms. This, and other incidents which happened about the same time, renewed the war in Tuscany; and Galeazzo, who was faithfully served by his allies as well as soldiers, became at last master of Pisa itself, by which he opened a door for the subjection of Sienna; so that in a short time he became, in fact, more powerful in Tuscany than ever, Bologna having now submitted to him. He becomes master of Pisa.

THIS great revolution was effected by the single expedient of the ten years truce, and is one of the most masterly pieces of policy that we have upon record, as Galeazzo brought it about without incurring the smallest blemish upon his character. In the beginning of the year 1400, he prevailed with Uguccio, then master of Cortona, to prohibit provisions e of any kind to be carried through his dominions to Florence; and at the same time he fostered a war between Astorgi of Faenza and the Bolognese, and prevailed upon Guinigi to refuse to enter into a league with the Florentines. Towards the end of this year, Bentivoglio made himself master of Bologna, which occasioned a new face of affairs in Italy. As the friendship of that city was equally of use to the Florentines as to Galeazzo, both parties endeavoured to conceal their disappointments, by courting the friendship of Bentivoglio. Both likewise sent him auxiliaries; but in 1401, Galeazzo joined with count Alberigo against Bentivoglio. This left Bentivoglio no dependence but upon the Florentines, who saw themselves in such imminent danger, that they were ill enough advised to invite the emperor to their assistance, upon the promise of a large sum of money, part to be f paid in hand, and part in a certain time after he had entered Galeazzo's dominions in an hostile manner. The vast golden bait prevailed upon the emperor, who was miserably poor, to make great dispositions for carrying the war into the Milanese. The balance of power in Italy, in all appearance, was on the point of being ruined at this time, and nothing but the profound policy and moderation of Galeazzo could have saved it. His vast policy.
A D. 1400.

His plan was to make himself master of Lombardy, so as to be able to cut off all hopes of invading it either from France or Germany. He had driven the Scaligers out of Verona and Vicenza, and had confined Francesco Carrara of Pavia in the castle of Mouza. He still kept possession of the Tridentine, and all that mountainous district; so that when the emperor and his generals attacked him at Alessandria, they were entirely defeated by g Vermi the Milanese general; and the remainder of their broken army was obliged to retire to the Tridentine. Boundaries of his dominions.

THIS victory opened the way to Galeazzo's conquest of Mantua and Casal; and at last he defeated a vast army of Florentines and Bolognese near Bologna; and the papal and Flo- rentine general, Bernard of Aquitain, being made prisoner, Bologna itself submitted to the conqueror, after having been a bone of contention for fifty years between the Milanese and the see of Rome. But Galeazzo gave now an unusual proof of virtue and moderation. The Florentines, who were his principal enemies in Italy, were so far from being in a condition to expect support from the Germans, that they mutually accused one another before the Venetians; so that Florence itself was besieged, and must have fallen into the hands of Galeazzo, had he been in earnest about taking it. Some authors are of opinion, that Galeazzo intended to have made himself king of Italy; and they have given out, that he actually had prepared a crown for that purpose; but there seems to be little foundation for those assertions; for Galeazzo having secured the peace of his patrimonial dominions, and made himself master of all Lombardy, to the amazement of Italy and Europe, put bounds to his ambition, just at the time when Florence itself was on the point of submitting to his arms. This incredible reverse of fortune was at first disbelieved by the Florentines; but when they saw a stop put to the march of thirty-two thousand of the best troops in Europe, who were advancing against their city; and when they learned that Galeazzo had named ambassadors to treat for a general peace, in which the Florentines were to be principally considered, they began to give ear to the possibility of such an event; but still with great caution; for they treated at once with the Venetians and Galeazzo. The precaution, though wise, was useless; for Galeazzo was firmly resolved upon a sincere, and, if possible, a lasting peace; which accordingly, to the amazement of the public, was at last concluded. It is true, the time between opening this negotiation and that of his death, was too short for us to pronounce as to his motives. But the probability lies for his sincerity, as there is no indication that when the negotiation was begun, he had reason to believe he was so near his end, which happened but a few weeks after his taking Bologna.

His death.

GALEAZZO was certainly one of the wisest as well as the most moderate princes that then lived in Italy; but though we have, agreeable to the sense of all historians, given the highest encomiums upon his policy, his wisdom, courage, and magnanimity; yet we find no room for enlarging upon his virtue. That was a quality which seems to have been disused amongst the princes of this age. In other parts of his character we have been sufficiently copious. Galeazzo died in September, 1402, in the castle of Meliano, on the Lambro, of a pestilential fever, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the twenty-fourth of his government. His last wife was Catharine, daughter of his uncle Barnabo, by whom he left a daughter and two sons, who, at the time of his death, were not arrived at man's estate. By his first wife Isabella, daughter to the French king, he had no issue; but that he might keep up his connexions with the court of France, he bestowed Valentina, his daughter by Catharine, upon Lewis duke of Orleans; by which her progeny, upon the failure of Galeazzo's sons without issue, became powerful competitors for the duchy of Milan. Asti was given in dowry to Valentina.

As to the person of Galeazzo, it was like the other princes of his family, noble and majestic. The greatest fault of his reign was his behaviour towards his uncle Barnabo and his family; nor indeed is it certain, that Barnabo was such a monster of cruelty as he is represented to have been. It undoubtedly was for the interest of Galeazzo to have him believed to be so; and we know of no advocate his memory, or those of his sons, met with to do justice to their character. It is on all hands allowed, that Galeazzo actually outwitted his uncle; and, notwithstanding the many apologies that have been offered in his favour, it is certain, that soon after his death the Milanese fell into the most violent distractions; nor could the government there be kept up without an army of twenty thousand horse, and as many foot, even in time of peace. He is charged with some unnatural vices; but no proof of his guilt is upon record. He was, like his ancestors, magnificent in his public buildings.

Succeeded by his two sons.

JOHN MARIA, the eldest son of Galeazzo, succeeded to the greatest part of the Milanese; but it seems to have been an infatuation with the wisest of the Visconti family to have divided their estates. Besides the lawful sons, he left two natural ones, Gabriel and Antony; and all of them, excepting the last, took the designation of Maria. His funeral was magnificently celebrated; and upon opening the codicils of his will, it was found that he had left a regency, at the head of which was Charles Malatesta, lord of Rimini, and James Vermi; but Peter, archbishop of Milan, was at the head of the commission, chiefly on account of decency. John, the eldest son, was declared by his will to be duke of Milan; to which was annexed the possession of Bergamo, Cremona, Brescia, Verona, Vicenza, Feltri, Civitella, Lodi, Bologna, and a vast number of other estates; the entire barrier of the Alps, towards Germany and France, together with Sienna in Tuscany and Perugia. To his second son, Philip, he left Pavia, with the title of count, Novara, Vercelli, Tortona, Alessandria, and all that neighbourhood. He was equally mindful of Gabriel, his eldest

Divisions of the Milanese government,

- a eldest natural son, whose mother was a lady of quality; and he left him Pisa, Luna, Serazana, with many castles in that neighbourhood. His last natural son was so young, that he made no provision for him, but left him to the care of his brothers, and his family, his mother being a person of no consideration. But besides those provisions for his family, he left very noble legacies to his other friends, particularly to the Venetians, the *Mantuan*s, and several of his private favourites. His legitimate children, the eldest of whom was not above thirteen years of age, were brought up under the eye of their tutors; but it is surprising to reflect, that so provident and so wise a man as Galcazzo was, had been so much, during the latter part of his life, employed in war^a, that he had taken no precaution for the education of his sons; and there was such a penury of learned
- b men in all his wide-extended dominions, that scarce a person was to be found equal to the common task of their education. A person of low extraction, one Francis Barbavaria, was the only man found capable to instruct them. This drove all the men of quality from the court, and the archbishop of Milan was the only person of high quality who remained about it; but even he was obliged to shut himself up within his palace; so miserably was the government divided between contending parties. At last, the old remains of the Visconti family got the ascendancy; and Francis Visconti was introduced into Milan, from which he had lived for some time in exile. He had a brother, Antony, whom he associated with himself in all his schemes. The intrigues of so distracted a court are not to be regarded. Murders, robberies, and rapines, multiplied every day;
- c and at last a kind of compromise was made between Antony Visconti and the party of Barbavaria. The Florentines took advantage of those confusions, and were unwearied in their endeavours to excite the states of Italy to throw off the yoke of the Milanese. By this time the duke of Milan and his brother were taken out of the hands of their mother, who had very seldom access to see her sons; and every day produced some new alteration in the government. One Pandolph was named to the government of the Sienese; but had neither spirit nor courage to oppose the attempts of the Florentines. John Colonna had the charge of Pisa, with a sufficient body of troops to defend it; but the Florentines, having persuaded pope Boniface to join them, invaded the Milanese under Nicholas Ferrara. The first attempt was upon the side of the Parmesan, where several tumultuary actions passed, but without any effect; and at last a treaty was proposed for accommodating all differences. Charles Malatesta appeared on the side of the young duke of Milan. Gianelli, the pope's brother, managed for his holiness. The Florentines demanded Perugia and Bologna; and their claims comprehended the property of almost all Tuscany. This gave a handle for Malatesta to throw a difference between the Florentines and Gianelli, on account of the ambition of the former. He proposed to shut the Florentines quite out of the negotiation; and this was so much for the benefit of the church, that the agreement was struck, and Bologna, with Perugia, was immediately given up to the holy see; upon which the Florentines were obliged to return to Tuscany.
- e This compromise proved as a precedent for all the rest of the states of Lombardy, which had been subjected to the Milanese, to endeavour to assert their own independency; and the old factions of the Gibelins and Guelphs were now revived with more animosity than ever. Not only states and principalities were torn in pieces by those distractions; but every village had its separate factions; and though the whole went under the name of Guelphs and Gibelins, yet those were no other than sounds to cloak private faction and personal resentments. In a short time all the Milanese was one promiscuous scene of carnage; and the rage of parties that had been quieted under the mild government of the Visconti, seemed to have been gathering strength, that it might break out with the more fatal effects. Every petty governor of a town or state set up to be independent; while
- f those of greater consideration were so much interested in their own schemes of ambition, that they neither durst nor cared to check their inferiors. The misfortune was, that though the Milanese was supposed to be an imperial fief, yet the whole empire was in a condition equally distracted; so that it could not be said that there was any center of authority, not only in Milan, but in Italy, and indeed in Germany itself. While matters were in this confusion, each seized the portion of territory that lay most practicable or convenient for himself, without the smallest regard to their former oaths and engagements. Pandolfo Malatesta made himself master of Brescia and Bergamo. Gabrini Fundulio seized upon Cremona; as Scaliger did upon Pavia and Alessandria. Vineati became master of Lodi; the Benzoni of Crema; the Arcelli of Piacenza; Ottoboni of Parma; Franchino Rusca of Como; and the Bruffati and Tormelli, returning from banishment, possessed themselves of Vercelli and Novara. The young duke of Milan continued still in the power of his kinsmen Visconti, while his mother was a helpless exile amongst the friends and exiles of her husband's family, without even the means of supporting herself. Pandolfo Malatesta, being introduced to Como by the faction of the Rusconi, gave up that rich city to be plundered. The duchess was, at that time, at Como, and a scheme was laid for driving her from thence. For this purpose factions were encouraged; and the duchess plainly perceiving, by the progress of the tumult, that her enemies intended to become masters of the city, thought proper to retire to Mouza, though vastly against the advice of her friends. During this cessation of government, the young duke was, by his mother, advised to create a governor, who should, during his minority, have the care of his dominions; and to name Charles Malatesta to that office. He was a worthy man, and a brave soldier; but though the young duke's name and authority introduced Malatesta into Milan, yet he found things there in a most desperate situation. The greatest part of the generals and counsellors employed by the great duke, had been either put to death, or obliged to fly for their lives. There was only one circumstance in his favour, and that was the dissensions and disagreements that prevailed amongst the opposite faction, and which Malatesta took care to improve, so as to procure to himself an easy access to his government. His first care was to introduce a force into Milan, sufficient to overawe the disaffected of every kind; and taking from the factions all hopes of profiting by the public commotions, he treated of a marriage between his niece and the young duke. It is said, that the public factions, at this time, arrived at such a height, that when any person was devoted to death, the common saying of the judge was, "You have given me a subject, and it must be my business to make him a criminal."

Charles Malatesta made regent.

SUCH was the state of the Milanese affairs, when Charles Malatesta entered upon his regency. Having with great difficulty equipped a sufficient army, his first undertaking was to punish one Stranguline, who had been guilty of murdering his colleague, and had fled to Scaliger, who was then in possession of the castle of Milan, which Charles besieged with so much vigour, that he soon reduced it. He next took a signal revenge upon those who had been the most active against the duchess dowager; and to shew how high party was carried at that time, the common executioners of prisoners were mastiff dogs trained up to blood. This method of execution was highly agreeable to the young duke; and Malatesta, for that reason, hastened the marriage between his niece, who was daughter to Pandolph, and the young duke. This expedient had some effect in softening the young prince's manners; but a new faction at this time started up. Christopher Cassati, and Antony Vercelli, listed themselves under the banners of the young count of Pavia; and they had entered into a conspiracy for inviting the French under Bouccicault to take part in the war. Both Charles and Pandolfo Malatesta opposed this conspiracy; and it is said, that young Philip narrowly escaped being murdered. It happened unfortunately for the Milanese, that Charles Malatesta was the professed partizan of the Guelphs, while the Milanese in general inclined to the Gibelins. This occasioned another revolution; and Charles Malatesta was driven out of Milan by Facino Scaliger, who permitted his followers, the Gibelins, to indulge themselves in all kinds of licentiousness. This produced another conspiracy against Scaliger, who was surprised and made prisoner by John Luitprand, who soon repented of his undertaking, and pleaded youth and want of consideration for his excuse. Philip count of Pavia was thought to be at the bottom of this conspiracy; and Scaliger, dissembling his resentment, took little notice of Philip; but, pretending to be indisposed, took his bed, and meditated to make himself master of Pavia. According to Paul Jovius, the design upon Scaliger was so near being executed, that he was obliged to the swiftness of his horse, which carried him off with such violence, that he received a contusion in his forehead, and escaped to Rosetta with the loss of his cap. Be that as it will, it is certain that he was delivered almost as soon as he was made prisoner.

Adventure of Bouccicault.

AFTER this the faction of the Guelphs, which was headed by Antony Torriano, prevailed upon John Maria, notwithstanding the ancient enmity between their families, to invite Bouccicault, the French general, to become the guardian of the Milanese, in place of Scaliger. Bouccicault, who was remarkable at once for the vastness of his courage, and the largeness of his person, was governor, under the French king, of Genoa, which had revolted to him amongst the other states of Italy that had thrown off the yoke of the Milanese upon the death of John Galeazzo. Bouccicault, according to Paul Jovius, came to Milan, attended by a great retinue of French cavalry: but began his government by an attempt to make himself master of the castle of Milan. In this, finding some difficulty, he endeavoured to effect his end by gold; and that failing, he employed rougher measures, for he erected a court of justice, and issued edicts, as if he had been the absolute lord of Milan; and even went so far as to coin money. It was believed, that the hatred which the Italians naturally entertained of the French, pushed Bouccicault upon those unpopular measures; for in a short time he became obnoxious, and hated not only by John Maria,

^a Maria, but by the Milanese of all ranks and denominations; and tho' he was one of the most worthy men of his time, he was represented as endeavouring to usurp the power of the ducal family. But in the mean while, a great revolution happened at Genoa, from whence, by the intrigues of Scaliger, the French troops were driven out, and the marquis of Montferrat was substituted in Bouccicault's room, and acknowledged to be the prince, or rather guardian, of Genoa. This revolution was no sooner known at Milan, than Bouccicault, pretending to lead an expedition against Pavia, evacuated that city before the news became public. In his march towards Novi, he was attacked by Scaliger, and so totally defeated, that he lost in one day the government both of Genoa and Milan; so that it was with the utmost difficulty that he escaped back to France by the Alps.

^b THE Italian historian ^a has, on this occasion, charged Bouccicault with a piece of barbarity little agreeable to the general tenor of his character; for we are told, that he put to death Gabriel, the same who had been driven from Pisa by the Florentines, and had taken refuge at Genoa, 'on account of the riches he had carried from Pisa. About this time John lost his mother, who was weakened by heart-break, and a long course of ill usage. She is blamed by Paul Jovius for the pernicious counsels she gave to throw her son's dominions into the hands of the pope, by which they never reverted to the dukedom. He mentions particularly the alienation of Bologna, which had cost so much blood and treasure to the dukes of Milan, as had Affisi and Perugia; all which now went to the popedom, for the empty phantom of the supposed friendship of his holiness, which, in the end, proved rather a detriment than an advantage. Sienna, at the same time, recovered her liberty, after long and bloody contests. All those calamities were far from putting a stop to the civil dissensions of Milan, which grew every day more and more intractable. They who were defeated, being spirited up by revenge, refused to agree to any truce with their enemies; and the victors rejected all accommodation, as being useless to their purposes.

IN such various scenes of distress, the duke found no other expedient for preserving or retrieving his authority, than making matters up with Facino, or, as we have called him on other occasions, Scaliger, a prince of unbounded ambition, as well as abilities, both in peace and war. John Maria, therefore, having received hostages for the fidelity of Facino, gave him, under himself, the government of all his estates and armies; but he had scarce ratified this measure, than he repented it; though he plainly perceived that it was to no purpose. Facino was obliged to support himself in his new acquired power, by other freebooters of government, whom he suffered to pillage the subjects of their private properties, but reserved to himself the whole of the public money. Facino attributed all the danger he had escaped to the count of Pavia, and endeavoured to make himself master of that city. He therefore pretended to be indisposed; and being in a confederacy with the Beccarii, Pavia was betrayed to him, and the estates of all the contrary faction were given up to the plunder of the Beccarii. Facino understanding this, and that nothing would be left to him, issued an order for plundering both factions, which accordingly was punctually obeyed. The count of Pavia, by this time, had retired to the citadel, where he had very little authority, and less assurance of safety. Facino promised to take him under his protection, if he was admitted into the citadel, which at last the count was obliged to suffer; so that Facino had, in fact, the full power and authority over Pavia, as well as Milan, and nothing was wanting but the title, to render him sovereign master of both. The duke, and his brother the count of Pavia, had scarcely the common necessities of life allowed them; and the former was persuaded no longer to cohabit with his wife. Taxes and oppressions were multiplied, and Facino took such a liking to the castle of Pavia, then one of the strongest, as well as most delightful, in the world, that he shut himself up in it, and there he fell into his last illness; while the two brothers were reduced to such difficulties, that Philip is said to have been destitute of bed-cloaths.

^c DURING his illness, which now appeared to be mortal, the Gibelin faction, being afraid that, upon his death, John Maria would recover his authority, and being no stranger to his innate fierceness and cruelty, formed a conspiracy to put an end to his life. At this time the Milanese was entirely in peace, and Facino, though confined to his bed, carried his arms into the Bergamese, where they did infinite damage. Some authors, particularly Paul Jovius, say, that he was making war in the Bergamasco, when he was seized with his last illness ^b, and that he was carried to Pavia ^c. While he was upon his death-bed, the conspiracy against John Maria came to a head. The Guelphs, as well as the Gibelins, entered into it through detestation of his bloody, brutish disposition, which, in some measure, justified Facino's severity; for the little power he still retained, was daily employed in throwing the unhappy victims of his tyranny to be devoured by dogs.

THE chief of the conspirators were of the Visconti family; and their scheme was, if their conspiracy took effect, to make Hector Barnabo's son duke of Milan; and if Facino should die, to give Pavia to the Beccarii. The other conspirators were Bagio, and his brother Paul Pusterlano, whose father John Maria had put to death, as we have already seen, by throwing him to the dogs, and some noblemen of the house of Maine, the two brothers of which had been butchered by John. The scene of the tragedy was the church, where they stabbed him at the great altar (C), as he was assisting at mass (D). It is remarked, that the detestation of John Maria's person was so strong with the conspirators, that it united them, though they were of different factions, so that not one of them betrayed another. Paul Jovius observes, that, notwithstanding the troubles and distresses of his government, he never abated in the ferocity of his disposition. He had one Squarcia Giramo, of a noble family, but who served him as his favourite, and the purveyor of his inhumanities, by procuring for him the largest and fiercest mastiffs, who were maintained on nothing but human flesh. When he was dead, there was not a living creature who took the least concern about his body, which would have laid unburied, had it not been for the care of a common whore, who kept it for some time amongst roses; a humanity that deservedly procured for her a handsome provision from Philip his brother and successor, by which she was enabled to marry with credit, and in good circumstances. The same day Giramo, the infamous minion of John Maria, was discovered in a lurking hole by the people, and dragged by a hook in his nose to the street before his own palace, which was levelled to the ground, and there put to death with the most exquisite tortures. It is remarked of John Maria, that, notwithstanding his ferocity, he possessed many of the great qualities of his ancestors (E), which served to render him still more detestable.

Death of Facino,

FACINO was all this time confined to his bed at Pavia; but his officers and creatures kept possession of the castle of Milan. Hector, whom we have already spoken of, no sooner heard of John's assassination, than he came to Milan with no more than twelve attendants; and the conspirators being prepared to receive him, he was admitted into the city without opposition. The commandant of the castle was Vicenzo, who refused to deliver it up, tho' neither threats nor rewards were wanting to shake him. Facino no sooner heard of the murder of John Maria, than he fell into a violent passion at the conspirators; and his last breath was spent in recommending the person of Philip, and the punishment of his brother's murder, to his attendants, particularly to Bartholomew, archbishop of Milan, in the most earnest pathetic manner. According to Billius^a, he likewise recommended to their care his wife Beatrix. He also ordered, that Philip should not, for some time, be suffered to stir abroad, for fear of farther treachery. He died without issue, and without relations, who could succeed to the power he left in the Milanese. He made some amends upon his death-bed for the treachery and inhumanities he had been guilty of in his life-time. His death gave the conspirators additional hopes of success, and they all swore fealty to Hector.

whose widow Philip, the new duke of Milan, marries.

IT happened fortunately for Philip, that Facino was, at the time of his death, at the head of an excellent army, and that his officers had all joined in the most solemn engagements, for revenging John Maria's murder. Philip remained at the castle of Pavia, closely guarded; so that he was uncertain for some time, whether he was a prince or a prisoner. Bozero, or Baucio, of Cremona, commanded in the castle of Pavia; and his first care was to shut up the gates, and to suffer none, without his knowledge, to enter the castle, or to depart out of it. This precaution was taken on account of the Beccarii, whose allegiance was a little doubtful; and the Pavians, who were devoted to Philip, being suspicious that he was doomed to his brother's fate, took arms, and demanded that Philip might be produced to them. He accordingly appeared on the walls with great expressions of his sense of their affection and loyalty, and assured them that he was perfectly safe, provided he was secure of their allegiance. But though Philip was thus safe, yet he was destitute of every thing, particularly money, that was befitting so great a prince. Facino was excessively rich, especially in ready money, and had left all the fortune he could dispose of to his wife Beatrix, with a view, as some suppose not improbably, of her marrying Philip. The archbishop and Baucio consulted together, and proposed the match to Philip, who readily agreed to it; and the consent of the Beccarii was likewise obtained, they thinking that they would

(C) Paul Jovius, p. 180, says, that the conspirators in number were about thirty.

(D) According to Paul Jovius, he was assassinated by the two brothers Borfi, on the 16th of May, as he was proceeding to St. Godard's church.

(E) Billius ubi supra. But this perhaps was only a compliment to his dignity; for Paul Jovius takes no notice of it, nor is it easy to conceive, that any good quality could exist in so young a monster.

a have the chief management under their former mistress Beatrice; but she knew them too well to trust them. Philip, at this time, was scarcely twenty years of age, and she was about thirty-eight, but possessed of all the remains of her husband's authority, as well as wealth. Facino's officers and soldiers were entirely devoted to her, as were the inhabitants of Vercelli, Novara, and Alessandria, and the garrisons of almost all the neighbouring castles; so that all parties in Pavia being agreed, the marriage was celebrated with a general approbation.

b THE next care of Philip and his party in Pavia, was to relieve Vicenzo, who still held out the castle of Milan, by assuring him of a speedy assistance from Philip in person. Hector, and the Visconti faction, had been far from seeing or suspecting this sudden alteration in favour of Philip; and it disconcerted all their measures. The reputation of Philip gained such ground, that each vied with another to be the foremost to join him. All the diffidence of the Visconti and their friends was now with regard to the mercenaries who had served under Facino, and who, having been indebted to him, sought to better their circumstances by going over to the Visconti. This defection, however, was soon remedied, by the representations of Sicco of Padua, who put them in mind, that they had sworn to be faithful not only to Facino, but to Beatrice likewise. He therefore persuaded them to wait the result of a letter from Beatrice, or her husband. A letter accordingly arrived from Pavia, remitting all the debts that had been due to Facino and his wife; and it was explained to them, that Philip was now the sole lord and master of the Milanese. Those representations had the intended effect, and the revolvers were brought back to their duty, though not without receiving large gratuities, in earnest of their future fidelity.

c NOTHING was now wanting to Philip's success. His wife had brought him in ready money a dowry of about four hundred thousand pounds, an immense sum at that time: his army was in excellent order, and commanded by Carmagnola, and one of the Beccarii, while Vicenzo continued gallantly to defend the castle of Milan. On the other hand, Hector and his friends had been obliged to have recourse to cruel oppressive methods for raising money to carry on the siege; but they were unsuccessful. Philip advanced to the Comense gate, where an encounter happened between him and Hector, in which the latter was defeated, and obliged to fly to Mosca. Philip, upon this, entered the castle without farther resistance, and the first thing he did, was to proclaim pardon to all but those who had been concerned in his brother's death. Andrew Bagio, and Francis Maine, were accordingly judicially sentenced, and put to death for the same. This well-timed moderation won the hearts of the Milanese, and Philip was joyfully acclaimed duke of Milan.

d HAVING settled every thing in that castle and city, he proceeded to Mosca, which Hector had taken possession of, and besieged it. In this siege Carmagnola eminently distinguished himself. The siege was furiously pressed, and the place was bravely defended, till Philip bringing up his machines, drove Hector into the castle, where, being mortally wounded in the leg by a stone, he died in three days. He was a young man of great spirit and courage, and in his noble appearance, being above the common size, he resembled his father Bar-nabo. After Mosca and its castle were reduced, Philip proceeded to Canturi, from whence John Visconti removed to Naples, and the place was immediately surrendered to Philip. Rusca, a young nobleman of great accomplishments, was then master of Como, but he surrendered it to Philip, without making any terms for himself, as being only a kind of trustee, for which Philip rewarded him with several noble possessions. In the mean while the people of Lodi, and the neighbouring states, entered into treaty with Philip; but John, who was in possession of Lodi, refused to give it up, and ordered his son to defend it to the last. Philip, upon this, carried John prisoner from Milan to Lodi, where he shewed him in chains to his son, to whom he offered not only pardon, but a reward, if he agreed to give up the place. The young man hesitated upon this, and expostulated upon the iniquity of his father's imprisonment. But Philip's soldiers, in the mean time, stormed the place, and carried both father and son prisoners to Milan, where they were executed.

f PHILIP was equally fortunate against the other petty tyrants, who had dismembered the estates of his family. He took Burgamo and Brescia from Pandolfo Malatesta, and made Gabrino Funduli, the cruel tyrant of Cremona, his prisoner. There was something shocking in the manner of this man's death. Being carried to the scaffold where he was to suffer, he was exhorted to lay his head upon the block, and to undergo death with resignation and meekness; but instead of that, looking on the friars who assisted at his execution with a furious air, he bid them trouble him no more with impertinent exhortations; adding, that he had been villainously betrayed by Philip, and that he repented of nothing so much, as that he had not thrown both the emperor and the pope, who came to visit him at the same time, from the top of his lofty tower at Cremona.

g It would be too tedious to particularize all the successes of Philip in the Milanese. It is sufficient to say, that having subdued all opposition there, he applied himself to regulate his his court and army. He had of household troops eight thousand horse and foot, and of a his other subjects, drawn from different parts of his dominions, above twelve thousand, all of them the best soldiers in Italy. Besides Carmagnola, he had engaged in his service the famous Nicholas Picinino, and several others of the most famous generals then in Italy, by whom his army was excellently well disciplined. The troops I have mentioned were all quartered about Milan, and he had above twenty thousand more in other parts of his dominions. Their commander in chief was Carmagnola, who was at the same time Philip's first minister, and married to one of his kinswomen; and all his inferior posts, both civil and military, were well supplied with able officers and ministers.

Genoa.

At this time the Venetians held Verona, the Florentines Pisa, and the pope Bologna, all which cities and states had once belonged to Philip's father, and he resolved to retake them. b The reader, in the former parts of this work, will meet with the history of the progress of his arms; so that we need but touch upon a few particulars that have not been yet related. Placentia had been surpris'd by Philip Arsellani for Philip, by which the emperor Sigismund, who had designed to give it to the marquis of Montferrat, was disappointed. Arsellani, for that service, came into great favour with Philip; but perceiving, in a short time, that Carmagnola had the sole ascendancy both in the court and the army, he was so stung with emulation and jealousy, that he threw off his dependence with Philip, and governed in his own name. Philip, upon this, ordered Carmagnola to march with an army against Placentia, which he willingly did. In the mean while, Arsellani, and Pandolfo Malatesta, entered into a confederacy together, in which they were joined by Fulgofo, the doge of Genoa, and his c five brethren, who had driven all the opposite party out of that city. The exiles were befriended by Philip, who assisted them with part of his horse. About the same time the Beccarii again rebelled, and Castellino Beccari falling into Philip's hands, was put to death. His brother Lancelot entered into a league with one of the Facino family; and the former attacked Tortona, and the other Alessandria; while Carmagnola drove Arsellani out of Placentia, but was unable to take the citadel. Lancelot Beccari was besieged and taken in Seravalla; and being carried prisoner to Pavia, he was there executed on a gibbet. Thus all who had an actual concern in the death of Philip's mother or brother, came to condign punishment. Philip after that took Gavi, and thereby opened a road for himself into the Genoese dominions. Carmagnola, upon this, left the siege of the castle of Placentia, and d went to put himself at the head of the Genoese exiles; so that Pandolfo Malatesta was at liberty to join Arsellani in the citadel of Placentia. Philip hearing this, and that the city was likely to fall into the hands of Malatesta, sent a squadron of ships to carry off the inhabitants under George Valsperg, who transported them to Pavia, Lodi, and other places; and Placentia accordingly fell into Pandolfo's hands, but without any inhabitants. This occasioned a debate whether they ought not to burn the city; but it was spared.

Placentia.

CARMAGNOLA was all this time pressing the Genoese, and had even driven them within the walls of their city, by attacking them on the western Riviera, while Guido Torelli kept them blocked up in another quarter. The Arsellani, and their confederates, endeavoured to relieve the Genoese, and advanced through the straits of the mountains; but being e ignorant of the ways, they were shut up by the Genoese mountaineers, and all of them were either killed or made prisoners; but afterwards the survivors were dismissed, excepting a few of the Arsellani and the Malatesta family, who were detained as pledges for the rendition of Placentia. Fulgofo, hearing of this disaster, offered to capitulate with Philip, who understanding that Malatesta was still powerful, entered into a negotiation with him. The Arsellani, however, and the other prisoners, still refused to deliver up Placentia, which cost the unhappy youths their lives, being executed on gibbets in sight of their relations. This barbarity was thought to be owing to the personal resentment of Carmagnola against the Arsellani and the Malatesti, and gave Philip great disquiet, though from his natural diffimulation he concealed it. One of the youths was much regretted by all Italy, on account of f his excellent endowments and fine person. His mother beheld his execution from a window of the castle of Placentia, and was almost frantic with grief, pouring out the most bitter curses against her husband, for his obstinacy and rebellion. The father, stung with remorse, and finding the castle to be untenable, abandoned it next day, and fled to Treviso, in the Venetian territories, where he died a miserable exile. He is allowed to have been a man of great parts and courage, but was ruined by ambition. It was thought that Philip intended, if he had surrendered Placentia, to have substituted him in the place of Carmagnola, who was now declining in his favour.

THE surrender of the castle of Placentia was followed by the submission of Borgo di San Domino, which was held by Orlando Pallavicini; and most of the noble families in the Parmesan declared themselves Gibelins, and chose Philip either for their master or protector; so that it was with difficulty that Nicholas of Ferrara prevented the city of Parma itself from following their example. This revolution was brought about by a most singular mixture of g a of justice, treachery, and barbarity, and requires to be particularly related. Facino had driven Otto, who is called Otto III. and who pretended to be duke of Parma, out of Milan; upon which he returned to Parma, where he fell, in the most inhuman manner, upon the Gibelins, and all whom he looked upon to be his enemies. His spite was more particularly levelled against the family of Rubeis, and he ordered all of them that could be found to be massacred, not excepting children in the cradle, whose brains he dashed out with his own hands against the wall. He then intended to butcher the Pallavicini in the same manner, and had laid siege to Borgo di San Domino; but the inhabitants standing to their defence, he marched to Reggio, then in possession of the house of Este, and took it. As Otto had no money by which he could subsist his army, he was obliged to do it by plunder, which made him formidable almost equally to friends as foes. The famous Sforza the elder was at the same time a soldier of fortune in Italy; and the marquis of Este applied to him for assistance, which he readily granted, with the consent of the Florentines his masters.

OTTO was very powerful in cavalry, having been joined by above four thousand horse; who chose to live upon plunder rather than pay, and therefore he endeavoured to intercept Sforza in his march out of Tuscany. For that purpose he attempted to surprise Modena; but was repulsed after a sharp conflict, and Sforza effected his junction with the marquis of Este's army. Sforza then marched to Rubiera, every day producing new skirmishes between him and Otto^a. At last, according to Sforza's historians, though the matter is not mentioned by others, Sforza, in endeavouring to surprise a convoy, defeated Otto, and took him prisoner; but being unable to detain him, Otto escaped out of his hands, and in his turn made some of Sforza's principal officers prisoners, amongst whom was Attendula, a near relation to Sforza, all whom he treated with the greatest inhumanity. They escaped from his hands with great difficulty; and Otto, after continuing the war for some time, perceiving that the marquis and Sforza, in conjunction, over-matched him, pretended a great desire to enter into a negotiation. According to the authority last quoted, Otto's view was to separate the marquis from Sforza; in which case, he was in hopes they must both of them, in the end, fall his prey. His design was discovered to the marquis by the officer who was sent to appoint the interview; and the marquis dissembling, agreed that it should be at a little cell near Modena. In the mean while Sforza concealed himself in the neighbourhood with a chosen body of friends, and the marquis refusing to appear, Otto was attacked, and killed by the hand of Attendula, without almost any resistance; he being so much hated, that a woman, whose husband he had put to death, plucked the heart out of his body, and eat part of it.

THE death of Otto was a fortunate event for Philip. His army immediately separated, some of them taking service under him, and some of them under the marquis of Ferrara; and though Otto left a young son, whose title was for some time recognized by the Parmensans, his party was quickly driven out, and the marquis was received as lord of Parma, where he governed for several years; till he, in his turn, was expelled by Philip, who maintained himself in the government to the day of his death. He would likewise have reduced Reggio, had not the Venetians interposed. He then marched to the Bergamasco against Pandolfo Malatesta, who was but ill provided for a defence, because his communication was cut off from Milan. Most of the forts, therefore, in that country, fell into his hands one by one; and Malatesta was obliged to call in to his assistance Nicholas of Faenza, the Venetian general, who could do no more than guard the strong passes, and garrison the forts.

ABOUT this time Martin V. was chosen pope at the council of Constance, and arriving in the Milanese, he met with a most magnificent reception from Philip, and reconsecrated the great church, that had been contaminated by interdicts. The war still continuing between Philip and Pandolfo Malatesta, a compromise was now entered into on both sides, chiefly with a view of facilitating Philip's conquest of Florence. This accommodation is said to have been effected by the mediation of pope Martin, which made him no welcome guest at Florence, to which city he repaired after he left Milan. Philip agreed to take Malatesta's troops into his pay, and to give him an annual subsidy, on condition that, upon Malatesta's death, the possession of Brescia should revert to Philip.

WE are now come to an incident in Philip's life, that represents him in a very different light from that in which we have hitherto considered him. The death of a mother and a brother, and the dismemberment of so many cities and states, justified some severity against the authors; but his behaviour to his wife was barbarous, ungrateful, and wicked, to the last degree. We have already taken notice of the disproportion there was between their ages, which had disgusted Philip so much, that he had abstained from her bed. It does not appear that the lady resented this provocation in any indecent, or indeed passionate manner; and she had even submitted to serve him in the most menial offices. Unfortunately for her, she entertained as an attendant one Orombelli, a young man accomplished in the arts of music, dancing, and the other embellishments that are most acceptable at a court. Philip, considering her life as an obstacle to his pleasure, accused her of criminal conversation with this youth; and though nothing could be worse founded than the charge, certain enchanted utensils were pretended to be found under her bed. Upon this villainous pretext the duchess was seized, and confined prisoner in the castle of Binasco. The youth was imprisoned at the same time; and, according to common report, both of them were put to the torture. Whatever might be in this, it is certain that he was tortured; and unable to withstand the force of the pain, he confessed the criminality, for which both of them were condemned to death, after being confronted with each other. On this occasion the duchess shewed an invincible constancy. She reproached Orombelli with his weakness, in yielding to tortures to confess a falsehood, and, in the most solemn and affecting manner, she called God to witness for her innocence; only she implored his pardon for having yielded to the archbishop of Milan, in persuading her to so unequal a match. She declared, she never had resented the duke's abstaining from her bed; and she mentioned the great fortune and acquisitions she had brought Philip; concluding, that she the less regretted her death, because she had preserved her innocence.

of the duchess

HAVING finished the pathetic declaration, Orombelli was put to death before her eyes, and she followed him with the most heroic constancy. By the accounts of all historians, she was a woman of a very exalted character, and no reproach remains upon her memory, but the inequality of her match with Philip. The young man was so perfectly conscious of his own innocence, that he might have escaped when she was made prisoner; but instead of that, he came as usual to court, and declared he knew nothing of the matter, though his friends told him of his danger. Soon after the execution of the duchess, the duke brought to his court a young Milanese lady, whom he had ravished some time before. As to the duchess, her unjust death was thought to be partly owing to the vindictive temper of Philip, who resented her having been the wife of Facino, and the partner of his victories.

Philip becomes master of Genoa.

PHILIP by this time had become master of Genoa, in the manner related in the history of that city; and to his other generals, he had added Agnolo of Pergola, who was known by the name of Tartalia. After that, his great aim was to subdue Florence, which he endeavoured to do in the manner described in the history of that city; after reducing Imola, and a number of other places in the Romagna. But though it must be acknowledged, that all Philip's schemes and operations, both in peace and war, were conducted with the utmost judgment, yet it is certain that he was apt to carry his refinements too far. He had too deep a distrust of mankind to render his generals and statesmen so useful as they might have been in his service. But that was not the only misfortune he lay under. Though he had the best generals at that time in Italy in his service, yet they were all of them mercenaries or foreigners, and it was their interest to protract the war; so that he could never do any thing decisive; and the indetermined state of his affairs often involved him in unforeseen difficulties. Though he had again and again defeated the Florentines, and even reduced them to the lowest ebb; and though he had been prosperous in almost all his undertakings, yet fresh wars started up against him on all hands; and at last, when the Florentines seemed to be upon the brink of perdition by a new league, in which Philip included the Genoese (though they were in fact his subjects) and the Siennese, they found means to counter-balance it by another league with the Venetians, which was favoured by the pope, and saved Florence. Philip's suspicious temper was, in other respects, of infinite prejudice to him. The particulars of the wars he carried on by Sforza, Braccio, Piccinino, and his other generals, are to be found in the history of Florence, and other parts of this work. As his years increased, so did his distrust of mankind, which sometimes proceeded to the most shocking cruelties; and his growing love of pleasure led him at last to sequester himself, in a great measure, from the world, and to shut himself up with the instruments of his lewdness, which some historians say were of an infamous nature. By this time, he abandoned the care of his affairs to those who had neither honesty nor capacity to manage them. Besides all the above considerations, Philip was now become sordidly covetous.

*He is deserted
by Carmagno-
la.*

THE main instrument of Philip's greatness hitherto had been Carmagnola, who, we may say, was the only man of virtue about his court. He had lately conducted a war against the pope and the Neapolitans (upon whose crown Philip had an eye) with great abilities; but his command being given to Torelli by Philip, he came in some passion to Milan, where he loudly complained of his treatment. Philip being beset with flatterers, conceived a deep prepossession against Carmagnola, who was not of a temper to remove it by patience and obsequiousness. He was still governor of Genoa under Philip, who demanded him to

- a retrench the expence of his government; upon which Carmagnola applied for a dismissal from his service. The duke was, at this time, at one of his country-seats; and Carmagnola, who had received no express answer, repaired to it with a few attendants; but was denied admittance to Philip's person, being desired to apply for audience to Henrico, Philip's great minion, and Carmagnola's principal enemy. Carmagnola insisted again and again to see the duke; but was at last flatly refused admittance. Upon this, perceiving Philip in a window at a distance, he loudly upbraided him with his services, and the ingratitude with which he was repaid. He rode off, but was pursued by Lampugnani, another of Philip's favourites, who endeavoured to intercept his retreat; but failed, through cowardice, in his attempt. Carmagnola therefore continued his journey, and reached the dominions of the duke of Savoy, who received him in person with all the distinctions due to his great name and merits, being himself born a subject of Savoy. Having related the injuries he had received at the court of Philip, whom he represented as being intirely immersed in pleasures, and equally weak and vicious; the duke upon this proposed to Carmagnola, that he should be general of the confederacy that had been lately formed between the Venetians and the Florentines, in which himself was a party. Carmagnola agreed to the proposal, and being invited to Venice, he there received the command of the sea and land forces of both republics.

- It is remarkable, that notwithstanding Philip's voluptuous retirement, he had employed spies, who traced every step Carmagnola went, though he travelled incognito, for fear of the Swisses, from the duke of Savoy's territories to those of Venice, and was informed of every design he laid down. Perceiving that had irretrievably lost his service, he confiscated to his own use all Carmagnola's estate, effects, and money, besides his annual revenues, which amounted to above forty thousand crowns of gold. This defection of Carmagnola turned the scale of Philip's fortunes, which ever after that declined. At this juncture, Gabrinio Funduli was living very peaceably at Castiglione, near Cremona. Philip suspected that he was a friend to the Venetians, and that he would betray Cremona to them; at the same time he knew his versatility, and that he was one of the most artful men of that age. Oldrati, brother-in-law to Gabrinio, undertook to have a watchful eye over him, and went with a few attendants to Cremona, where he pretended that his horse was pricked with a nail in his foot, and sent to Castello for a farrier. Gabrinio invited him to his house; but Oldrati, pretending he could not proceed farther, Gabrinio went out to meet him, and was seized by Oldrati, who, at the same time, found means to enter Castello, where he was made prisoner, together with his two sons, and sent to Pavia, where all of them were executed; and thus an immense booty, which was found in Castello, fell to Philip.

- OLDRATI* after this was sent with a magnificent equipage to Venice, in order to negotiate a peace with that republic. Foscari was then doge of Venice, and was entirely in the interest of the Florentines, whose affairs were managed by Rodolfo, an able minister, who defeated Oldrati in all his applications. By this time Philip had lost Brescia and Bergamo; but having got the younger Picinino into his service, soon recovered his affairs; but was afterwards himself defeated at Anghiera. After this loss, Philip was obliged to retreat to Cremona; and his affairs, by this time, had fallen into such disorder, that he had no recourse but that of applying to Sforza, who, next to Carmagnola, was then the most successful general in Italy. For this purpose he employed Nicholas de Este, who remonstrated to Sforza the danger which both he and the inferior states of Italy must be exposed to if the Florentines and Venetians should prevail. Sforza knew the truth of all this; and Philip had, for some time before, tempted him with an offer of his natural daughter in marriage, and of leaving him all the Milanese. Sforza, in answer to de Este's representations, said, he had been so long amused by Philip with that proposal of marriage, that he could not trust him. He advised Philip, however, before he gave any definitive answer, to endeavour to make up matters with the Venetians and the Florentines.

- According to all accounts, Sforza was in love with the lady who was proposed to him for his bride, and would have readily agreed to the overture of marriage, had he not been convinced that Philip made use of it as a bait to draw him into his terms, and then to deceive him. But, in fact, another obstacle stood in the way; for Sforza, as the lady was a bastard, could have very little dependence upon the succession continuing in his family. It is certain, however, that Sforza was inclined to close with the proposal, provided he could do it consistently with his honour to the Venetians and the Florentines, in whose service he then was.

- In the mean while, Carmagnola continued still at the head of the Venetian army; and Philip was so jealous of his abilities, that he had found instruments to administer poison to him; of which, however, he recovered, and carried on the war so briskly, that Philip, being being now broken both in mind and fortune, declared that he was resolved, at all events, to conclude a peace. Milan was, at this time, immensely rich, by the former successes of Philip; and the inhabitants were afraid of falling under the power of the pope, the Venetians, or the Florentines, and offered, if their duke would give them leave, to carry on the war at their own expence, without any assistance from him. Notwithstanding all his misfortunes, he had still on foot a noble army; and his subjects, seeing he was now wholly immersed in pleasure and indolence, requested him to lay aside all thoughts of war and business, and trust to them for success, being resolved to live and die under the Visconti family. As a proof of their loyalty, they offered to maintain for him ten thousand horse and ten thousand foot, without any other consideration than that of having the benefit of the revenues of the city of Milan itself, without the intervention of any of his blood-sucking courtiers. But they agreed to leave him in full possession of all the rest of his dominions and their revenues.

This proposal was strenuously opposed by Philip's courtiers, who represented to him the disgrace of suffering his dukedom to fall under a republican administration. Those arguments prevailed. Philip refused to admit the deputies into his presence, but referred them to Hericio; and thus the proposal was dropt. Notwithstanding that, Philip resolved to avail himself so far of their offer, as to oblige them to furnish all the expences of the war, and to carry it on at their charge. He, therefore, ransomed all the soldiers that had been taken at the battle of Anghiera, broke off all conferences for peace with the Venetians, and the war was recommenced.

New wars break out in Italy.

PHILIP being still rich in ready money, soon got together a greater army than ever. During the conferences for peace, the Venetians had thought proper to dismiss some of their soldiers; and they all entered into Philip's pay. The extraordinary encouragement he gave them exasperated the Venetians; and they called upon their allies for the performance of their engagements. These were, the Florentines, the duke of Savoy, the marquis of Montferrat, who was promised to be put in possession of Alessandria, as soon as it could be conquered, and the Genoese exiles, who were in hopes of returning to their city. Philip, on the other hand, made head against this powerful confederacy both by land and water. He recalled Picinino from Bologna, and marched a strong army into the Bressan, where, at first, his success was so rapid, that it promised to reinstate him in Brescia, and all its dependencies. It happened fortunately for Philip, that Sforza the Venetian general, at this time, had still a desire to the match with Philip's daughter; and though he had too much honour to betray his masters, yet he certainly did not act so decisively as he might have done, had he been free from that passion. The reader, in the history of Florence, will see all the turns which this war took. The life of Philip was the most miserable that can be supposed; for he was in perpetual suspense. He was passionately fond of quiet, but not of peace, all his aim being to keep war and disturbance from his own person. He never negotiated but with a design to over-reach others; and he imagined that all mankind were in a confederacy against himself. Thus his days were one continued chequer of fighting and treating. One day his affairs appeared to be irretrievable, and the next he was victorious in every quarter. He made the greatest sacrifices for tranquility of any prince in his time, and broke it upon the most frivolous occasions. He was by nature the most interested man alive; and yet none was ever known to do more magnanimous generous actions. This was proved in his treatment of Alphonso of Aragon. That prince had laid claim to the crown of Naples, in opposition to Regier of Anjou. Gaeta being then besieged by Alphonso, Philip, who, as we have already hinted, had himself an eye to the crown of Naples, ordered the Genoese to fit out a fleet for its relief. According to some authors, who perhaps refine too much upon Philip's history, he was at that time jealous of the Genoese, and obliged them to fit out that fleet in hopes that it would be destroyed by Alphonso. They even go so far as to pretend, that there was a secret correspondence between him and Alphonso for that purpose. Be that as it will, though it is extremely improbable, it is certain that Alphonso was apprised of the approach of the Genoese fleet, went out and engaged it, was defeated, and he himself, with two of his brothers, were made prisoners; as were many of his chief nobility and followers. Every one gave up Alphonso as being now utterly ruined; and he was carried from Genoa to Milan, where he was nobly received and entertained by Philip, who dismissed him and all his friends without ransom. But this generosity was attributed to interested motives; and the Genoese, not imagining that it was possible for Philip to perform any virtuous action, but with wicked views, resolved to revolt from him. They were the more ripe for this, as Philip had behaved with great haughtiness towards them; and tho' he knew they hated Alphonso worse than they did any man in the world, he compelled them to fit out a new squadron, which carried Alphonso to Milan, rather as a conqueror than a captive. Philip trembled at the apprehensions of the revolt of the Genoese; and to appease

a appease them, he pretended that he had given Alphonso his liberty, only on condition that he should deliver up Corfica to their republic. This pretext amused the Genoese, till they saw two thousand fresh troops, sent by Philip, arrive in their city; and then their conspiracy broke out all at once.

THEY were headed by one of their own number, Francis Spinola, who had acquired a reputation in war. They killed Philip's governor, and obliged his garrison to surrender. The next care of the conspirators was to new-model the constitution of their city, which they did by chusing eight persons, who had the government in the mean time, till it could return to its former channel. Philip, in hopes to prevent the consequences of this revolt, ordered Picinino his general to march against the city, while the insurgents besieged and b took the citadel; so that Picinino could do nothing effectual against the city, and was obliged to march to the Western Riviera, where he besieged Albenga, which was relieved by Fulgoso, who again got the government of Genoa; and recovered several towns belonging to their dominions. Next year Fulgoso renewed his league with the Venetians and Florentines; and the intestine divisions of Genoa reviving, Philip applied to Baptist Fulgoso, brother to the doge; and, by making him great promises, engaged him in a party for raising himself to the dogeship; but in this he failed, and was taken prisoner. He was, however, pardoned by his brother, and sent with seven galleys to assist the duke of Anjou, in making good his claim upon the crown of Naples. The progress and particulars of that war, is to be found in our history of Genoa. All that regards Philip is, that Fulgoso c was in his turn expelled by Flisco, a new competitor for that government; and Peter Fulgoso put himself under the protection of Philip, who gave him Novi, which enabled him to make great depredations upon the Genoese. But Philip himself, during all his life-time, never regained his footing in Genoa. A. D. 1437.

His affairs in other parts of Lombardy were, however, in a prosperous condition. His generals defeated the Venetians under Carmagnola; and it is said, that he had so much interest even in Venice, as to make a party against that general, who had behaved against him with vast rancour, and had been the chief obstacle of all his schemes. Carmagnola had in his composition violent resentments and great haughtiness, and was proud of having more than once humbled Philip, and forced him to accept law from Venice; but upon d the loss of a battle, his death had been resolved on by that senate, for many months before it happened: so that Carmagnola knew nothing of what was intended against him, and was living familiarly with the doge, and those who had pronounced his sentence, when all of a sudden he was arrested; and a few hours after, undergoing the torture, his head was struck off. As to his crimes, they do not clearly appear. The pretext for putting him to death, was his entering into a secret correspondence with the enemies of Venice; an allegation that never was proved.

PHILIP, ever since the death of his first wife Beatrix, had continued a widower. But his minions and flatterers, perceiving his health, through his vices, to be on the decline, became now importunate with him to marry; and the archbishop of Milan undertook to e make a match between him and the daughter of Amadeo duke of Savoy. Philip at first was averse to the proposal; but his creatures being in hopes, in case of a minority, to obtain the government for themselves, applied not only to his friends and relations, but to the neighbouring princes, who all of them joined in their solicitations for the same purpose. Philip, however, would have continued deaf to all their remonstrances, had they not engaged in their party one Stephen, a reputed astrologer, whose prognostications by the stars were held sacred by Philip, who was then at his retreat of Abbiati. Stephen no sooner pronounced the stars to have a favourable aspect, than he agreed that the lady should be sent for. Her friends, afraid of his fickle fantastical temper, had already brought her to Rebecca, which lies within three miles of Abbiati, where she was attended f by her brother and a noble train of Savoyards. The ceremonial of the meeting being settled, the bride appeared mounted on a palfrey behind her brother, and Philip met her on horseback likewise, on a certain spot in the fields, that had been marked out for their first interview. The compliments that passed between them were few; and Philip, after producing a ring, espoused her and mounted her behind himself, took leave of her attendants, and returned to Abbiati to consummate the marriage. He was so well pleased with his bride, that he ordered vast rejoicings to be made on account of the marriage, and not only refused to receive any thing with her in dowry, but even relinquished to her brother the duke, the quiet possession of Vercelli; a generosity which was owing, perhaps, not more to love than to policy, as he thereby made Amadeo his friend.

g PHILIP, after his marriage, had a short respite from war; but he was soon obliged to march his troops against the inhabitants of the Appennines, the Placentine rebels, and some other free-booters in those parts. There is reason to believe, that Philip had no motive for this expedition, but revenge for those people having shewn dispositions to take part with the Venetians in the late war; and all mention of them having been omitted in the pacification, Philip pretended that he had a right to treat them as robbers and traitors; and he proceeded accordingly, by hanging such of them as fell into his hands. The rest of Philip's life and actions, which have not been recounted in the preceding parts of this history, were perfectly detestable. Sforza, notwithstanding his passion for Philip's daughter, knew him too well to press the celebration of the nuptials; though Philip himself had again and again offered to conclude it; but at last a meer accident brought it about. The Venetians were ever intent on their own interests, without regarding those of their confederates, and that made them withdraw their confidence from Sforza, whom they would not trust, but could not discharge. The palm of war was, at this time, divided so equally between him and Picinino, that it was hard to say which had the best right to wear it, though the advantage of magnanimity, generosity, and the other civil virtues, lay on Sforza's side. Add to this, that he had at his devotion a body of troops, the best disciplined of any then in Italy; and they were always ready to follow him, without making any questions whatever party he took. Being extremely careful of his honour, he served every state and master who paid him, with great fidelity, as he considered that the want of success, in their eyes, was the want of merit. He was therefore the more vexed, that the Venetians did not enable him to carry on the war in Lombardy, with the same vigour as before, and went to Venice, where he cleared himself of all suspicions so effectually, that the Venetians ordered their troops to withdraw from Tuscany to join him. But before that could be effected, Picinino, who was well supported by Philip, had obtained so many advantages in the field, that there was a probability that Sforza and his army must surrender prisoners of war. Picinino, who had nothing to depend upon for his subsistence but his sword, thought himself so sure of that, that having made his dispositions, he sent to demand of Philip the city and territory of Piacenza, because, as he said, he was not master of so much earth as would bury him. Philip no sooner received this message, than, either out of caprice or policy, but most probably the former, he resolved to purchase peace at any rate. He accordingly sent Antony Fortona to Sforza, to make an end of all difficulties, and to conclude the marriage without farther delay. The interest of the Venetians, Sforza's masters, was not forgot; for Philip gave up to them all his claims upon the Bressan and the Bergamese, with other cities and forts that had been conquered from him; and matters were made up at the same time with the Florentines. As to Sforza, he obtained the lady in marriage, and with her the city of Cremona. According to some authors, this peace was mediated by Sforza alone; but others say, that Philip dispatched a messenger to sound the dispositions of the Venetian senate, who were as desirous of it as himself; for he obtained Martinengo, and all the forts and places upon the Ghiaradadda; and the claims of the Gonzaga family upon the Mantuan, were settled at the same time.

THIS peace, which in itself was equitable, pleased all Italy, excepting the pope and Picinino. The nuncio of the former, when it was concluded, left Venice in a rage, breathing fury against the contracting parties, for having, he said, betrayed the interests of the church. As to Picinino, Philip (A), the moment the articles were agreed upon, sent him a peremptory order to make a truce with Sforza for a year. This command came upon him like a thunder-bolt. He refused to obey it, till Philip gave him to understand, that, if he did not comply, he would give him up to his enemies, from whom he knew he could expect no quarter; upon which Picinino was, with the utmost reluctance, forced to submit. The marriage between Sforza and Philip's daughter, was celebrated at Cremona. According to Paul Jovius, Philip was long in suspense, whether to give the preference of his succession to Alphonso king of Naples, or to Sforza. The former was befriended in his councils by Brocard Passico and Francis Landriani; and the latter by Andrew Birago and Peter Pusterla. The matter remained long doubtful; but Philip's affection for his daughter prevailed in Sforza's favour, though, as we shall have occasion to observe, he retained still a strong inclination for Alphonso.

THOUGH Philip had every motive, both of interest and inclination, to cherish the peace he had just obtained; yet it scarcely was concluded, when, by his own impatience and suspicious temper, it was disturbed. Alphonso, the king of Naples, having got the advantage of his competitor Regnier, who held nothing in that kingdom but the capital, had seized Benevento, and other great possessions belonging to Sforza, that had been granted to his father for his services in that kingdom. Sforza, who, after the celebration

(A) Whatever historians in general may say, this peace seems not to have been so hastily concluded as they represent, and it was in fact owing to the secret jealousy which all parties had of the pope, as well as the resentment of Philip against Picinino. That it had been for some time in agitation appears pretty plain, from the uncertainty of its date, some placing it in 1440, and some in 1441; whereas the truth is, the chief terms of it were concluded in the former year, but it was not ratified till the latter.

a of his marriage, had retired to Venice, immediately formed connexions in favour of Regnier, who was joined likewise by the pope, the Florentines, and the Genoese; all of whom were jealous of Alphonso's power. He, on the other hand, had recourse to Philip, with whom he had so much reason to be satisfied; and Philip, having nothing to apprehend on the side of Naples, readily came into his views, and even persuaded his holiness to join against Sforza, most of whose estates had formerly belonged to the church. At the same time, Philip offered to send Picinino, who continued still in his service, to his assistance, which he actually did; and Picinino entering the marquisate of Ancona, stripped Sforza of almost all he possessed there. In the mean while, Alphonso drove his competitor Regnier out of Naples, and took that capital; while Antony Bentivoglio of Bologna, the Venetians, b and the Florentines, prepared to assist Sforza. Philip, according to the mysterious manner in which he conducted all his actions, seeing Alphonso in possession of the throne of Naples, was secretly glad of the confederacy that had been formed in favour of his son-in-law; but still proceeded in a way peculiar to himself. He would not give Picinino orders to return with his army to the Milanese, and agreed with Alphonso in suffering Sforza and the pope to fight it out between themselves. Though Picinino's army was paid by himself, yet he was afraid of the entire dependence they had upon their general; and thus Picinino had only himself, and the valour of his soldiers, to depend upon; while Sforza, receiving fresh reinforcements, defeated Picinino, and obliged him to take refuge in Montecchio. This reverse of fortune interested the pope and Alphonso, who were afraid of Sforza's progress, in favour of Picinino, whom they enabled to take the field with a stronger army than before, which turned the tide of war once more against Sforza. When Picinino was on the point of victory, Philip, under a plausible pretext, ordered Picinino to repair to Milan, which he did, leaving the command of his army to his son. Sforza laid hold of that opportunity to attack young Picinino, whom he entirely defeated, and took prisoner; and the father, perceiving that he had been deceived and abandoned by Philip, died of grief in the year 1445. Sforza, by his late victory, regained his estates in Ancona, and came to an accommodation with his holiness.

But continues in the Venetian service.

WE have already seen the revolution which, at this time, happened in the Bolognese, in which Philip had so great concern. Notwithstanding Sforza's late accommodation with the pope, he never had been able to prevail with Philip to give him the command of his army, who sent for Ciarpellone, a general officer who had deserted from the Venetian service, to succeed Picinino. Ciarpellone was then in Sforza's army; but upon his receiving Philip's order, he was arrested and put to death, though it does not clearly appear upon what pretext. We are informed, that Philip, before this, had given an estate to Ciarpellone in the Milanese. This outrage upon Philip's dignity, produced another war in Ancona and Lombardy. Philip was joined, in supporting Gismond Malatesta of Rimini, by the pope and the king of Naples; as was Sforza in stripping him of his estates, by the Venetians and the Florentines. Philip, upon the death of Ciarpellone, had given the command of his army to young Picinino, whom Sforza had set at liberty. But he was totally defeated at c Casal by the Venetians, who pursued their advantages to the very heart of the Milanese, and the gates of that capital; while Sforza baffled two attempts formed by his father-in-law upon Cremona and Pontremoli. The successes of the Venetians produced a reconciliation between Philip and his son-in-law Sforza. Both of them were perfectly sensible that the Venetians aimed at becoming masters of the Milanese. The duke could immediately receive no assistance from his ally Alphonso king of Naples, who however promised to send it to him; and being now dispirited, blind, and neglected by his subjects, he found himself obliged, after all his fine-spun politics, to apply for relief to his son-in-law Sforza.

THE latter had a difficult game to manage. He was still commander in chief of the Venetian army, though his kinsman Attendula, an able and brave officer, was the acting f general, and had entirely broken the power of Philip's army under Picinino, and therefore was extremely cautious in his answer to Philip. The Venetians were not insensible of the views of his father-in-law, and endeavoured to outbid him, by offering him a power over their armies, little inferior to that of a perpetual dictator. Sforza's indiction still continued; and the Venetians thought themselves, through their late successes, powerful enough to force him into their measures. They imprisoned an envoy he sent to their senate. They cancelled all the public acts they had passed in his favour; and at last they attempted to surprise Cremona, in which they failed. In the mean while, Philip had lost almost all his towns upon the Adda; and Brandolino erected the Venetian standard under the walls of Milan, inviting the inhabitants to shake off Philip's yoke, and to assert their liberty. It
g was now high time for Sforza to determine on the part he was to act; and his decision was in favour of his father-in-law. He accordingly set out to his relief; but when he was upon his march, he received accounts of Philip's death, which happened in August 1448, when he was sixty years of age, from a violent fever.

Philip's death and character.

PHILIP's character is one of the most difficult to draw of any in history. Though he is allowed, by all writers, to have been one of the best soldiers and completest statesmen of his age; yet distrust and superstition had weakened him to a degree of the lowest contempt with his friends, as well as his enemies. He naturally was expensive, magnificent, and voluptuous; yet he seldom enjoyed quiet, and more than once brought his dominions to the brink of ruin by his parsimony. Paul Jovius, who was the best acquainted with his character of any other writer, is of opinion, that the unexampled generosity he shewed to Alphonso king of Naples, was the result of his own magnanimity; that he excelled all his ancestors in the splendor of living; that the magnificence of his hospitality was inexpressible; and other writers agree in celebrating the politeness of his address, and the sprightliness of his conversation: while all allow, that he bore the most mortifying reverses of fortune with the greatest calmness and intrepidity. The same authors who cloath him with this noble character, admit that he was naturally so timid, that he trembled at hearing a small clap of thunder; and that on such occasions he fled like one distracted to dark subterraneous recesses. When at home he generally lived in a small closet that could receive but very little company. The access to his person was very difficult. He commonly managed his business at second hand, and shewed great aversion to company. In the latter part of his life, he pretended that his eye-sight had failed him, and that he could not discern one person from another; while those who were better acquainted with him, thought that this defect proceeded only from affectation and distrust; and that the frequent use he made of interpreters and monitors proceeded from dissimulation. He took great delight in reading history; and, according to Paul Jovius, who lived near the time, he used a spying or magnifying-glass^a, to look at the young men belonging to his court, as they were playing at tennis, or exercising themselves in wrestling; and when he saw any who pleased him by their address, vigour, or beauty, he commonly took them into his service about his person; a circumstance that has borne hard upon his memory, though Paul Jovius attempts to vindicate him from any suspicions of unnaturality.

AFTER the murder of his wife, and several wanton executions he ordered, it would be difficult to clear him from the charge of being personally cruel; but Jovius lays the blame of many of his failings upon bad advisers, particularly upon Oldrati Lampugnani, who had been bred up with him from his youth, and had obtained an entire sway over his affections, by depreciating all but his own merits, and those of his favourites. Philip's failings grew with his age; and Jovius himself acknowledges, that towards the end of his life, his bad qualities encreased, particularly his inconstancy and cruelty. He is accused, while he was fickle and variable in his friendship, to have been determined and inexorable in his hatred, and that; however he might seem to overlook it, he never pardoned an offence that had been once given him.

His irresolution made him unhappy at the time of his death; for though he had nothing but the assistance of Sforza to depend on, and though he doated on his daughter Blanche, yet he could not bear the thoughts of Sforza, who, as we have already said, was a bastard, succeeding him in his dominions, and still turned his thoughts towards Alphonso. That prince had nobly repaid the generosity which had been shewn him by Philip, whose partiality towards him went so far, as it is said, to make a will in his favour, which never was signed, Philip being deterred by the universal aversion that prevailed amongst his subjects against the Neapolitans. Alphonso III. of Naples, however, hearing that this will had been destroyed, put in his claim to the *Milanes*e succession.

Affairs of Milan.

By Philip's death, the legitimate male line of the Visconti family was at an end, and the next lawful heir was Valentina his sister, who had married the duke of Orleans, son to Charles V. of France. By the contract of that marriage, the lawful progeny of it was to succeed to the duchy of Milan, in failure of the heirs male. But this provision was disputed by the emperor, who pretended that it could not be valid without his consent, which it never had obtained. Notwithstanding this objection, neither Sforza nor the French court regarded the imperial authority, and the people of Milan regarded it less than either. Sforza had great difficulties to conquer before he could make good his claim. By his difference with the Venetians he had not been able to pay his troops; and he knew that most of the powers of Italy were his enemies. Though he had a great party in the *Milanes*e, yet that city was far from being united. Many of its inhabitants inclined to a republican government, and some to Alphonso; but the republicans proved the most powerful. Sforza, to give them as little time as possible for deliberation, moved with his army towards Milan, and offered its inhabitants his services. By this time, they had established themselves into a kind of republic government; and we are now to consider the house of Visconti to be entirely at an end. The great figure which they had for some

- a ages made in the affairs of Italy; the prodigious magnificence of their buildings and public works, and their strength, especially under Barnabo, compared to their power ever since, makes it plain that the Visconti on the whole were a generous and a wise family.
- SFORZA* received an answer to his application, that the people of Milan were ready to take him into their pay upon the same terms on which he had served the late duke; and that in the mean time they were willing to relinquish to him Brescia and Verona, as soon as he could conquer them. It would be disgusting the reader, should we proceed in the history of the Sforza family, which we were unavoidably obliged to insert in the foregoing parts of this work, particularly in our history of Florence, where he will find a full account of Lewis Sforza, who made so great a figure in the history of Italy, and who fell
- b a sacrifice to his own cunning. It is certain, that if a legal title by birth lay to the succession of the Milanese, it was vested in the house of Orleans and the kings of France. Lewis XII. accordingly put in his claim to the same, as being grandson of John Galeazzo; and for some time he was successful; but the insolence of the French was such, that they were driven out of the Milanese by the Swiss and Maximilian Sforza; and Francis I. of France, in his turn, defeated the Swiss and Milanese, and obliged the descendants of the Sforza family to relinquish the government for a pension of thirty thousand ducats a year. Francis Sforza, the son of Maximilian, however, being assisted by the emperor and the pope, regained the possession of the Milanese about the year 1521; and eight years after, the French king, by the treaty of Cambray, gave up his claim upon that duchy.
- c BUT, in fact, the emperors of Germany had, perhaps, the fairest title to the Milanese, in right of their being formerly sovereigns of Italy. Upon the death of Francis Sforza, therefore, in the year 1536, the emperor Charles V. declared the Milanese to be an imperial fief, and granted the investiture of it to his son Philip II. king of Spain, in whose family it continued till the year 1706, when the French and Spaniards were driven out of it by the imperialists, and the emperor again took possession of it as a fief. It was confirmed to his house by the treaty of Baden in 1714, by the quadruple alliance in 1718, and by the peace of Aix la-Chapelle in 1748. This fine duchy, however, has undergone prodigious dismemberments, as we shall have occasion to observe in the history of Savoy; though her imperial majesty, as heiress of the house of Austria, never has relinquished the dominium directum; which, however, seems more properly to belong to her husband, as head of the empire, than to her. The duke of Modena, who is in high favour with the imperial court, was appointed, in 1754, imperial vicar-general and governor of the Milanese, during the minority of the archduke of Austria, Peter Leopold, who is declared governor-general of the Austrian Lombardy.

END of the HISTORY of MILAN.

The HISTORY of MODENA and FERRARA.

S E C T. I.

Containing a Geographical Description of Modena.—History of the Modenese to the Year 1762.

Description of Modena, and its territory.

WE have, in the several parts of this work, been so full on the history of the different parts of Italy, as occasion presented, that it would be repeating the same thing over, should we particularize all the facts in which Modena was concerned in common with the other Italian states. We shall therefore, in conformity with our proposed brevity, touch upon a general description of the duchy, and the history of its dukes, in their order of succession, which we had no opportunity of introducing before.

MODENA is surrounded by the duchies of Parma and Mantua, the ecclesiastical state, the duchy of Florence, and the republic of Lucca. It is, from south to north, fifty-six English miles, and from west to east, between twenty-four and thirty-six. The soil is reckoned generally good, and is full of natural medicines, which are famous for curing particular diseases. Modena is the capital of the duchy; and though not celebrated for its lofty buildings and spacious streets, it contains several objects worthy the curiosity of a traveller. The new city, however, is tolerable, and visited for its fine pictures, and particularly the famous night-piece of Correggio, representing the birth of Christ, and the adoration of the shepherds, which is reckoned to be one of the finest in the world. The most celebrated churches, are those of the Jesuits, the Theatines, and the Dominicans. In the college founded by St. Borromeo, seventy or eighty young noblemen are maintained and instructed. The ducal palace is magnificent, and full of excellent pictures. Reggio, anciently called Rhegium Lepidi, is the next town of note in the duchy, and a bishop's see, under the archbishop of Bologna. It lies in a healthy situation, and deserves, more than Modena does, to be the capital of the duchy. It is tolerably well fortified, and inhabited by people of fashion. The city of Reggio passed through a vast number of hands, before it came to the house of Este. The manner of living here is licentious, through the formality and strictness of devotion that prevails amongst the fair sex, and which gives them great liberties.

CARPI is of itself a principality, though a small one, and lies about four leagues from Modena. It formerly belonged to the house of Pio; the elder sons of which bore the title of princes of St. Gregory. In the beginning of the fourteenth century, Manfroy was the first prince of Carpi; but in the sixteenth Albert Pio, after serving the emperors Maximilian and Charles V. entered into the service of Francis I. of France, and was his ambassador to pope Clement VII. upon which account, being found at Rome, at the sack of that city, the emperor Charles V. gave his principality to Alfonzo, duke of Ferrara, in whose hands great part of it was before, having been obliged to surrender it to defend himself from his own cousins and kinsmen. The duke of Ferrara, in recompence, gave to the family the town of Sassuolo, and some other lands. Albert was, however, at last obliged to retire to Paris, where, being stripped of all his estates, he died in 1538, with the reputation of one of the best and bravest men of his age. The family of Pio is yet in being, and continues attached to the French court. Some of them have been even raised to the purple, and still make a figure in Europe. Correggio is another principality of this duchy, but its heads forfeited their estate by taking part in the wars of Italy against the emperor, who conferred it on the duke of Modena. The princes of that house now live at Parma, and pretend to be descended of a natural son of the house of Austria. Berselli is another territory, lying in the same duchy, and was formerly celebrated both in the Roman and the Longobardic history. It is now dwindled down to an inconsiderable place, compared to what it was. In 1702 the fortifications were blown up; the place itself having been bombarded by the duke of Vendosme. It is at Berselli that the Po divides the Modenese and the Mantuan, and those two dukes jointly contributed in fitting out and maintaining a vessel on that river, for collecting their duties, and preventing all illicit commerce. But the imperial court gave orders, upon a quarrel with the duke of Mantua, for destroying this custom-house yacht (as we may call it) which was accordingly done; and the dukes of Modena have a have ever since been endeavouring to repair Bersilli, which would be of vast advantage to the navigation of the river on their side.

RUBIERA is a fortress lying between Modena and Reggio, but is by no means strong, and serves at present to confine state prisoners. Final of the Modenese, so called to distinguish it from the Final of the Genoese, is a pretty little town, lying on the river Panara, five leagues from Modena, towards Ferrara. By its situation, it is greatly exposed to the ravages of war; and during the two last wars in Italy, it was frequently the theatre of action, and obliged to obey both sides, as each prevailed. Sassuolo formerly belonged to the princes of Carpi, and at present is a palace belonging to the duke of Modena. Nouantola is the rich and famous abbey we have taken notice of so often in the history of Bologna.

b The remains of it are still magnificent; but the few monks who repair to it are miserably poor, while the revenues of the abbey are pocketed either by the duke of Modena, or some of his family. According to some authors, this monastery was founded by the famous countess Matilda; others say, by Anselm, a religious Lombard prince, who himself led a life of devotion, and settled in that, and other religious houses in the neighbourhood, upwards of one thousand monks. Canosa is the celebrated castle, lying on the top of a mountain, and giving title to an earl, where the countess Matilda, and her gallant pope Gregory, obliged the emperor Henry IV. to wait for three days successively bare footed (though he was a very high-spirited prince) in 1076, in a coarse woollen penitential habit, without eating or drinking, during very severe weather, and with tears to implore to be re-admitted
c into the bosom of the church. It appears that Canosa was, at that time, the strongest place in all the countess's extended dominions. Its counts were sometimes masters of Reggio. Garfagno is a mountainous district, without any thing remarkable to distinguish it, excepting great plenty of wild bears.

MIRANDOLA is part of Modena, and formerly was governed by dukes of the name of Pico. It lies surrounded by Modena, Mantua, and Ferrara, and has, by turns, been subject to all three. In the beginning of this century, at the death of Charles II. of Spain, the duke, who was then a minor, under the guardianship of his mother, applied conjointly with her to the emperor Leopold for assistance, to maintain herself in the regency; but soon after, upon the accession of the duke of Anjou to the Spanish monarchy, they slighted the d emperor's protection, and joined with the French and Spaniards, in recognizing Mirandola as part of the Milanese. The Imperialists, who were then in Italy, immediately stripped the duchess dowager of all her power, and entered Mirandola. The French besieged and took the place in 1705; upon which the young duke threw himself upon their protection; but soon after, the French being expelled from that part of Italy, the duke lost all his estates, which were given to one of the duke of Modena's sons. He was, at the same time, put under the ban of the empire, but obtained, in 1711, an offer of a million of gilders, which were accordingly paid him; and the possession of Mirandola was confirmed to the duke of Modena, by the peace of Aix la Chapelle, in 1748. Mirandola itself is a strong city, with a citadel, and is a bishop's see, and was of infinite service, during the last war in e Italy, to the French. The last city in the Modenese to be spoken of, is Cento: this is a little town, and was taken by pope Alexander VI. from the bishop of Bologna, who was indemnified by other lands, and given with his natural daughter Lucrece Borgia, in dowry to Alphonso, the first duke of Ferrara. Pope Julius II. cancelled this deed, and restored Cento to the bishops of Bologna; but upon the death of Leo X. duke Alphonso again took possession of it, and the house of Este has ever since held it in fealty of the holy see. We have been the more explicit on the history of those several little principalities, because they were in fact formerly so many sovereign princes, though holding nominally only of the emperor or the pope.

f THE house of Este, from which the dukes of Modena are descended, originally came from Germany along with the emperor Charlemagne. They take the name of Este from a small, but handsome, city in the Paduan, where they remained after the return of that great prince to Germany. The first of the family we have any precise knowledge of, was Azo, who seems to have been a commissary or chamberlain for the imperial interest. In progress of time the emperor's residence being confined to Germany or France, his title and person was scarcely remembered; and the successes of those who had been imperial lieutenants in Italy, were such, that though they did not declare themselves independent upon the imperial power, yet acted as if they had been so. Each seized upon the portion or territory of power that had been allotted him or his ancestors; and their commissions, from being only temporary and limited, became hereditary, it being very difficult to retrace the tenures on g which they originally held them. Notwithstanding this, it is generally agreed, that all Lombardy and Tuscany, and even the Romagna held of the empire.

A Z O, the first count or marquis of Este, like the other imperial substitutes there, kept his residence sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, and assumed the title of lord over the places he held. The truth is, he seems to have been one of the most early feudaries in Italy. At first, those substitutes had no pretext to any hereditary power; but the troubles of the empire, that immediately succeeded the reign of Charles the Great, not suffering the emperors to send new ones, their possessions and governments descended to their sons. Este, from which Azzo took his name, was very probably a place of consequence. The dominions annexed to it, reached over great part of Lombardy, and the towns on both sides the Po, amongst which were Cremona, Mantua, Ferrara, Guastalla, and others, of which he had the superintendency or government. He is said to have died in the year 970. He was succeeded by his son Theodald, and according to others by Boniface. This Theodald had married a natural daughter of the emperor Otho II. and added to his paternal government the city of Lucca, then one of the most considerable in Italy; and, according to some, the government of all Tuscany. It is pretended, that in virtue of this power he assumed the title of Imperial Vicar; and that as such he exercised the most extensive authority over the greatest part of Italy, though his dominions were incontestably subject to the empire; for the independent claims of sovereignty were not yet set up; nor in so small a distance of time was the power of Charles the Great forgotten. Its remembrance, however, began to be weakened; for Theodald was succeeded by his son, tho' others say by his brother Boniface. He likewise married a daughter of the emperor Conrade II. sister to Henry III. Her name was Beatrix, and she was mother to the famous countess Matilda. The wars between the popes and the emperors had, by this time, broken out, and all Italy then groaned under the yoke of the Normans. Boniface, who is sometimes called marquis of Mantua, and sometimes of Modena, was assassinated at Spinetta, and left two children, Boniface and Matilda. But Boniface dying, Matilda became the heiress of that great estate. She inherited her mother's aversion to the emperors of Germany, and found a fit tool to work upon her passions in the person of the famous Hildebrand, afterwards pope Gregory VII. He was by birth a Tuscan of a mean extraction; and being brought up at Rome, he was admitted a monk of Cluni. Being of an active, turbulent disposition, and an enthusiast for the papal power; he was employed by the court of Rome in the numerous intrigues and disputes between it and the emperors. But, at that time, the popes generally received their confirmation from the emperor, and sometimes the latter nominated the very person whom they were to chuse. In other parts of this history; we have been very full on the transactions of those times. It is certain that Gregory arrived at the pitch of insolence and power he attained to, by getting the entire management of the estates belonging to Matilda; and, according to some, the possession of her person. Having found means to imbroid the princes of Germany with one another, he repaired, as the arbiter of their disputes, to Augsburgh, attended by Matilda. Having proceeded successfully there, and sufficiently humbled the emperor Henry IV. he returned to Italy. During his absence from Germany, the emperor recovered his power so far, that all of a sudden he broke into Italy, with a design to depose the pope; who upon that intelligence retired with Matilda to the castle of Canosa, of which we have already spoken. But nothing could humble the spirit of Gregory, while supported by Matilda, who, in right of her mother, pretended to be an independent sovereign; and in some histories they are termed queens of Italy. The emperor, who was not then above twenty-five, had got a decisive victory over the Saxons, and yet he was excommunicated by Gregory. Upon a frivolous pretence, he treated the king of France in the same manner as he did the Normans, and several other princes both in Germany and Italy. All this he effected by playing one power against another, through the assistance of Matilda. He was likewise greatly assisted by some attempts that had been made upon his life by a ruffian, one Synefius, who was employed by the emperor to assassinate him, and by the divisions which then reigned in Germany; thro' which he gained almost all the prelates and clergy, and one half of the lay power, to his interest. This raised him to such a pitch of arrogance, that he set at nought the imperial power, and at last he presumed to depose the emperor himself.

Original of the house of Este.

History of the countess Matilda.

The emperor humbled by the pope.

Thus the emperor, instead of humbling the pope, was himself reduced to the danger of being himself actually deposed, and obliged to come to the disgraceful resolution of repairing to Canosa, and submit himself, in the most abject manner, to his holiness. It is said, that at first he insisted upon Henry's surrendering into his hands his crown, and all the badges of his authority, and acknowledging himself unworthy to wear them. This sentence was mitigated by Henry obtaining an interview with his cousin the countess Matilda; and upon her return to Canosa, she was attended by some of the chief princes in Italy, who were friends to Henry, for whom they all interceded. It is probable, that the whole of this negotiation was a piece of management contrived by the countess and his holiness, who, with great seeming difficulty, was at last prevailed upon to suffer Henry to repair to Canosa. He accordingly left his army at Vercelli, and went with a few attendants to Canosa. That town, or rather fort, had three inclosures. Henry was stopped when he passed the first, and his

a retinue was prohibited from proceeding farther; so that he was admitted by himself alone into the second inclosure, where being stripped of his robes, he was dressed in a hair-cloth, and obliged to wait and fast for three days, notwithstanding the extremity of the weather. At last he gained admission to the pope, to whom he made all the submissions that his haughtiness could require; and after the most humiliating behaviour, he received pardon and absolution from his holiness, though upon very hard terms.

b AFTER this, the countess Matilda, who seems to have been a weak-brained enthusiast for the see of Rome, but in other respects not destitute of spirit and prudence, made a gift to the pope of all her estates in Italy; and this gift laid the foundation of all the differences between the Guelphs and Gibelins. As to Matilda, though she was twice married, she left no children: and the haughtiness of the pope had almost proved his and her ruin. The Italians and Germans could not bear to reflect upon the shameful part Henry had acted, and obliged him to break the compromise he had entered into with his holiness. After remaining for some time near Canosa, he formed a design for seizing both the pope and Matilda; but receiving timely notice of it, they remained upon their guard within Canosa, which disconcerted all the emperor's schemes. The rest of Matilda's history belongs properly to the general history of Italy, and may be found in the other parts of this work.

c THE next marquis of Este we meet with on record, was Azo II. the son of Albert, or Sigibert, a younger son of Theodald, and brother to Boniface, father to the countess Matilda. Her ill-advised donation had cut all the blood of Este out of their patrimonial inheritance; but Azo II. found means, however, to retain some estates that had been purchased, or conquered, by his father. By prudence and abilities he rendered himself necessary to the popes who succeeded Gregory VII. and thereby he gradually enlarged his possessions, even during the life-time of Matilda, whose heir in blood was the emperor Henry IV. There was no question as to Matilda's title to her estates; but the emperor pretended that she could not alienate the feudatory rights from the empire. For this reason he made light of his kinswoman's donation: but this proved a matter of more importance than he had foreseen. The Italian princes, or, as they were called, vicars, in general were much better pleased with their subjection to the pope, than to the emperor, and could be of little consequence but by maintaining the papal power. The weakness of the times contributed greatly to the prejudices that prevailed against the emperor, on account of his opposing the pope. But notwithstanding all those circumstances, many of the states that had recognized Matilda's authority, during her life-time, stuck to the emperor. Amongst those were Cremona, Mantua, Guastalla, Lucca, and a great part of Tuscany. Azo II. kept himself as neutral as possibly he could, and became at last the head of that branch of the Este family, that came to the possession of the Ferrarese; so that he is generally reckoned in the Guelph interest. Hugh, who was earl of Maine by his mother, succeeded Azo II. and was himself succeeded by Obizo, the first marquis of Este, lord of Verona, and other places, to which pope Celestine, in 1194, added the lordship of Ancona.
e It happened to be a fortunate circumstance for the Guelph interest, that many inferior magistrates at this time held deputations from the pope, over particular cities and places, under the denomination of podestas, in which they maintained themselves without acknowledging the imperial power, but in a nominal, rather than a real, dependence upon the popes. Those podestas, such as Fermo, Senagaglia, and Pesaro, were not hereditary; and, as they fell, were by degrees conferred by the popes upon the princes of Ferrara, whom they looked upon to be their chief bulwark in Italy. Azo II. died in 1212, as his son Azo III. did in 1264. His son Rinaldo died in his father's life-time, as did his brother Obizo II. About the end of the thirteenth century, the house of Este became very powerful, through the devolution of many states or podestas that were joined to it.
f The next head of that house was Azo IV. whose son Francis, by a former marriage, being afraid to be disinherited, if his father should leave children by his second wife, who was daughter to Charles II. king of Naples, put him to death, and by the assistance of the Venetians, made himself master of Ferrara, which he fortified, but was obliged to resign his rights to the Venetians. This Francis is represented as being a monster of cruelty; and for some time, by the assistance of the Venetians, he kept himself in possession of Ferrara, till his crimes became so odious, that pope Clement V. published a crusade against the Venetians, leaving every man at liberty to seize upon their goods, and to kill their persons wherever they could be found. Platina pretends, that Francis, by his cruelties in the Ferrarese, where he had reduced half that city to ashes, obliged the subjects to invite the Venetians to protect them from his fury. Notwithstanding this, they were involved in the crusade now published against them; and the riches they had acquired by merchandize being immense, a vast many hands were found to execute it. Cardinal Pelegre was sent by his holiness, with full powers, to take care of the papal interest in Ferrara; and by help of the Florentines, he retook that city in the name of his holiness, and gave the government of it to Robert, son to the king of Naples. That prince being soon after obliged, on account of his father's death, to return to his paternal dominions, he left the government of the Ferrarese to one Diego, a Catalan, with orders to preserve the subjects in their obedience to the holy see. But their affections being fixed on the family of Este, they rebelled against their new governor, which obliged him to draw the garrison out of the citadel, and to hang twenty-eight of the chief partizans of the Este family. This brought the popes to consider what the consequences might be, if they should persist in their endeavours to reannex the sovereignty of the Ferrarese to the see of Rome. For this reason Benedict XII. gave the investiture of the Ferrarese to Obizo III. brother to Francis, who died in the year 1309. This Obizo married Jacqueline Pepoli, by whom he had no children, but by his mistress, Lippa Ariosta, he had eleven, whom he publickly owned; and having married her before his death, they succeeded him in his estates without opposition. The eldest son was Aldobrandin, who, by the sage advice of his mother, who had been, in a manner, associated by his father in the government, ruled his dominions with great prudence. Aldobrandin died without children, and was succeeded by his brother Albert, who had a mistress named Ifotta, whom he married some time before his death, and by her he left issue Nicholas, surnamed The Lane. His succession was disputed, on account of his illegitimacy, by Azo, a descendant from the first marquis of Este; but Nicholas maintained his ground against all opposition; and being accounted a prince equally magnanimous and politic, he was termed the arbiter of Italy, and courted by most of the Italian princes of his age. He possessed himself of Ferrara and Modena, Parma, Reggio, and other cities, and left behind him two legitimate, and two natural sons. Leonel, the eldest of the natural sons, in right of seniority, took possession of his estates in prejudice of the legitimate heirs, whom he sent to be educated at the court of Alphonso of Arragon, king of Naples, as being the most proper school where they could learn the art of reigning. During their absence, his government was so mild and beneficent, that he reconciled all the Ferrarese to his allegiance. He rebuilt the walls of Ferrara, and enlarged the streets; he embellished the buildings; he founded churches and monasteries, and behaved with excessive prudence and affability towards all who approached him. He married a princess of the house of Gonzaga, and by her he had a son named Nicholas, whom on his death-bed he recommended to the care of his brother Borso, who accordingly put him in possession of his estates, when he became of age fit for governing. This Leonel died in 1450. Some historians have, with great probability, assigned him another wife, a daughter of Alphonso, king of Naples. They pretend that Alphonso the more readily complied with this match, in hopes that his daughter's children might succeed to the duchies of Modena and Ferrara: and, indeed, when we consider the little difference that was paid to legitimacy in this family, we cannot well be surprized at the fact. The Neapolitan princess, however, having no son, Borso became administrator of the duchies, but seems to have served his brother's son, as his brother had served the legitimate offspring of his father; for he acted as administrator for full twenty-one years, but behaved with so much wisdom, liberality, and magnificence, that the defects of his title were overlooked; so that it is remarkable in this family, that the princes of it supplied their defect of title, by the exercise of those virtues which ought to have given them title. In short, when the emperor Frederick III. came into Italy, Borso performed so many eminent services to him, and received him with so much politeness and magnificence, that he created him, as a mark of his regard, duke of Modena and Reggio, in the year 1451. Pope Paul II. in imitation of the emperor, when Borso came to visit the holy places about Rome, created him duke of Ferrara, a title which he said depended immediately upon the holy see. Borso shewed himself more worthy to reign, than his brother Leonel, with all his good qualities, had done; for he never married: and, at the beginning of his administration, he recalled from their exile at the court of Naples his brothers Hercules and Sigismond, the sons of Nicholas the Lane; and he treated his nephew Nicholas, the son of Leonel, with all the regard and affection that was due to his blood, except placing him in the government of the Ferrarese, which we do not find he ever offered to do. Some authors affect to be surprized that pope Paul II. who could not be ignorant of the defeat of Borso's title, never made any objection to his legitimacy, but rather seemed to give it a sanction. This is easily accounted for, when we consider that it was the maxim of the popes to weaken the right of succession, by primogeniture or legitimacy, all that they could. They, as well as the emperors, pretended to the full disposal of every succession that held of them; and to obviate the danger of going out of the line of Este, they conferred it upon Borso.

Modena.*

^a BORSO was succeeded by his brother Hercules I. who, as we have seen, was bred up at the Neapolitan court, and was forty-five years of age when he came to govern. He had married Eleanor of Arragon, daughter to the king of Naples, of whom he had a numerous progeny. His title, however, was disputed by Nicholas, the son of Leonel, who had formed some intrigues to seize upon the regency; but he was surprized in his attempts, and his head was cut off without any orders from his uncle, and even without consulting him; for which reason Hercules banished the offenders. He was one of the greatest princes of his time, both in the field and the cabinet. His differences with the Venetians have been repeatedly taken notice of in this history, as also those with pope Sixtus IV. and he acquitted himself, on all occasions, with the greatest honour and credit, both as to his valour and wisdom. He was much befriended by the other princes of Italy, and aggrandized Ferrara, both in its fortifications and buildings. He left behind him four sons and two daughters; one of whom, Beatrix, was married to Lewis Sforza, duke of Milan; and the other to Francis Gonzaga, marquis of Mantua. His brother Sigismond, was the author of the de Estes of St. Martin, which, we are told, are still in being. One of his sons, Hippolito, was raised to the purple by Alexander VI. and made a considerable figure amongst the scholars and politicians of that age.

*Hercules I
Modena.*

^b ALPHONSO, the eldest son, succeeded his father in his duchy in 1505, and, like him, was a great general, and deeply involved in war. Upon the expulsion of the house of Medici from Florence, the Florentines gave him the command of their troops, for which the popes Julius II. and Leo X. conceived an invincible aversion to him, and his interest. He married Lucretia Borgia, daughter to pope Alexander VI. but upon the death of that pontiff, and his successor Pius III. pope Julius II. stripped him of Modena, Reggio, Rubiera, and other places he held beyond the Po. Upon the death of Leo X. he availed himself of the vacancy or interregnum of the holy see, to repossess himself of Reggio, Rubiera, and other states: but, as we have seen in the preceding parts of this work, he was so useful to the emperor Charles V. that he took him into his particular protection, and continued his friend against all the power and machinations of his enemies. Under Adrian VI. who was a wise and pacific pontiff, he obtained some time to breathe; and it is said to have been owing to his counsels, that the duke of Bourbon marched against Rome. As the use of artillery was now become frequent in Europe, he shewed so great a genius for the improvement of guns, cannons, and other warlike machines, that he is said to have been the best engineer of his age. He was almost in perpetual wars, till the treaty between the pope and the emperor, in 1526, reinstated him in his dominions. One of the articles of that treaty was, that pope Clement should give him the investiture of Ferrara, which his holiness never really intended to do; and that the duke should retain possession of Modena, Reggio, and Carpi, for which he was to become subject to the emperor only. The same emperor promised him likewise the possession of Novi, and to give him one of his daughters in marriage. The insincerity of the pope, and the cautious mercenary disposition of the emperor, once more brought matters into confusion. When the emperor, in 1530, came to receive the imperial crown at Bologna, Alphonso attended him; and there it was agreed, that Charles should take into his own hand the city of Modena, as a deposit, till he should pronounce sentence between them, which he did at Ghent in 1532. By his award the duke, in consideration of peaceably possessing his dominions, was to pay to his holiness one hundred and forty thousand golden ducats, and an annual subsidy of seven thousand, as a quit-rent for the duchy of Ferrara. His holiness, who was perfectly well skilled in all the arts of cunning and procrastination, refused to ratify this award, which did not take place during his life-time. This Alphonso was three times married. His first wife was Anne Sforza, daughter to the duke of Milan; and by her he had no issue. By his second wife, Lucretia Borgia, whom he married for interest and conveniency, he had ^c Hercules II. who succeeded him; Hippolito, who was a cardinal, archbishop of Milan, and one of the richest ecclesiastics of his age; Francis, marquis of Massa, who left behind him only one daughter. The third marriage of Alphonso I. was with a lady of Ferrara, whom he had secretly, for some time, kept as his mistress. Her name was Laura Eustochia; and upon the death of Lucretia Borgia, he espoused her, and legitimated her son Don ^d Alphonso, prince of Montecchio; which legitimation was afterwards disputed.

*Alphonso duke

Hercules II.

^e HERCULES II. before his father's death, which happened in 1554, married Rene of France, daughter to Lewis XII. and he served in the French armies as lieutenant-general under Henry II. to whom he proved a brave and an useful ally. His brother, the cardinal archbishop of Milan, having vast preferments in France, was the means of his being attached to that service; and indeed those connexions continued for many years. His duchess was secretly of the reformed religion; and it is confidently reported, that she had an interview on that head at Ferrara, with the famous Calvin. Her conversion gave great disquiet to her husband, and it was during his life-time kept secret; but upon his death, which which happened in 1559, the duchess returned to France, where she made profession of the reformed religion, and died in the same. a

HERCULES II. left by his wife Rene, his son and successor Alphonso II. and Lewis, who was afterwards a cardinal, and succeeded to some of his uncle's great benefices in France, and was one of the brightest ornaments in the Römish church in those days ^b. Alphonso II. was educated in France; but served against the Turks in the imperial armies. He married, first, Lucretia de Medici, daughter to the grand duke of Tuscany. His second wife was Barbara of Austria, daughter to the emperor Frederick; and he had a third wife, Margaret Gonzaga, daughter of William marquis of Mantua; but left behind him no children by either of those marriages. He therefore adopted as his heir and successor Cesar de Este, who was the son of Alphonso prince of Montecchio, whose mother was the Ferrarese lady b we have mentioned. Alphonso II. took all the means he could to render this adoption valid, by procuring it to be ratified by the emperor Rodolph II. But when pope Clement VIII. mounted the papal throne, he declared that Don Cesar could not, as he was illegitimate at the time of his birth, succeed to the duchy of Ferrara, which he not only annexed to the ecclesiastical state, but prepared to take possession of it by main force. The Ferrarese, who doated on Cesar, complained of the injustice done both him and them, as no objection had been made in times past to the legitimacy of their dukes, though not born in wedlock; but all was to no purpose. Don Cesar pleaded the testament of the late duke; but was unable to support his title. His holiness put himself in armour, and marched at the head of a body of troops into Ferrara, from whence he drove Don Cesar out of one c gate, while he himself entered at the head of his army by another. The armour in which the pope was drest, is to be still seen in the vatican; and to take from Don Cesar all hopes of being reinstated in Ferrara, he ordered the gate through which he had escaped, to be walled up.

The pope takes possession of Ferrara.

Don Cesar I. was now obliged to be contented with the title of duke of Modena and Reggio, which dominions he held for about thirty years; and he died in 1628. He married Anne Virginia de Medici, daughter to Cosmo I. duke of Tuscany; and by her he had two sons, Alphonso III. who succeeded him, and Aloisio de Este, marquis of Montecchio and Scandiano, whose only daughter and child Hippolita married Borso de Este. He had likewise Laura, who was married to Alexander duke of Mirandola. This house of Scandiano, d or Montecchio, was extinct in the year 1713.

Alphonso III.

Francis I.

ALPHONSO III. had, in his father's life-time, married Isabella, daughter to duke Charles Emanuel of Savoy, and Catherine Michel of Austria, daughter to Philip II. of Spain. Alphonso III. reigned only about twelve months, when his duchess, a woman of exemplary piety, dying in 1626, he was so affected with her death, that he resigned his dominions to his eldest son Francis I. and retired from the world, taking upon him the habit of a capuchin, and practising all the severities of that order to the time of his death in 1644, in the fifty-third year of his age. His religious name was brother John Baptist. Francis I. espoused the cause of France, which raised him many troubles. He was in his person a brave and accomplished prince; but could not be said to have been fortunate in war. e He commanded the army of the Italian princes in 1643, and in 1656 he commanded the French army which laid siege to Valence upon the Po. The reader here is to observe, that there is some confusion in the denominations of those dukes. Most of the Italian princes do not admit the progeny of Alphonso, son to Laura Eustochia, to be the descendants of the ancient dukes of Modena; and therefore they reckon Alphonso III. to be only the first of that name. Duke Francis I. attempted to take Cremona; but failing in his design, the marquis of Caracena, the Spanish governor of Milan, invaded his dominions, and obliged him to renounce his alliance with France. He was three times married. His first wife was Mary Farnese, daughter to Ranuccio duke of Parma. By her he had Alphonso II. or IV. who succeeded him; two daughters, Isabel and Mary, who were successively married f to Ranuccio II. duke of Parma; Amauri, who died at the siege of Candia; and Eleanor, who betook herself to a monastery. His second wife was Victoria Farnese, the sister of his first wife; by whom he had only a daughter, who died in her infancy. His third wife was Lucretia Barbarina, daughter to Thaddeo prince of Palestrine, brother to pope Urban VIII. who gave, on that account, a cardinal's hat to the duke's brother Rinaldo. This cardinal proved afterwards a great supporter of the French interest, and was, for about thirty years, the protector of that nation. Alphonso II. or IV. the son of duke Francis, was like his ancestors, a warrior. He commanded several times the French armies in Italy, and died of the gout in his stomach in 1662. He married Laura Martinuzzi, the daughter of Jerome Martinuzzi, a Roman nobleman, and of Margaret Mazarine, eldest sister to the famous cardinal of that name. Their issue was Mary Beatrix Eleanor, who was married to the duke of York, afterwards James II. of England; and Francis II. who succeeded to the duchy a of Modena, when he was no more than two years of age. He was therefore brought up under the guardianship of his mother; and in the year 1692 he married Margaret Maria Frances Farnese, daughter of Ranuccio II. Francis II. duke of Modena.

THE duchess dowager being in England at the time of her son's death, the government was administered by Don Cesar marquis of Montecchio, who behaved with great haughtiness towards the duchess, and entirely governed the young duke to the time of his death. The duchess resented this so much, that she complained to the king of France of Don Cesar, who was obliged to retire into the Romagna. The young duke, however, was so fond of him, that he prevailed with his most Christian majesty, and his mother, to suffer Don Cesar to return to Modena, where he behaved with the same haughtiness as ever towards the duchess. Upon this she repaired to Rome; and though the duke her son was very earnest for her return, she could not be persuaded to see him. The duke went in person to Rome, to endeavour to mollify her; but happening to be attended by Don Cesar, the negociation had no effect; and the duke's attachment to him was so great, that it was thought he employed some supernatural means over his mind. The duke, however, was at last once more obliged to give up his favourite, who was obnoxious to almost all the courts of Italy; not only for his insolence towards his prince, but for the oppressive practices he introduced into the government to enrich himself.

FRANCIS II. died without issue in 1694, and was succeeded by his uncle Rinaldo, who immediately sent his cardinal's hat to Rome, and laid down a new plan of conduct, by attaching himself to the imperial court, and married the princess Charlotta Felicita of Brunswick, daughter to John Frederick duke of Brunswick Hanover, who was a Roman Catholic, and sister to the princess Wilhelmina Amelia, who, three years after, married the king of the Romans, who was afterwards the emperor Joseph. It is thought, that he was the more inclined to this match, because the family of Este is supposed to be descended from that of Brunswick. Others think, that he had conceived a disgust, while he was cardinal, against the French king, who had refused him the protectorship of the French nation, and some other favours. His match with a German family, and his putting the imperialists in possession of Bercello, so greatly disoblged the court of France, that in 1703 the French king ordered his army to enter the Modenese, which it did, and obliged all the duke's subjects to take an oath of fidelity to his most Christian majesty. The duke upon this, being in no condition to recover his duchy, went to Bologna, and from thence to Rome, to solicit the pope's mediation at the court of France. He accordingly had several conferences with cardinal Jansson, the French minister at Rome, and was amused by his holiness, with the hopes of receiving an annuity out of his estate of forty thousand crowns a-year; but the negociation proved of no effect. The duke refused to disavow his minister's recognizing the archduke Charles for king of Spain, or to break off his connexions with the imperialists; and Lewis was so exasperated, that he annexed Modena to the duchy of Milan and the estates in Italy, upon which his grandson had pretensions, as belonging to the Spanish succession. Lewis took this step, that he might not alarm the jealousy of the Italian courts, by seeming to keep in his own hands so considerable a dominion in that country. Rinaldo, being thus disappointed, retired once more to Bologna, where he waited with patience till the imperialists entered Italy, under prince Eugene, in 1706. That great general, during the night between the 19th and 20th of November, that same year, recovered Modena by storm, and put all the French, who had not saved themselves in the citadel, to the sword. Soon after, notwithstanding the severity of the season, he besieged and took the citadel likewise; and the French being thus driven out of Milan, Mantua, and Modena, Rinaldo returned from Bolegna, and again took possession of his capital. After this he applied himself to repair the waste that war had made in his dominions, by cultivating the arts of peace; but, in the mean time, he carried on a correspondence with England, Germany, and other parties of the grand alliance, to which he continued always firm. In 1710, he was so rich that he purchased the duchy of Mirandola, and received the investiture of it from the emperor. In 1726, his imperial majesty granted him a principality in Hungary, in consideration of that of Comacchio, which the emperor had yielded to the pope. At last he died, on the 26th of October, 1737, eighty-three years of age, after going through a variety of fortunes. By his wife, he had Benedicta Ernestina Mary, born in 1697, and married to prince Antony of Parma in 1715; Francis Mary, hereditary prince of Modena, born in 1698, who married the second daughter of the late duke of Orleans, by whom he had two sons; Amelia Josepha, born in 1699; and John Frederick Ernest, born in 1700.

g FRANCIS MARY DE ESTE, in 1720, married Charlotte Aëglé de Valois, daughter to the duke of Orleans, regent of France. This match, in its consequences, created a misunderstanding between the prince and his father; and when the late war broke out again between the houses of Bourbon and Austria, in Italy, the duke of Modena, taking a part with the former, lost all his dominions. His conduct during that period has been sufficiently described in other parts of this work. It is enough here to say, that he had a son by his wife, Hercules Renaud, born November 22, 1717, and married September 29, 1741, to Mary Theresa, princess of Massa Carrara, born June 29, 1725; and by this marriage there is likewise issue. By the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, the duke of Modena was reinstated in all his dominions. He soon after paid a visit to king George II. in England, where, though incognito, he met with great marks of respect from the court; and upon his return to Italy, he was, as we have already said, appointed vicar-general, field-marshal, and governor of the Milaneze, during the minority of the archduke Peter Leopold, who was declared governor-general of the Austrian Lombardy. As the imperial court has given him several possessions in the neighbourhood of his duchy, in lieu of his Hungarian estates, he is now looked upon as a very considerable Italian prince. b

END of the HISTORY of MODENA and FERRARA.

The HISTORY of MANTUA.

S E C T. I.

Containing a Description of Mantua; with the History of the Family of Gonzaga, Dukes of Mantua, till their Extinction.

a THE duchy of Mantua is but fifty-six English miles in length, and forty in breadth; but it claims a place here on account of the great figure its heads have made in the affairs of Europe, and particularly in those of Italy. It is surrounded by the Milanese, the Modenese, the ecclesiastical, and the Venetian territories. The Po, which runs through the midst of it, receives the Oglio, Minsio, Secchia, and other rivers. The soil of the Mantuan, like most of the provinces of Italy, is very delectable; and its chief towns are Mantua, Borgoforte, Governolo, Ostiglia, Gonzaga, Goito, Luzara, Viadana, Guastalla, Novellara, Sabionetta, Bozzolo, Castiglione della Stiverè, and Solferino. Situation and Description of the duchy.

MANTUA, the capital, stands in a very undesirable situation, in the middle of a lake, or rather a morass, formed by the Mincio, about fourscore miles to the eastward of Milan, and the same distance to the south-westward of Venice. It is joined to the continent by several bridges, or causeways, which are strongly fortified. The city itself was reckoned to contain about fifty thousand inhabitants; but now, it is said, they are dwindled down to fewer than twenty thousand; four or five thousand of whom are Jews, and live in a separate quarter; and it is above four miles in circumference. Notwithstanding the unwholesomeness of its situation, its streets in general are long, broad, and strait, interspersed with noble palaces, squares, and churches; and, upon the whole, the morass renders it very strong. It contains about eighteen parish churches, others say, twenty-one; four collegiate, besides other churches and alms-houses, eleven oratories, and forty convents. Its suburbs were formerly adorned with noble buildings, particularly the famous palace of The, which is now reduced to the appearance of a stable. The cathedral is a work of the famous Julio Romano, and contains some of the finest paintings in Italy. The church of St. Antony is celebrated for relics, particularly a quantity of our Saviour's blood, which is preserved with the greatest veneration. The inside of the Franciscan church is very elegant; and all that can be said of the ducal palace is, that it is very large. In the palace church are the two famous pictures, the baptism of Constantine, and the martyrdom of St. Andrew. In Mantua was formerly a celebrated museum, which was destroyed by the imperialists in 1630. In short, this city, which was once so renowned for magnificence and manufactures, particularly of silk, can now shew only the ruins of the one, and scarcely any remains of the other. This duchy, however, will be for ever respected, as having been the birth-place of Virgil the poet, who was born at Andes, now Pietolo; and a ducal palace, called La Virgiliana, is still to be seen near the place of his birth. The other towns, or, as they were termed, cities, of this duchy, deserve no particular description, being remarkable for nothing but for battles and the trumpery of relics, all the gold and silver they contain being confined to shrines and statues in their churches. and of its capital.

THE reader will find the old history of Mantua in the ancient history of Italy, where it once made a capital figure. It followed the fate of the other cities of Lombardy, when Charles the Great invaded that country; for all its boasted antiquity could not save it from subjection to the Goths and Lombards, and afterwards to Charles. The emperor Otho II. as we have seen in the history of Modena, gave the lordship of Mantua, and other cities, to Theodald; and notwithstanding the history of those times are very uncertain, Theodald's son Boniface, and the famous countess Matilda, daughter to the latter, held the government of Mantua as vicars to the empire, though Matilda pretended to possess them in her own right. It may, perhaps, be difficult to prove her right to an undoubted fief of the empire. It appears, however, from historians who lived in or near her time, that Boniface eloped with her mother, the emperor Henry III.'s daughter, and married her; but her father is said to have been afterwards reconciled to both, and to have bestowed upon Mantua's different masters.

them the great possessions in Italy inherited by Matilda. Upon the quarrel between that lady and her cousin the emperor Henry IV. he took Mantua, and she retook it in 1114, the year before her death. For some years after, the emperors of Germany suffered Mantua, and other fiefs of the empire in Italy, to live under free governments of their own, with only a very distant acknowledgment of their imperial power. Mantua, in Matilda's time, was so very important a city, that it gave her the chief title she affected; but tho' she conveyed it with her other lands to the holy see, we do not find that the popes ever exercised, or indeed claimed any jurisdiction over it.

Mantua.

In 1220 Sordello, viscount or lord of Goito, which still retains its name, had the government of that city and territory; and it was, in all probability, confirmed to him by the emperor Frederick II. when he came that year to Italy, and was recognized as sovereign by its several states. We know very little of Mantua for some years after this, only we are told by Ricobaldus Ferrariensis, that in 1273, there was a great disturbance at Mantua; and the party that favoured the marquis was driven out of the city. Upon their expulsion, the inhabitants chose two magistrates, or podestats, with equal power to manage their government. One was Pinamonte Bonacursi, and the other Ottonello Renachalli. This new form of government took place in the second year of the emperor Rodolph I. who, having no desire to visit Italy in person, left the Mantuans, as well as other states there, in possession of their form of government, upon their paying him a sum of money. It even seems probable, that he increased their privileges. Soon after this Pinamonte found means to put his colleague to death; and he governed by himself for eighteen years with great cruelty. He died in 1212, and was succeeded by his son Bardellone (A), who, treading in the footsteps of his father's tyranny, was expelled in less than a year. The Chronicle of Parma, however, informs us, that Bardellone, in his father's life-time, drove out his brother Carpio, and imprisoned, or put to death, most of his party; but the account of Ferretus of Vicenza seems the most probable. He says, that Bardellone governed tolerably well after his brother's expulsion; but that his nephew Bottexella arose against him, and engaged Albert Scalliger of Verona to assist him. Upon his return from Verona to Mantua, he dissembled so well, that his uncle had no suspicion of his design, and brought a great number of the Mantuans to his party, who admitted the Veronese into the city, so that it was with difficulty that Bardellone escaped with safety; and he repaired, in his turn, for assistance to Azo of Ferrara, and from thence to Venice, every where soliciting aid, but meeting with nothing but contempt and hatred; till at last he died at Padua. After his death, Bottexella met with little trouble in seizing the government, which he held till the time of his death, in 1308. He was succeeded by his brother Passerino, of whose actions the Italian historians are full, but each different from another. This Passerino was an artful, turbulent, and ambitious man, and filled all about him with wars and confusion. He was more than once expelled from Mantua; but still found means to return by the emperor's favour, which he won by gold and great promises. At last he surprized the city of Modena, which was possessed by Francis Pico of Mirandola, who, with two of his sons, was killed in the attack. He then made himself master of Mirandola likewise; but drew upon himself the resentment of the emperor's general Lewis Gonzaga, who extirpated his family, and took Mantua, under the protection of Lewis of Bavaria, for whom he ruled it as imperial vicar about the year 1328.

THIS Lewis Gonzaga was originally a German; and, as other Germans had done, his father obtained preferment from the emperor in Italy, and settled in Mantua, where his son made a great figure. His family being noble, and himself very rich, he married a Mantuan lady of most exquisite beauty. Passerino, who was at once lustful, ambitious, and cruel, fell in love with her; and finding all his advances ineffectual, he threatened to employ force. The lady informed her husband of this; and before Passerino could complete his execrable design, Gonzaga killed him by a single blow of his fist, which struck him on the temples. Passerino was so much detested, that his body was embalmed; and being a squat little man, it was exposed as an object of public ridicule and detestation, in Gonzaga's gallery, where it long remained. Gonzaga, soon after, imprisoned all Passerino's descendants and relations; and gave up his brother Butironi to Nicholas Pico, the son of that Francis Pico whom Passerino had treacherously killed in taking Modena; and he was by him put to death. As the emperor Lewis of Bavaria was, at that time, in Italy, it is more than probable that Gonzaga had the imperial authority for what he did, and that he gave Gonzaga the investiture of Mantua. Pope John XXII. however, being then at a Acignon, refused to acknowledge the legality of that investiture, and excommunicated both the emperor and Gonzaga. His anathemas were disregarded by the latter, who lived to the age of eighty-three, and died in the year 1360. He had four sons; Guy, who succeeded him in his dignity of captain, or marquis (for those titles are not well ascertained) of Mantua. His second son was Philippin, or Philip, one of the greatest generals of his age, and whom we have often mentioned. His third son was Feltrin, who was the founder of the house of Novellara. His fourth son was Conrade, who had a numerous posterity.

GUY GONZAGA succeeded his father in his government of Mantua, and the imperial vicariate. He was a religious and moderate prince, and extremely punctual in fulfilling all his engagements. His chief failing was a too great indulgence for his three sons, Ugolin, Francis, and Lewis. The first being his favourite, and by him employed and trusted with the management of all his affairs, the two younger brothers formed a conspiracy against him, and without any regard to the paternal authority, assassinated him. It does not appear that either of them were punished; for Francis died in the life-time of his father, who administered the government nine years; and upon his death it devolved upon Lewis II. He governed twelve years, but with a very indifferent character.

His son Francis I. succeeded him in 1382, when he was no more than thirteen years of age, and grew to be a great prince. He defended Mantua against all the intrigues and power of John Galeazzo, first duke of Milan. According to Leander Alberti, he had many private, as well as public, virtues. He knew how to preserve his authority to the utmost. He understood history; was a lover of learning, and learned men; winning and witty in conversation; but liberal and splendid in his court. He died in 1407, and was succeeded by his son John Francis. This prince equalled, if not excelled, all the virtues of his father. He was but twelve years of age when he came to the government; but he acquired such a character for wisdom, that he was distinguished by the title of Arbiter of Italy. To repeat all the noble actions of his life, would be to repeat great part of this history, particularly in his conduct when he was general of the ecclesiastical and Venetian troops against the duke of Milan. In the year 1433, the emperor Sigismund, being at Mantua, on his road to Rome, in gratitude for the services performed to him, created John Francis marquis of Mantua, and honoured him with a very noble coat of arms, which was ever after worn by the family till it was extinct. The ceremony of his creation was extremely magnificent. It was performed upon a sumptuous theatre, erected in the Grand Square of Mantua, where the emperor Sigismund crowned him with his own hand.

THIS first marquis was a very powerful prince; and having several children, he gave them all great fortunes. He bestowed upon his eldest son Lewis the city of Mantua, and a large estate belonging to it. He gave to his second son Charles, Reggiolo, Gonzaga, Luzzara, Isola, Rivarolo, Bozzolo, S Martino, Sabionetta, Gazzolo, Viadana, and Suzzara, together with a noble palace in Mantua. He left to his third son Alexander another palace in the same city, with Caneto, Redondesco, Castel Giuffé Medola, Castello della Stivere, and Ustiniano. To his youngest son John Lewis, though dedicated to an ecclesiastical life, he bequeathed Rovigo, Volta Capriana, Ceresara, Pinboca, and Castellaro. It is remarkable, that all those places were either cities or large towns, and that they lie in the most fertile parts of Italy. The marquis, towards the latter end of his life, inclined so much to religion, that he endeavoured all he could to withdraw himself from the world, and died in 1444.

His eldest son, Lewis III. succeeded him in the marquisate. He began his government by quarrelling with his brothers about the estates left them by their father; and he forced Charles to recognize him as his superior, and lord paramount of all the lands he held. Having great experience in war, the Florentines, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, gave him successively the command of their armies; and he was so excellent and so successful a politician, that, like his predecessor John Francis, he was called the Arbiter of Italy. After the Turks had rendered themselves masters of Constantinople, pope Pius II. indicted a council at Mantua, to consult on the means of retaking that city, or to check their progress; and he was entertained by Lewis with the utmost splendor. Lewis behaved in like manner to the emperor Frederick III. Christiern I. king of Denmark, and several other princes who visited him at Mantua. He embellished that city with many sumptuous buildings; and by introducing a cut from the Mincio, he fertilized great part of his dominions. The church of St. Andrew, which is the cathedral of Mantua, owes its foundation to him; and he died at Goito, in 1478. He married Barbe, or Barbara of Brandenburgh, the daughter of the margrave John, surnamed the Chemist; and by her had five sons and two daughters. The sons were, first, Frederick I. who succeeded him; second, Francis Gonzaga, who was made a cardinal in 1464, and died in 1483; third, Lewis.

Lewis Gonzaga, who was bishop of Mantua in 1483, and died in 1511; fourth, Barbara, married to Everard I. duke of Wirtemberg; fifth, Dorothy, married to Galeazzo Maria duke of Milan; sixth, John Francis Gonzaga, the founder of the house of Sabionetta and Bezzolo, which was extinct in the year 1703, in the person of John Francis; seventh, Rodolph Gonzaga, from whom are descended the princes of Castiglione, which house still remains.

Frederic I.

FREDERIC I. of Mantua has the glory of not shining in history as a warrior; but he was a wise, generous, elegant prince, and brought the sciences to great perfection in his dominions. The arts of poetry, painting, and sculpture owed more to his patronage than to that of any prince of his time; but the love of his people was his chief passion. He had a maxim, that no subject ought to be idle, and therefore he assisted with money, in their respective employments and callings, all the poor of his dominions who were unable to assist themselves. Like some of his predecessors, he was endued with that hereditary policy which put into his hands the balance of power in Italy; and the tranquility it enjoyed during his government, was in a great measure owing to him. He married Margaret, daughter to Albert III. duke of Bavaria. By her he had three sons, besides daughters, who were all of them married into great families. The sons were, Francis II. who succeeded him; Sigismund, cardinal and bishop of Mantua, who died in 1525; and John Gonzaga, who left behind him a numerous posterity. This Frederic I. died in 1484.

Francis II.

To write the particular history of Francis II. of Mantua, would be only a repetition of what is to be found in the preceding parts of this work. He was one of the most illustrious generals of his age; but there is somewhat very particular in the manner of his accession to the government; for though it was generally thought to be hereditary, yet he was formally created marquis by a ceremonious act. A theatre being erected in the great square of the city before the castle, he received the investiture of his government from one of his public officers, who put into his hand a scepter or rod. This particular proves, that the subjects of the Italian states still retained ideas of the municipal rights, which they enjoyed under the sanction of the empire; and that they considered their sovereigns only as trustees for defending the community and its liberties. When very young, he commanded the Venetian and the confederate troops against those of France, under Charles the French king, at the famous battle of Taro, where his personal valour, and good conduct, baffled the attempts of Charles to pass that river. He afterwards went into the service of Lewis II. of France; and he commanded against Gonsalvo, commonly called the Great Captain. But, the French suspecting him as being too good an Italian to act in earnest on their side, he saw such visible marks of their distrust, as made it necessary for him to pretend sickness, by which he got quit of their service; but was followed by all the Italian cavalry, which occasioned the total loss of Naples to the French. He afterwards commanded the troops of the emperor Maximilian; those of Lewis the Moor, duke of Milan; and those of pope Julius II. He had the misfortune to be taken prisoner in a battle by the Venetians, who thought themselves victorious in having him their captive. He was delivered by the treaty that succeeded; and the pope had so high an esteem of his abilities, that he made him grand gonfalonier of the church; and the Venetians again placed him at the head of their armies. The great actions he performed for all the princes and states he served, make a considerable figure in the preceding part of this history. He is particularly noted for his affability, and humane treatment of his soldiers. According to some modern authors, he was the first of the Italian princes who wore a beard; but that must be a mistake, as appears from what we have said of the dukes of Milan; though perhaps it may be true, that he was one of those great men who have thought that the largeness of a beard drew respect upon a person. His death happened in 1519. His wife was Isabella, daughter of Hercules I. duke of Ferrara and Modena; and by her he had three sons and three daughters. The former were, first, his successor Frederic II. second, Hercules, who was made a cardinal in 1527; third, Ferdinand, who was duke of Malfi, and the founder of the house of Guastalla, which failed in the year 1746; but by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748, it was, by the empress queen, given up to the infant Don Philip of Spain.

Frederic II.

FREDERIC II. of Mantua, was but nineteen years of age when he succeeded his father, and was inaugurated in the same manner as he was; but with greater pomp; for at the ceremony, he created several knights, and made a procession at the head of his court, from the cathedral through his capital, to be recognized by his people. Young as he was, he shewed an extraordinary impatience to imitate the military virtues of his father. He commanded the troops of Leo X. and entered into the confederacy for delivering pope Clement VII. from his imprisonment in the castle of St. Angelo, in 1526. He afterwards made up matters with the emperor Charles V. and that monarch having received the imperial crown at Bologna, from the same pope, paid Frederic a visit in his return to Germany, at Mantua, where he was entertained with extraordinary magnificence, and received from the emperor the ducal crown, by which he was created the first duke of Mantua.

FRE-

FREDERIC II. married Margaret, daughter to William VIII. marquis of Montferrat, Frederic II. who died in the year 1518, leaving a son, Boniface, who died in 1530, without issue; but left his estate to his uncle John George. He, though an ecclesiastic, quitted that profession; but though espoused to Julia, daughter to Frederic king of Naples, he in died three years without issue. Upon this the house of Savoy claimed the succession; but the emperor marched his troops into Montferrat, and gave the investiture of it to Frederic duke of Mantua, who after performing many glorious actions, both in war and peace, died in 1540, leaving three sons; first, Francis III. second, William; third, Lewis Gonzaga, duke of Nevers, in France. The fourth son Frederic, was posthumous, and was afterwards bishop of Mantua, and a cardinal.

b FRANCIS III. though but six years of age at the time of his father's death, was inaugu- Francis III. rated in the same manner as his predecessors had been. His tutor was his uncle Hercules the cardinal, who was a man of great probity and prudence, and managed all the affairs of his nephew, without the intervention of his mother. Francis married Catherine of Austria, daughter to the emperor Ferdinand I. but had no issue by her, and died in 1550. He was succeeded by his brother William. This prince, being but fifteen years of age, at the time of his brother's death, the government of Mantua continued in the hands of the car- William; dinal. The most remarkable affair that happened to this prince, was a family dispute which he was obliged to maintain, and which makes it necessary for us to speak of the third brother.

c He had entered very young into the service of France, where he became so agreeable to the French king, that he was made governor of Champagne. He then courted the princess Henrietta of Clèves, though she was homely in her person, and had three brothers, and two sisters, all of them elder than her, alive. The match between a prince who had his fortune to make, and such a princess, was not very promising; but he courted her without having a rival for several years, without being able to gain her. At last, her three brothers and her two sisters died, and leaving her heiress to an immense fortune, she was courted by numbers of the first rank and quality in Europe. To prevent any bad consequences from their rivalry, Charles IX. of France, who was her sovereign, took her under his protection, and gave her leave to take any of her suitors for a husband that she pleased; and her choice generously fell upon her constant admirer Lewis Gonzaga, whom she married in 1562; and by that match he became duke of Nevers and Retheleis, and consequently one of the most considerable noblemen in France. This duke, two years after his marriage, went into Italy, to raise troops for his master Charles, and claimed from his brother the share of his father's and mother's succession, which had been usually given to the younger brothers of the family, and particularly some estates belonging to Montferrat.

Duke William, who was naturally very suspicious, thought that his brother's raising men for the French king, was only a pretext; that his true design was to support, by force, the people of Casal, the capital of Montferrat, who had rebelled, and to seize the places he had demanded in Montferrat. The duke of Nevers justified himself; but it was with some difficulty he succeeded, and the dispute had very disagreeable consequences in the family. In favour of this duke William, the emperor Maximilian II. in 1572, erected Montferrat into a duchy. We have little or nothing more to add, than that in 1574, Henry III. of France paid him a visit, in his journey from Poland, to take upon him the French crown. Duke William was married to the princess Eleanor of Austria, youngest daughter to the emperor Ferdinand I. and by her had a son, Vincent, and two daughters; of whom Margaret, the eldest, married Alphonso II. duke of Ferrara; and Catherine was the wife of Frederic of Austria, her uncle.

VINCENT I. was a pacific prince, and so very religious, that he instituted the order of the Precious Blood, the *Mantuan*s being fully persuaded that they are in possession of the sponge which was wet with the blood of our Saviour, and which Longinus, the soldier who pierced his side, but was afterwards a great saint, carried to Mantua, where he preached the Christian religion. This story, and many such absurdities, are received as certain truths, not only at Mantua, but all over Italy; so that pope Leo III. came in person to Mantua to adore the holy relic; and it continues to this day in high veneration, and gave occasion to the institution we have spoken of, which took its rise in 1608. Vincent was more deservedly famous for the vast encouragement and patronage he extended to learned men, and persons of genius in the fine arts; all of whom, especially those who celebrated him in their works, he encouraged to profusion. He died in 1612. He married first, Margaret, daughter to Alexander duke of Parma; and secondly, Eleanor, daughter to Francis duke of Tuscany; and by her he had three sons; first, Francis IV. second, Ferdinand; and third, Vincent II. who were successively dukes of Mantua; and two daughters, of whom the first was married to Henry duke of Lorraine; and the other, Eleanor, was the second wife to the emperor Ferdinand II.

Francis IV. FRANCIS IV. died in the first year of his government. He married Margaret of Savoy, daughter to Charles Emanuel, and Catharine Michel of Austria, by whom he left only a daughter. This circumstance created some difficulty. The young lady's uncle, cardinal Ferdinand, upon this, claimed to be duke of Mantua, but was opposed by her grandfather, the duke of Savoy; so that a quarrel ensued, in which not only the Italian states, but Austria, Spain, and France, were engaged; but after a variety of negotiations and expedients, the affair was rather hushed up than adjusted. Ferdinand having thrown up his cardinal's hat, kept possession of the duchy of Mantua, and died in 1626, without leaving any issue by his wife Catharine de Medici.

Vincent II. He was succeeded by his brother Vincent II. who was likewise a cardinal, but resigned his hat, and married Isabella Gonzaga, daughter to Ferdinand, duke of Bozzolo. As it was likely that his government might be disputed by his niece Mary, he applied to the pope to be divorced from Isabella de Bozzolo, on account of her youth, and to be enabled to marry his niece. But while he was in the prosecution of this affair, in which he was disappointed, and for which he was but ill qualified by his health and habit of body, he died without any issue in 1628, and by his death the male line of the eldest branch of the Gonzaga family, became extinct; an event which created great troubles in Italy.

Dispute about the succession. THE princess Mary, daughter to Francis IV. now revived her pretensions, she being the undoubted female heir of that line. The duke of Nevers, in France, claimed to be the next male successor. His name was Charles, and he had succeeded his father Lewis, and both of them were great favourites at the French court; but he set up another title besides that of his paternal descent. The French king, who thought himself interested in the succession of Mantua, constantly kept a resident at that court, who gained so far upon Vincent II. that he dropped his design of marrying his niece, and procured his consent that she should be married to the eldest son of the duke of Nevers. The marriage was accordingly performed by proxy, the very day before the death of duke Vincent II. At this time the duke of Nevers was the French ambassador at Rome; and hearing of Vincent's death, he came to Mantua, and took possession of that duchy, as well as that of Montferrat, by a double title, his own right, and that of his daughter-in-law. The reader, in the course of this history, may all along perceive, that the emperors of Germany had considered Mantua, and the other Italian duchies and states, as being fiefs of the empire, and that they had a right to dispose of their succession, especially if there was any doubt as to the claims of the competitors. Besides the duke of Nevers, the duke of Guastalla, and other princes of the Gonzaga family, had all set up pretensions; and therefore the emperor insisted that the duchies should be put under sequestration, till the several claims were adjusted. At the same time he intimated to the duke of Nevers, that he was disposed to give his claim the preference.

Charles the first duke of Nevers succeeds.

Supported by the French.

LEWIS XIII. was then king of France; and being fond of every opportunity to humble the emperor, he prevailed with the duke not to submit to the sequestration, but to do himself justice by arms. The duke following that advice, the emperor considered it as such an infringement of his authority, that he put the duke to the ban of the empire, and made the governor of Milan the executor of the ban; and he accordingly laid siege to Casal, for refusing to submit to the sequestration. Lewis, at that time, had got rid of his civil wars with the Protestants, and was at leisure to employ his troops in Italy. He accordingly passed the mountains, and raised the siege of Casal; but soon after returned to France. Upon his return, the imperial troops under general Collalto, poured into Italy, and the war became very furious. Spain joined with the emperor, and the Venetians with the duke, who was so infatuated, as to give no ear to his best friends, when they represented that France had nothing but her own ends in view, and that though he should even force the emperor to grant him the investiture, yet he must receive it with the ruin and depopulation of his estates, after a bloody war; not to mention, that his subjects were extremely averse to live under any prince who had not the imperial sanction. By this time Spain had declared herself in favour of the emperor; but neither the French nor the Venetians thought proper to declare against her, because of her connexions with the duke of Savoy, who was a capital party in the dispute, and whose situation enabled him to check the march of the French armies. Cardinal Richlieu was then the first minister of France, and in his high impetuous manner he put himself at the head of her troops, and marched into Savoy. There he endeavoured to over-reach that duke, sometimes by treachery, sometimes by negotiating, and was so near succeeding, that it was with difficulty that he escaped to Turin; but Pignerole fell into Richlieu's hands, and that conquest laid the first foundations of the French power on the side of Italy. The war still went on between the emperor and the Venetians, with various success, but with so many mortifying events to the duke of Nevers, that he began to think of accommodating matters with the emperor, but was diverted from it by the marshal d'Etrée, the French ambassador and general in the Mantuan; and by the Venetians, who promised

A. D. 1630.

- a promised to support him with all their power. The plague, at that time, raged in the Mantuan, and made such havock in that capital, that it was in great danger of being taken by the imperialists, who had besieged it. The Venetians endeavoured to succour the place, and a large body of troops were put in motion for that purpose. Collalto, the imperial general, hearing of their approach, and having a correspondence with some of the besieged officers, surprized and scaled the walls; and thus the imperialists became masters of the place, where they committed the most cruel ravages. The duke, and the marshal d'Étrec, were then in the city, and had just time to retire to one of the castles, which they no sooner entered, than its fortifications were blown up; so that they were obliged to surrender themselves prisoners to the imperial general, who sent the marquis and his family to Melara, a place in the Mantuan, where the Venetians furnished them with the means of subsistence.

Peace of Quevasque.

- In the mean while, the French troops were masters of Casal, and the emperor was so intent upon their quitting Italy, that at the diet of Ratisbon, he offered the duke the investiture of Mantua. The cardinal being, at that time, afraid of his master's death, at last lent an ear to the accommodation; but Lewis recovering from his dangerous illness, the war was continued, especially in Monferrat, where he endeavoured to establish a footing for the French. The scene of war being transferred to Germany, the treaty of Quevasque, which was concluded in 1631, gave peace to Mantua, and the emperor bestowed the formal investiture of it upon duke Charles, who held it peaceably till the time of his death, which happened in 1637; but he had the mortification of seeing great part of Monferrat torn from his family by the treaty of Quevasque, and settled on the house of Savoy, to satisfy that duke's pretensions upon the Mantuan.

- c CHARLES, eldest son to Charles I. who had married Mary, only daughter of duke Francis II. died in 1631, and left a son of his own name with two princesses; the eldest of whom, who is renowned for virtue and beauty, was the third wife of the emperor Ferdinand III. Charles III. for so he is called, his father being considered as duke of Mantua, on account of his marriage, was educated under his father till he was eight years of age. He was deformed in his person, but his mind was active, and his spirit penetrating. He married in 1649, Isabella Clara of Austria, daughter to the archduke Leopold of Innsbruck, which was one of the most unfortunate steps of his life; for their persons being disagreeable to one another, the duke fell into many amorous irregularities, which he pursued at Venice. Being, at the time of his grandfather's death, destitute of any uncle, or near relation, his education, which was left to the emperor Ferdinand III. was entirely neglected. Mantua, however, continued in peace, by the friendship and alliance of the emperor; so that Charles had no business to divert him from the pursuit of pleasure, which he indulged to the full, and even ordered it to be insinuated to his duchess, that she might do the same. His adventures at Venice were such, as cannot decently be recorded by history, but his excellent sister the empress, employed all her credit with her husband, in favour of the house of Gonzaga. Charles III. died in 1665.

Charles II. and III.

- e His son and successor Charles IV. was but seven years of age when his father died, and his mother, who had the care of his education, being a German, was hated and calumniated by the Mantuans, which made her life very uneasy. The emperor Leopold took the same concern in the affairs of Mantua, that his father had done; and hearing certain reports to the disadvantage of the duchess dowager, he sent count Windigratz to Mantua, with a private commission narrowly to inspect her conduct, and the affairs of the duchy. The count, though he pretended to have no business but to pay the emperor's compliments to the duchess, and the young duke, who, about the time we speak of, was about thirteen or fourteen years of age, suspected the real motive of the visit, and did all he could to come at the truth; but the envoy still kept to general terms, and eluded all their inquiries. At last, the young duke flatly demanded to know his real business; and the count no longer finding means to evade an answer, informed him, by way of secret, that there was a person about the court of Mantua whom the emperor disliked, and whom he had orders to secure. The duke imparting this answer to his mother, she immediately retired to a religious house, and a count, who was supposed to be her gallant, took the habit of St. Dominic. The emperor getting intelligence of this, appointed a council to manage the affairs of the duchy till the duke was of age.

Charles IV.

- f In the year 1670, the empress Eleonora, his aunt, brought about a marriage between him and the princess Isabella of Guaftalla. This match was highly advantageous to the duke, as by the preference which the emperor gave him, he was put in possession of the valuable duchy of Guaftalla, though many of the male line of that family claimed it. This present, however, was understood by both parties to be the price of the duke's intire attachment to the imperial interest; and an express condition was inserted in the articles of marriage, that Guaftalla, the capital of that duchy, should remain in the condition it then was, that is, without fortifications. The duke forgot all obligations of that kind, and precipitately entered into all the measures of France.

THIS duke Charles IV. was, if possible, more neglected in his education than his father had been, and was without his wit and penetration. Though his wife, the princess of Guaftalla, was a most amiable lady, he conceived an aversion to her person soon after their marriage, and refrained from her bed. As he had never been contradicted in any thing by his mother, he neglected business so much, that one day when he had occasion to sign his name, neither pen nor ink was to be found in all his palace; and he gave one of his courtiers a hundred pistoles a year to attend him on all occasions with those implements. The court of France, knowing the invincible propensity he had to pleasure, encouraged him in all his excesses, and in his aversion to his duchess; and at length he was despised even by the Venetians, and all the friends of the house of Austria, who before had treated him with the highest respect and esteem. When the French had got some ascendancy over him, cardinal Mazarine proposed, under pretence that his most Christian majesty was his proper guardian against the power and ambition of the house of Austria, that he should receive a French garrison into Casal; but the duke having then large appointments from the court of Vienna, the negociation miscarried. His extravagances, however, soon bringing him into necessities, the French king resumed his hopes of succeeding with regard to Casal. For that purpose he sent the abbot Morel to Mantua. His instructions were to offer to the duke an equivalent for Casal, either in ready money, or in estates in France; but, at the same time, to enforce the great advantage it would be for the duke of Mantua, to be free from the expence of maintaining the numerous garrison which that place required. The duke was reduced to a proper pitch of poverty, not to resent this proposal. He seemed, however, at first to be so averse to it, that the abbot retired from Mantua with some apparent disgust. The duke was far from being in earnest in his refusal; but, in fact, his situation was such, with the house of Austria, amongst the neighbouring powers, that he durst not at first comply. He at last sent the marquis de Guerrier, as his ambassador to Paris, to testify to his most Christian majesty, the extreme desire he had to remain in his good graces, and his willingness to do every thing in his power to oblige him. Lewis understood this compliment as a proof of the duke's being willing to part with Casal, and sent the abbot Morel back to Mantua. The abbot, in his first audience with the duke, put him in mind of what his ambassador had declared to Lewis. According to some writers, the duke was so incautious, that he immediately signed his name on a blank sheet of paper, which he delivered to the abbot, and the latter filled up the blank, with an express order for the governor of Casal to yield up the place to the French troops. The duke, in excuse, pretended that the commission he had charged Guerrier with, was no more than a general compliment, and that the carte blanche signified no more, than his readiness to gratify his most Christian majesty, in whatever was consistent with his interest and honour. Be this as it will, if the fact of the carte blanche is true, it is more than probable that the French made the duke a present of a considerable sum of money; for Casal was actually given up to them.

THE emperor highly resented this cession, as belonging to an imperial fief; and the Venetians reproaching the duke for having sold it to the French, he went to Venice, and there solemnly swore upon the host, that he never had touched a farthing of French money on that account. This asseveration, however, did not satisfy either the Venetians or the imperial court; and the duke found himself obliged to put Guerrier under an arrest, when he returned to Mantua; but no consequences happening from his imprisonment, the Venetians broke with the duke, and, without declaring war, cut off all communication between him and the senate and nobility. They were even so exasperated with him, that they hanged a painter who was one of his dependents, and afterwards broke open and read the letters which the duke, some time before, had sent in his favour. This is what the French had foreseen, and wished for; and the duke, in order to repair his decayed interest in Italy, took the resolution, some say by the advice of the French themselves, to fortify Guaftalla, tho' in a direct violation of his marriage contract. Having no money of his own, for his excesses always kept him poor, he was obliged to borrow for that purpose forty thousand louis d'ors from the French king, who lent it him, because he thought that his necessities would oblige him to part with Guaftalla, in the same manner as he had done with Casal. Lewis even sent him architects and engineers to expedite the fortifications.

THE emperor thought himself very ill treated in all this; and, by his ministers, represented to the duke, in the warmest terms, that by his connexions with France, he was not only forfeiting the conditions of his investiture, but laying a foundation for the French becoming masters of all Italy. The king of Spain seconded the remonstrances of the emperor; but the French had infatuated the duke to such a degree, that the operations still went on, and their engineers and workmen were daily repairing to the Mantuan, in pilgrim, or other disguises. Upon this, the king of Spain ordered count Fuenfalida, then governor of the Milanese, to advance with a body of troops to Casal Maggiore, where he embarked them and a his artillery, and proceeded till he came opposite to Guastalla. He then sent the count de Louvigny to reason with the duke of Mantua, who had at first appeared resolute; but perceiving that count Fuensalida was making dispositions to land his men, he was persuaded not only to suffer the works to be demolished, but to order his subjects to join in the demolition. This was a labour of several months; the fortifications being built in the form of a pentagon, and, if completed, it would have been one of the strongest places in Europe.

THE duke, notwithstanding the coldness of the Venetians towards him, resided mostly in that city, where he could indulge his pleasures with greater freedom than he could do in the Mantuan. His excesses, however, sometimes brought him into inconveniences, and, on account of a love affair, he sent a challenge to the elector of Bavaria, who happened b to be there at the same time, but declined to fight the duke, but at the head of an army. Soon after the duke took a resolution to serv a campaign against the Turks, who were then threatening to besiege Vienna; and having raised a troop of three hundred men, he set out for Hungary, attended by a number of his own and other Italiannobility. It does not appear, that in this expedition he was wanting either in courage or conduct. His little troop made a noble appearance; and notwithstanding all he had done to provoke the emperor, he presented himself before him at Vienna; and Leopold, far from reproaching or confining him, as he had a right to do, extolled his generous resolution, and thanked him for his assistance; while the duke, in return, promised to abandon his connections with the French. He then became a public favourite with Leopold, and his general the c duke of Lorrain, under whom he served at the second siege of Buda; and when that was over he returned to Italy. The war between the French and the emperor soon breaking out there, in 1695, Casal was besieged and taken by the duke of Savoy. The duke of Mantua was now so great a favourite with the emperor, that the latter not chusing to suffer Casal to remain in the duke of Savoy's hands, he gave it back to its former master, after the fortifications had been demolished, according to the capitulation. It was even thought, if the duke of Mantua had not relapsed into his connections with France, that he would have been made generalissimo of the imperial and Spanish armies. It is certain that the success of the war, in a great measure depended upon the part he should take. The imperialists made him very great offers, if he would give them up Mantua for a place of arms, and the pope, b the Venetians, and Swiss, offered to place a garrison in it at their own expence.

Makes a campaign against the Turks.

SUCH was the state of the duke's affairs, when the Spanish succession threw all Europe again into a combustion. But the duke had secretly determined himself in favour of France. He took care, however, as usual, to have some pretext for his conduct, and to clear himself from the imputation of rebellion, and ingratitude towards the emperor. He had hitherto refused to admit into his dominions either French or neutral troops; but prince Vaudemont having delivered up the Milanese to the French, and made himself master of Mirandola, in the beginning of April 1701, sent a letter by a trumpeter, desiring the duke to give up his capital to his troops, and threatening, in case of non-compliance, to reduce it to ashes in a few hours. It was generally believed that this was a preconcert between the duke and the e French court; for a body of fifteen thousand men appeared in the neighbourhood of Mantua. Upon this, the duke assembled his council, where it was resolved to comply with the summons; and the gates of the city being opened, Tesse, the French general, took possession of it with three thousand French and two thousand Spaniards. This event alarmed all Europe, and it was publicly given out, that the duke had received fifty thousand louis d'ors for the surrender, and his minister ten thousand for making the bargain. The duke had a residence at Rome, the marquis of Berretta, who had, some time before, applied to his holiness for a body of his troops to garrison Mantua; but the pope being slow in sending them, the French got the start of them. The marquis presented a letter to the pope, excusing himself for what had happened, and laying it upon his own inability to prevent it. f To this letter the pope returned no answer; but the marquis, soon after, appearing at the imperial resident's house, the latter threatened to throw him out of his window.

Again joins the French.

AT Vienna, that court was so thoroughly convinced of a collusion between the duke and the French, that in July after the surrender of Mantua, the baron de Seyler, the emperor's minister at Ratisbon, gave notice to the diet, that the duke of Mantua, and the counts of Berera and Fiani, his ministers, had been cited by the council of the empire to appear, and shew cause, why they surrendered to the French the city of Mantua; and to hear pronounced against them the sentence of confiscation of their estates and goods, for encouraging and promoting the cruel war which is like to be kindled in Italy. He also imparted to the diet, another ordinance of the same council, by which all the officers and vassals of the g duke of Mantua, are discharged from their obedience which they owe him: together with certain circulatory letters, by which all the princes of Italy, feudaries of the empire, with their vassals, are exhorted to continue faithful to the empire.

marriage,*

and death.

THE duke, thus finding himself ruined at the imperial court, shut himself up in Mantua,^a and entered intirely into the French schemes both of pleasure and business. His duchess, Isabella of Guastalla, dying, the French persuaded him to make a journey into France, where he was received by Lewis with vast careffes; and the better to fix him in his interest, he gave him in marriage the princess d'Elbeuf, with the title of general of the French armies in Italy. This dignity gratified the duke's passion for shew; and when he returned, he took possession of his new post in the duke of Vendosme's army, to the great ridicule of the soldiers, and indeed of all Europe. But while he was thus exercising his generalship, the war in Italy took a new turn, and the French, in 1707, were driven out of Mantua itself, without being able to make any stipulation in favour of the duke, or his duchess. Upon this, he retired to the remainder of his estate in the Venetian territories, and died at Pavia on the 5th of July, 1708, a few days after he had been put to the ban of the empire.^b Dying without lawful issue, many claimants of the houses of Guastalla and Lorrain, applied for the investiture of Mantua; but the emperor refused it to them all, and kept possession of it himself, but gave the duchy of Montferrat to the duke of Savoy. It is not our design to discuss the pretensions of the several parties who claimed this succession; but it was generally thought that the house of Lorrain had the best right to it; and it has, ever since the death of the last duke, been annexed to the duchy of Milan.

END of the HISTORY of MANTUA.

HISTORY of the House of SAVOY.

Containing the history of Savoy, Piedmont, and the other estates of his Sardinian majesty.

S E C T I.

Containing a general description of the king of Sardinia's dominions; and the history of that house from the year 1000.

- a SAVOY, the Sabaudia of the ancients, borders upon France to the West; upon France and Piedmont to the South; upon Piedmont, the Milanese; and Switzerland to the East; and is bounded on the North by the lake of Geneva. According to its present dimensions, it is no more than eighty-eight English miles from West to East, and from South to North seventy-six. The face of the country is rugged, and wretched to the last degree, being mountainous, or rather rocky; between the hills, in a few contemptible vallies; the inhabitants, with the utmost efforts of industry and labour, pick up a miserable subsistence. There are, however, a few exceptions to this wretchedness. Grain grows in some of the vallies, and vines near the lake of Geneva, Montmelian, and St. Jean de Maurienne; and Ripalle presents romantic but beautiful prospects. Mount Cenis is famous for its height; and the difficulty of its passage, being the road between Savoy and Piedmont; but has of late years been rendered more practicable by incredible labour. The chief river of Savoy is the Rhone, which flows out of the lake of Geneva, and on that side separates it from France. Into it run the following rivers: the Arve, which rises in Faucigny, has a mixture of gold in its sand, and near Geneva empties itself into the Rhone: Les Suffes and Siers; the sources of which are in the Genevois, and fall into the Rhone not far from Seisel, the latter being increased by the Seran: the Iserree, which rises in the Tarentaise, at the foot of the mount Iseran; among others it receives the river Arc, the head of which is in Maurienne, and beyond Valence loses itself in the Rhone. The Arc, having a great many falls, is very rapid and full of foam. The chief lakes are those of Anicy in the Genevois, and Bourgec in Savoy^a; and both of them abound with excellent fish, particularly trouts. The inhabitants are generally so miserably poor, that one-third of the men seek their bread in foreign countries by the lowest occupations, such as puppet-show men, chimney-sweepers, and shoe-blackers. They who remain at home labour very hard for their living, particularly in carrying strangers and travellers over their mountains, which are often impassable for mules, though it is amazing with what art and security they walk. But neither this employment, nor the most laborious drudgeries, prevents many inhabitants from begging alms on the high roads, from every traveller who makes a tolerable appearance. Yet, after all, the miseries of the Savoyards are not so much owing to the barrenness of the soil, as to the tyranny of the landlords, who discourage all cultivation of the ground by their haughtiness and rigour. Many spots of Savoy are capable of producing corn; and the few that do produce it, are superior to those that do not, only in the cultivation.

Description of

and its inhabitants.

- The people, who are naturally submissive, chearful, and contented; are shut out by their situation from knowing any thing of the other parts of the world, and bear all their miseries with patience. A farmer, who has a yoke of oxen, two horses, four cows, and a few goats and sheep, is looked upon as being a wealthy man. Most of their bread is made of oats, but a few amongst the richest of them have wheat. The fare of the lower sort is extremely poor: their highest luxury consisting in milk and water for drink; and for food, in cheese, butter, wallnuts, and garden stuff, and even those in very scanty quantities. Flesh meat is seldom known, even amongst the more wealthy of them. The reigning king of Sardinia, and his father, have gone far towards abolishing many of the oppressive tenures and usages, under which the subjects groaned from their landlords. Nobility and genealogy, and armorial bearings, are in Savoy so many civil diseases; which are encouraged, because they bring in a considerable revenue to the crown; titles here being a mercantile commodity. The language of the Savoyards is French, but they retain amongst them, a great deal of the old German plainness and honesty. Their religion is popery, to which they are no great bigots. Hunting is one of the privileges of the noble Savoyards; and the lives of the poorer people might be much more comfortable, if they were indulged in the exercise either of that or of fishing, many of their woods and plains being stored with excellent game.
- e

CHAMBERRY, properly speaking, is the capital of Savoy, and is situated on the river Leise, in a fine valley; but nothing worth mentioning is to be seen there. It is, however, the place where the states or parliament of Savoy assemble, and some vestiges of the ancient feudal constitution are still discernable there. Montmelian is a very strong town of Savoy, and Ripaille is famous for its delightful retirements. The rest of its towns have nothing in them remarkable. We cannot close this general account of Savoy, without taking notice, that vast numbers of the inhabitants have large wens and excrescences upon their throats, which is thought to be owing to their drinking snow water.

Piedmont.

PIEDMONT, so called from its being situated at the foot of the mountains, is a part of the ancient Lombardy, and northward borders on Savoy and Italy; westward, on France; southward, on the Mediterranean and the republic of Genoa; and eastward, on the duchies of Montferrat and Milan. From south to north, it is about thirty German, or one hundred and fifty English miles, but much less from west to east. The soil of it is a great deal more fruitful, and less rugged than that of Savoy. Its hills produce great plenty of excellent wine, and Turin, its capital, is famous for fine fruits, and noble walks of chestnut and mulberry trees. Chestnuts and truffles of an excellent kind, are found here in great plenty. They have a particular kind of dogs, that by their scent find out the truffles; nor do they lose that quality when carried to other countries. It is said that the cattle of Piedmont brings into the country above one hundred and fifty thousand pounds a year; but the chief commodity of the inhabitants is silk, which is the best in Italy. The country, from Turin to Coni, is delightful; and Rochemelon is the highest of all the Italian Alps, it requiring a whole day to reach its summit, from whence there is a noble prospect all over the Milanese, Venice, and the neighbouring countries. The Po, into which several other rivers run, and the Var, are its chief rivers.

As to its inhabitants, they are lively, ingenious, and witty. The nobility live under the like constitutions, and much after the same manner as those of Savoy; and in Piedmont there are about fifty earldoms, fifteen marquises, a great number of lordships, and twenty abbeys. The language of the Piedmontese is a mixture of French and Italian; but they have the misfortune to be equally slaves to their kings, and to their religion, which is popery, and which cramps all the efforts of their natural genius. In this duchy, however, amidst the vallies of Lucerne, Peyrouse, and St. Martin, bordering on Dauphiné, live the celebrated Waldenses; which appellation is not derived from a person of the name of Waldus, but the place of their abode, namely, the vallies, the Italians calling them Waldesti; that is, the people of the vallies. Those people profess a kind of primitive Christianity, and have always opposed the superstitions of the church of Rome, which has often drawn upon them most inhuman persecutions. The king of Sardinia, by the situation of his dominions, has been justly termed the jailor of the Alps, as it is extremely difficult for the French, or any other people, to force their way into Italy without his consent. This renders his friendship of infinite consequence to all the powers of Europe, who are concerned in any quarrel relating to the Italian states. As he is an absolute sovereign within his own state in civil matters, and for the most part in ecclesiastic, his ordinary revenues amount to almost what he pleases; and though they cannot be calculated, must be very considerable, as he keeps a very splendid court, and an army of fifteen thousand men in time of peace, though he can bring into the field forty thousand men on occasion.

THE capital city of Piedmont is Turin, the ancient Augusta Taurinorum. It is one of the finest cities in Europe for its dimensions, being of a quadrangular form, and above four miles and a half in circumference. It is situated in a delightful country, on the confluence of the Po and the Doria; and nothing can be more pleasant than the hills that surround it, which are covered with villas, convents, and magnificent buildings. Its inhabitants at present are between fifty and sixty thousand, and it contains forty-eight churches and convents, and seventeen more may be seen from its ramparts. Its high, or principal street, is remarkable for its regularity, breadth, and the loftiness of its buildings, which are decorated with fine spacious piazzas, and balconies to every story, but disfigured by the use of paper lattices. The king's palace is built of free stone, and most splendidly adorned with pillars, statues, and a grand stair-case, where there is a brass figure of Victor Amadeus, the late king, on a horse of white marble. It must, however, be acknowledged that the old town of Turin (for hitherto we have only spoken of the new one) does not at a all answer to this magnificent description. The houses in both are built of brick, and many of the streets are narrow, crooked, and incommodious. To make amends for this, they are interspersed with grand palaces, and some of them contain beautiful squares.

BESIDES the king's palace, which can be matched by few in Europe, Turin contains a great number of fine public buildings both religious and civil. The opera-house, the record-office, the university, the royal printing-office, and the arsenal, are all of them master-pieces, in their several kinds. The king's cabinet of curiosities is allowed to be invaluable, and the university library, besides twenty-thousand printed volumes, is stocked with an immense collection of manuscripts. The hospitals for the sick, the poor, and the lunatics, are answerable to the other magnificent works of this city; and its fortifications render it extremely strong. A cut from the Doria, which is communicated by sluices to all the streets of Turin, every night, renders it sweet and wholesome. The inhabitants, in their manner and way of living, greatly resemble the French; but they are not without their religious weakneses, witness the holy handkerchief, which is most sacredly preserved in Turin, within a chapel of black marble of most curious architecture. Turin is the see of an archbishop; and it has an university, which was erected in the year 1405. The academies here, for riding, dancing; and warlike exercises, are reckoned to be the best of any in the world, and are greatly encouraged by that king, whose courtiers, in time of peace, are formed out of the officers of his army. The court itself is polite and agreeable, and is thought to be free from that insincerity which prevails in France, and the dissimulation that characterizes the other courts of Italy. There are, however, inconveniences that render Turin less agreeable to a stranger than it would otherwise be. The air is thick and moist, its water is bad, and the accommodations of inns are very paltry. Upon the whole, the city is grand and beautiful; curious pieces of antiquity are placed in many parts of its walls; and the present king has omitted nothing to complete the fortifications of the city, and to render it the strongest perhaps of any in Europe.

THE neighbourhood of Turin is full of magnificent palaces, many of which belong to the king. La Vigne de la Reine is famous for its delightful prospect. La Venerie has a fine garden, and near it the king's guards are quartered. Montcallier and Stupinice are two royal palaces, neither of them four miles from Turin, and each adorned with peculiar beauties of painting, gardening, and situation. Superga is a religious foundation, the origin of which is connected with our history. The high hill upon which it is built; was the place from whence the duke of Savoy, his present Sardinian majesty's father, together with prince Eugene, reconnoitred the French army, which besieged Turin in 1706; and had gone far towards lying it in ashes by red hot bullets; the French king having a particular resentment against his royal highness. The awful prospect of this scene of misery and distress, inspired his royal highness with such sentiments, that he made a vow to erect a charitable foundation, if he should succeed in delivering his crown and capital from their enemies, and which he accordingly performed^a. This building, which is six stories high, forms a parallelogram, one of the smaller sides of which is taken up by the pompous church, where, over the main entrance, is seen the following inscription; "Virgini generatrici Victor Amadeus, Sardiniae rex, bello Gallico vovit, pulsus hostibus, extruxit dedicavitque." "Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia, during his war with France, vowed this house; and having defeated his enemies, he has built and dedicated the same to the Virgin Mother." Under the church is built the new burial-place for the royal family. This foundation has a yearly appointment of eighteen thousand Piedmontese livres in specie, whereby twelve young ecclesiastics, of the better persons of quality, are maintained under the direction of a prior, and completely qualified for the highest ecclesiastical preferments. The prospect from this eminence is exceedingly delightful. The only water here for drinking is the rain, of which it is said, in case of necessity, to be provided with a sufficiency, at least for three years.

Description of its neighbourhood.

It would take up too much room here to describe the other enchanting palaces and spots with which Piedmont abounds. It may be called the country of fortifications, as its situation is equally fit for erecting forts; and inviting invasions. We shall, therefore, confine ourselves to a description of those cities and strong places, that have made the greatest figure in war for these three hundred years past; and tend to illustrate history by describing them.

CHIVAS, or Chivazzo, stands on the Po, about twelve miles northward of Turin. Chivas. It is a strong place, and was retaken by the duke of Savoy. Mondovi is a fine Mondovi. city, and a district. It is reckoned the second city in Piedmont, and a place of strength, and lies forty miles to the south of Turin. Coni lies about thirty, and, during the late wars of Savoy, it was reckoned to be impregnable, having baffled the French and Spaniards,

^a BUSCHING, vol. iii. p. 29.

- Pignerole. Spaniards who besieged it. Pignerole is famous, in the histories of France and Savoy, for being the object of perpetual wars. It is situated on the river Cbiese, and being very strong, underwent various fates; but at last it was returned to the possession of the house of Savoy, by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, but on condition that it should not be re-fortified by his Sardinian majesty. Fort Brunette. Fort Brunette lies on one of the entrances of Savoy from France. It consists of eight bastions, which, with their out-works, are all cut out of the rocks. Not a single building is to be seen amongst them; and the men are so covered, that not a soldier is to be perceived, excepting a few centinels on proper posts. The communication between the bastions and other works, are under the rocks, and of such a breadth, that large carriages, and heavy cannon, with several horses, can, with the greatest conveniency and safety, go from one place to the other. Those bastions are generally guarded by three thousand men; and the desperate attacks that have been at various times made upon them by the French, particularly during the last war, exceed all belief.
- Susa. SUSA lies in another pass between France and Piedmont, to which it is of the utmost importance. It stands on the river Doria, twenty miles northward of Turin. After being often in the possession of the French, and demolished by them, it returned to the house of Savoy by the treaty of Utrecht; but it is stronger by its garrison, than by its fortifications or situation. Here is to be seen a marble triumphal arch, erected by king Cottius, in honour of Augustus Cæsar. Fenestrelles. Fenestrelles and Exilles are likewise famous for their strength and situation, and for the noble defence they made against the French, when the latter invaded Italy in favour of the infants of Spain. Asti. Asti is the capital of a county. It lies twenty-five miles to the eastward of Turin, and is a bishop's see. It is large, strong, and populous, and few cities in Lombardy are said to exceed it in its palaces and public buildings. Great remains of antiquity, such as a triumphal arch, an amphitheatre, and the like, are still to be seen here, it being a favourite town with Augustus Cæsar, and other emperors. Saluzzo. Saluzzo is the capital of a marquissate of the same name, and stands on an eminence at the foot of the Alps. It has undergone various revolutions; but it is now remarkable for little more than the magnificence of its cathedral, and its being a bishop's seat. Chateau Dauphin. Chateau Dauphin is another fort, lying in the Piedmontese vallies.
- Valley of Lucerne. THE chief of these is commonly called the vale of Lucerne, which is fifteen miles in length, but of an unequal breadth. It contains twelve parishes: that of Roras, which is the smallest, is remarkably fruitful in wine, grain, and vegetables, the very dreadful hills, which every where surround it, being improved. The parish of Angrogne, in which lies the famous barricade, is perhaps one of the strongest spots in the world; for it lies amongst stupendous mountains, and the entrances into it require to be defended by a very few men, to render it inaccessible. It was here that the famous Waldenses, the pious confessors for true Christianity, we have already mentioned, held out against all their enemies, who were powerful, keen, and numerous; and here their pastors used to preach without obstruction before the reformation, and to fit young men for the purposes of the ministry. The reader is to observe, that it is with some difficulty we can account for the propriety of calling those spots vallies, as there is in some of them little or no level ground, though they are in general so excessively fruitful, that it has been commonly said, if Italy was a sheep, Piedmont might be considered as its kidney.
- Verue. VERUE, a fortress situated on a rock near the Po, and of prodigious strength. It has been known to hold out the siege of a French army for six months. Verceil. Verceil, so called from a barony of that name, has been often mentioned in the foregoing part of this history. It is situated near the frontiers of Milan, or rather of Montferrat, fifteen miles to the northward of Casal, and about forty north-east of Turin: it gives name to a bishopric, which is suffragan to the archbishopric of Milan: it is large and fortified, and generally follows the fortune of Turin the capital. Before we finish this description of the vallies of Piedmont, some of the chief places of which we have only taken notice of, it may be proper to say somewhat farther concerning their natural curiosities. Those vallies, particularly that of St. Martin, contain large woods and thickets that abound in white hares, white, and other coloured partridges, and large pheasants, not to mention great numbers of wolves and bears. The marmotte, which is so famous in England, resides on the highest parts of the mountains. It is of a reddish colour; it is larger than a rabbit; its flesh tastes like pork, and lives where there is very little herbage: but the most remarkable property of that animal is, that while the mountains are covered with snow, which is eight or nine months in the year, it is always asleep. The bouquetin, which resembles a goat, or chamois, has its haunts upon the mountains likewise; it generally sleeps on the ice; it is very fleet; its flesh is excellent, and when its blood is administered in warm wine, it is an excellent remedy for that numbness which is so common and fatal in that country. The tumar, or bif, is a creature engendered by a bull and a mare, or a bull and a she-ass: it lives upon very little; and its strength, swiftness, and utility, in travelling, is amazing.

a The mountains of Piedmont are likewise famous for excellent vegetables, some of which are medicinal.

THE county of Nice, though not properly belonging to Piedmont, yet borders on it, Nice, and belongs to the same matter. Nice, the chief town, stands in a fine plain, sixty miles to the southward of Pignerole, at the foot of the Alps. Its citadel is strong, and the city itself is said to be very fine. It passed in former times through many hands; but the king of Sardinia recovered it at the peace of Utrecht, and has since repaired its fortifications. It may be expected we should here touch upon Montferrat; but that duchy has been already spoken of; and the places in it, belonging to his Sardinian majesty, require no other particular description, than what has been already given. We shall therefore proceed to b Sardinia.

THIS island is of value to his Sardinian majesty, chiefly as it gives him a royal title. It stretches from north to south in the Mediterranean, and is about one hundred and sixty miles in length, and from west to east eighty. The air is so unwholesome, and the soil so poor, that the antient Romans punished their state, and other prisoners, by confining them to live on the island. The barrenness of the soil is, however, chiefly owing to the indolence of the inhabitants, but it has of late been greatly improved; so that from many places they export corn to Spain. Cagliari, or Calaris, the capital, situated on the declivity of a hill, is an university, and an archbishopric, and the residence of the viceroy. It has an excellent harbour, and is said to be large and populous, and to have a brisk trade; but it certainly is a place of no great strength. The rest of the places in this island have nothing remarkable in them. We shall, therefore, here close the description of his Sardinian majesty's dominions.

THE ducal and sovereign house of Savoy is generally thought to have the same original with the electoral house of Saxony, and that their common ancestor was Witichind, surnamed The Great Duke of Saxony, who was contemporary with Charlemagne; but we shall begin our history with Beroald, or Bertold.

WE have already, in the history of Geneva, mentioned the kingdom of the Bourgignons, or Burgundians, which was sometimes called the kingdom of Arles; but in fact they were distinct, though under the same sovereigns. The kingdom of Arles comprehended Provence, the Lionnois, and Dauphiny. The kingdom of Burgundy comprehended Savoy, Switzerland, and many countries in the neighbourhood. Bertold bought from Rodolf, one of the kings of the Burgundians, the counties of Savoy and Maurienne; and he had a son named Hubert with the white Hands. This prince, who died about the year 1050, performed so many important services to the emperor Conrade II. that he rewarded him by giving him in property St. Maurice, Valais, and the country of Chablais. Hubert's son, Amadeus, died without issue, and his brother Otho added to his paternal dominions the marquisates of Susa, Turin, Piedmont, and the valley of Aosta. He assumed the title of marquis of Italy, and died in 1060. His son Amadeus II. pretended to be independent of the imperial power, and lived during the troublesome times of the emperor Henry IV.

c That prince, in his famous expedition into Italy, to recover the rights of the empire, found all the passages for his march shut up by his enemies, but that by Savoy, through which he demanded to march; but Amadeus obliged him, in consideration of that privilege, to yield to him the possession of five bishoprics in the neighbourhood. The history of Henry has been recounted in the preceding parts of this work; and Amadeo took advantage, from his distresses, to increase his dominions, by the accession of a large portion of the kingdom of Arles, which he did not possess before, and which is thought to be the county of Baugy. In a few months after he died, and was succeeded by his son Hubert II. who took upon himself the title of count, or, as others say, prince of Piedmont. He added to his other dominions the Tarantaise, and died about the year 1103. His son and successor Amadeo III. was engaged in war with the count of Geneva, whom he is said to have slain with his own hand. He attended the emperor Henry V. in his two journeys to Rome, and served in two campaigns against the infidels in the Holy Land, and died about 1149 at Nicosia, a city of Cyprus. His son and successor Hubert III. had a religious turn, and inclined to enter into a religious order. He joined the pope against the emperor Frederick I. who stripped him of Turin, with all its dependences, which he bestowed upon the archbishop of that city. This was a great blow upon the house of Savoy, for it did not recover its loss for many years. This Hubert III. died in 1188.

HE was succeeded by Thomas I. who observed a conduct very different from that of his father; for he attached himself to the imperial interest, who not only restored him to many of his paternal estates in Piedmont, but gave him the title of vicar-general of the holy Roman empire in Piedmont, and in Lombardy. His son Amadeo IV. following his father's principles and party, prevailed with the emperor Frederick II. to erect the Chablais and Aosta into duchies in his favour. His brother Thomas added to the house of Savoy the principality of Carignan, which he purchased from the family of Provane, and also the marquisate of Jurée, which the emperor made a present of to his house, though it was long before they could enter into possession of it. This Amadeo IV. reigned twenty years. He was succeeded in 1255, by his son Boniface, who, from his bodily strength, was called Roland. He was an unfortunate prince, being all his life-time engaged in quarrels with his neighbours, particularly with William, marquis of Montferrat, who took him prisoner, and carried him to Turin, where he died under his confinement, notwithstanding the earnest mediation of the pope in his favour. This Boniface never having been married, he was succeeded in his dominions by his uncle Peter. This prince married Agnes, the heiress of Faucigny, the lord of which left all his estates to his daughter, by whom they came to the house of Savoy. He defeated the marquis of Montferrat, who had been so cruel to his predecessor Boniface, and acquired so great a reputation, that the town of Bern put itself under his protection, that it might be defended from the encroachments and menaces of its neighbours. This prince dying without issue in 1268, he was succeeded by his brother Philip, archbishop of Lions and Vienne. But he quitted the ecclesiastical state, and married Alice of Burgundy, by whom having no issue, his dominions fell to his next heir Amadeo V. son to Thomas II. This prince acquired the surname of The Great, by his successes, and the wisdom with which they were conducted. He married Sibylla, the heiress of Bresse, a province of France, which is surrounded by the Rhone, the Saon, Burgundy, and the county of Vaux, Coligni, and several other territories. He purchased Revermont from Robert, duke of Burgundy, and inherited, by bequeathment from Margaret, queen of France, the fortresses of Pierre-Chatel, Seissel, and Montfalcon. The county of Asi was given to him in a present by the emperor Henry VII. but the possession of it was not made good to the house of Savoy, till the time of the emperor Charles V. This great prince acquired immortal honour by his behaviour in defending the isle of Rhodes, which had undergone various revolutions. The califs of Bagdat, or, as they are commonly called, the Saracens, had taken it from the Greek emperor. The Saracens were expelled by the Turks, and they in their turn by the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, after besieging the capital for two years. The Turks, about the year 1311, endeavoured to retake it, and must have succeeded, had it not been for the generous and powerful assistance offered to the Christians by the count of Savoy. The histories of that time are full of his gallant behaviour in defending that important island, which was then the barrier of Christendom, against the infidels. The king of Arles, or Burgundy, had made a present of the temporal sovereignty of the city of Lions to its archbishop; and the latter had given a palace there to the knights of St. John, which, in consideration of the great services performed by the count to the order, the great master bestowed upon him. His defence of Rhodes is said to have given rise to the device of F. E. R. T. the initials of the Latin words, Fortitudo ejus Rhodum tenuit. "His bravery saved Rhodes."

ALL the sovereign princes of Europe courted the friendship of this Amadeo, and he was generally the mediator in all their differences, witness the friendships he contracted with the emperor, and the kings of France and England, who all of them loved and honoured him, while they were at variance with one another. He governed Savoy forty-five years, and his brother Thomas reunited Piedmont to that house, which it had long been deprived of, as we have already seen. This Amadeo the Great was succeeded by his son Edward, who was then only lord, or, as he was called, sire of Baugy and Bresse. In his father's life-time he had signalized himself in war, particularly in the battle of Mont en Paele; but after he came to be count of Savoy, he had but indifferent success in the wars he waged with his neighbours, particularly with the dauphin of Viennois. In the year 1328, he assisted Philip de Valois, whom he followed into Flanders, at the battle of Montcasel. Having received many services from the inhabitants of Bern, he generously re-established that city in its liberties, and died while Clementia, the widow of Lewis Hutin of France, was endeavouring to reconcile him to the dauphin of Viennois. He left behind him an only daughter, who was married to John III. duke of Britany.

EDWARD was succeeded by his brother Aimon. This prince, having seen the misfortunes of war during his brother's reign, endeavoured all he could to avoid them; and for that reason obtained the name of The Pacific. He was the first count of Savoy, who added to his titles that of count of Verceil. After reigning upwards of fourteen years, he was succeeded by Amadeo VI. This gallant prince distinguished himself at a tournament, in which the furniture of his horse, and his own armour, being all green, he obtained the appellation of count de Verd, or The Green Count, by which he was so generally known, that it has created some confusion in history. He was but nine years of age when he succeeded to the government of Savoy, which he greatly increased. He joined to it Quevasque and Mondovi, about the year 1346, and the year after Cheri and Savigliano. Three years after the city of Fribourg, of its own accord, put itself under his protection; but it afterwards a afterwards recovered its liberty, and is now the capital of one of the Swiss cantons. He purchased from his cousin Catharine, the wife of Azzo Visconti, the country of Vaud; and he had a present of the marquisate of Saluces from the emperor Charles IV. that marquis having rebelled against him; but it was of little service at this time to the marquis. In 1373 he took St. Agatha, and several other places upon the Doire, and afterwards added to his dominions Bielle, Coni, and Verrue. He was the original founder of the order of the knights of Annunciade, which for many years was called the order of Savoy; and he obliged the king of Bulgaria to restore to his liberty the emperor John Paleologus of Greece. He had many wars with the dauphin of Viennois, the marquis of Montferrat, and other neighbours, in all which he was successful; but he died near St. Stefano, while he was assisting Lewis of Anjou to recover the kingdom of Naples. His death, according to some, was occasioned by the plague, and, according to others, by the enemy having poisoned all the waters of the neighbourhood. His son Amadeo VII. was so fortunate as to become master of the county of Nice; and both Villa Franca and Barcelonetta put themselves under his protection; so that the house of Savoy became their masters. This prince died of the consequences of a fall he received from his horse while he was hunting, and the unskilfulness of a surgeon who dressed his wounds. Amadeo VII.

He was succeeded by his son Amadeo VIII. who purchased from its last earl the county of Genevois, which cost him forty-five thousand florins of gold. We have, in the history of Geneva, given an ample account of the wars between the house of Savoy and the inhabitants of that city; we shall not, therefore, repeat them here. Amadeo VIII. purchased the city of Rumilli, upon the lake of Geneva, from the widow of the last count of Genevois; and the house of Savoy now became so illustrious, that in 1426, the emperor Sigismund erected Savoy into a duchy. According to the Savoyard historians, this Amadeo supported John Paleologus against the duke of Milan, who endeavoured to deprive him of the duchy of Montferrat. Paleologus, thinking he could not be too grateful for the assistance he had received, not only resigned to the duke Chivas, Brandis, and other estates, but submitted to hold all the marquisate of Montferrat, as a fief from the house of Savoy. We have already observed, that, in the history of Modena, Vercelli was given to this duke, upon the marriage of his daughter with Philip Maria, duke of Milan; and, about the same time, the count of Crescentino became his toedary. Amadeo VIII.

Few transactions in history are so remarkable, or more memorable, as the life of this Amadeo; nor do writers seem to know his real character. Some have represented him to be a person of great sanctity, and as leading a life of moderation and virtue; others, as being a mere bigot, and an enthusiast; and others, as one of the most politic princes in the world. The truth is, his real character appears, with a mixture of virtue and abilities, to have been caprice, and a humour that led him to indulge himself in all kind of even opposite extravagances. He pretended a vast love for retirement, which was no other than that he might have an opportunity to live at freedom, and in the most sensual manner: he therefore retired to Ripaille, where there was a religious house, and there he instituted the order of St. Maurice. The place, which is naturally delightful, was fitted up with every thing that could please the eye, and charm the other senses; and he was attended by several of his intimates, and twenty servants, who were intrusted with his voluptuous secrets. Instead of taking upon him a religious habit, as he gave out he had done, he assumed robes next to those of royalty (A), and a golden cross was embroidered upon his mantle. In short, nothing was wanting to complete his scheme of pleasure, being provided with excellent music, and living upon the most luxurious dainties, both in eating and drinking. His character, and luxurious retreat.

His pretended retreat, and sanctity of manners, was so celebrated, that he was, by the council of Basil, which had deposed pope Eugene IV. chosen pope. This was carrying the farce of his devotion very far: but he still continued to humour it. He had resigned the dukedom of Savoy to his eldest son Lewis, and had made his youngest son Philip count of Genevois; but their honours were only titular, for they were obliged to live on very small allowances; while the father in his retirement received all the revenues, and amassed so much money, that he is said to have purchased the papacy. It is highly probable that the duke was not then serious in retaining that dignity. He took the name of Felix V. and was crowned at Basil by the cardinal of Arles, to the amazement of all Europe, he never having taken any holy orders, and still continuing a layman. This council, however, in its twenty-ninth session, confirmed his election to the popedom; and he himself, with great pretended reluctance, assumed the pontifical ornaments, and was consecrated in the church of St. Maurice. For some time the dignity of pope was contested between him and Eugene; but he was not acknowledged by the emperor, notwithstanding the most earnest instances Is chosen pope. Takes the name of Felix V.

(A) This retreat, according to Monstrelet, a French historian, who lived about this time, enriched the French language with the word faire Ripailles, to signify a life of exquisite pleasure and luxury.

of the council for that purpose. All Europe was divided between him and Eugene. Eneas Sylvius, who was himself afterwards pope, informs us, that France, England, Spain, Italy, and Hungary, acknowledged Eugene. Germany was neutral. The kings of Arragon and Poland, and the duke of Bretagne, acknowledged the council only, as being head of the church, while Savoy, Switzerland, Basil, Strasburg, Pomerania, and one of the dukes of Bavaria, acknowledged Felix, who obtained from the council a grant of many large revenues for the support of his dignity. This substantial mark of their allegiance prevailed with Felix to make some efforts towards retaining the pontificate. He and the council of Basil had been excommunicated by Eugene; and the emperor Frederick III. held a council at Franckfort, before which both popes pleaded their rights by their deputies, but without any effect. Soon after, the emperor came into the neighbourhood of Basil, where he had an interview with Felix, whose natural propensity to pleasure was so great, that he committed the management of his affairs to his cardinals, and retired again to Ripaille. It was there that he treated with Alphonso, king of Arragon, but in vain; for Alphonso acknowledged Eugene. Mean while, the fathers of the council of Basil were perpetually applying to Felix to reside in that city; but he still found means to elude their requests, and to indulge his pleasures. He even rendered them obedient to his will in every thing he desired, and prevailed with them to transfer the council to Lions, which lay more convenient for himself. Eugene having excommunicated some of the German princes for adhering to Felix, the others threatened to disavow his authority; and thus every thing relating to the church ran into confusion, till the death of Eugene, which, for a few days, left Felix sole pope.

BUT his authority having been disowned by above half of Europe, the cardinals at Rome, in order to restore peace to the church, on the 11th day after Eugene's death, proceeded to the election of a new pope, and the choice fell upon Thomas de Sarzana, who took the name of Nicholas V. and being generally recognized, Felix agreed at last to treat concerning his abdication of the popedom. This, however, could not be done without danger to himself; and he applied for the assistance and countenance of Philip duke of Milan, his son-in-law, who had been very instrumental in his exaltation. Philip only laughed at his applications, by saying, "That as Amadeo had given him a wife without a portion, so he " had given him a popedom without a revenue;" for the grant of money which the council had given him, had never been paid. Though it is uncertain whether Felix ever was in earnest about keeping the pontificate, yet he undoubtedly offered the emperor Frederick III. two hundred thousand crowns with his daughter in marriage. The emperor had his reasons for declining this offer; and Felix perceiving that the little authority that remained to him was daily diminishing, agreed, at the request of the emperor, under certain stipulations, which Frederick transmitted to Rome for the approbation of Nicholas, to resign the papacy. This negotiation proved Felix to be an able prince. Nicholas annulled all that had been done by the late pope Eugene to his prejudice, or that of his friends. He confirmed the acts of the council of Basil, and granted many others that were equally to the honour and advantage of Felix; for he was made perpetual apostolical legate in Savoy, Piedmont, and the other places of his own dominions, as well as in the bishoprics of Lausanne, Basil, Strasburg, and Constance. He was, at the same time, created a cardinal, and bishop of Subino, and permitted to wear his pontifical dress, all but a few badges of authority appropriated to the pope. It was likewise stipulated, that he should not be obliged to come to Rome, or attend any general council; and that when he approached the pope's person, his holiness should rise to receive him; and that he should kiss his lips instead of his toe.

Lewis.

WE have, in the history of Geneva, given some farther particulars concerning this Amadeo of Savoy, to which we refer the reader. He died at Lausanne, which, during the latter part of his life, he had chosen for his residence. He was succeeded by his son Lewis, to whom the father, in his life-time, had resigned the title, but few or none of the revenues of the dukedom. Lewis seems to have relented this hard usage; for he ordered William de Balomier, his father's chancellor and chief counsellor, to be drowned in the lake of Geneva, on pretence of his opposing the accommodation between his father and pope Nicholas V. During the contests about the succession of the duchy of Milan, after the death of Philip Maria, the last duke, this Lewis, duke of Savoy, who had strong pretensions to it, made himself master of Valenza upon the Po, Romagnana, and several other places of the Milanese. He had been married when young to Anne de Lusignan, and his family has still pretensions to the title of king of Jerusalem; and by her he had a numerous issue. Charlotte, one of his daughters, was married to the dauphin of France, afterwards Lewis XI. who, after he became king, treated her but indifferently; and the duke her father died at Lions, on a journey he made to see his son-in-law. Of eight sons, three of them embraced an ecclesiastical life; two, Peter and John Lewis, were successively archbishops of a of Tarento; and the youngest of all, Francis, was archbishop of Aix. Amadeo IX. who was the eldest, succeeded to the dukedom of Savoy; and the second, Lewis count of Genevois, was married to Charlotte of Cyprus, and it is in her right that the house of Savoy claims the title of king of Cyprus. Amadeo's third and fourth brothers died without issue; and the fifth, Philip, is the ancestor of the present king of Sardinia, being stiled in his father's life-time Lackland.

AMADEO IX. of Savoy, though in his person he was feeble, unhealthful, and troubled with the falling sickness, was surnamed The Happy; on account of his virtue, his piety, his readiness to pardon all who had offended him, and his love for justice. One day a foreign minister at his court took the liberty to ask him, whether he kept any hounds? b "A great many (answered the duke), and if you will visit me to-morrow noon, you shall see them." The minister came accordingly to court; and the duke leading him to a window, which looked into a large square, "There," said he, pointing to a great number of poor people, who were seated at a table eating and drinking, "are my hounds, with whom I go in chace of heaven." Philibert was the eldest son of Amadeo IX. and succeeded him in his dominions. He was termed The Hunter, from his fondness for that diversion; and dying without children, he was succeeded by his brother Charles I. who was surnamed The Warlike. The reader, in our history of Geneva, will find many curious particulars concerning the family of Amadeo IX. which we shall not here repeat. Charles I. was succeeded by his son Charles II. when he was no more than nine months old; and he c died when he was but eight years of age.

THE dukedom, upon that young prince's death, came to Philip Lackland, the third son of Amadeo IX. who lived but one year after his succession, and was succeeded by his son Philibert, surnamed The Handsome, whom he had by his first marriage with Margaret, daughter to Charles duke of Bourbon. The mind of this prince was as beautiful as his person, and he was about seventeen years of age when he succeeded to his duchy. He married, for a second wife, Margaret, daughter to the emperor Maximilian, who for her portion brought him the Franche Comte; but there being no issue of the marriage, it reverted to the family of Austria. Philibert's two sisters were married; the first, Louisa, to the count of Angoulesme, by whom she had Francis I. king of France; the second to Julien de Medicis. Philibert having died without issue; he was succeeded in his dominions by his brother Charles II. by a second marriage.

THIS duke was so fortunate as to marry Beatrice of Portugal, sister to Isabella, wife to the emperor Charles V. who was so favourable to the house of Savoy, that he put this duke in full possession of the county of Aste, which had been granted to it, as we have already mentioned, by the emperor Henry VI. He gave him likewise the investiture of the marquisate of Cbivas, and the lordship of Quevasque. Those favours, however, had dreadful consequences with regard to the duke of Savoy, because they drew upon him the resentment of Francis I. king of France, the emperor's rival and enemy; and notwithstanding all the duke could do to appease that prince, Francis demanded his share of the succession by his mother Louisa of Savoy. This demand had been made so early as the year 1518, and had been refused, but was now revived; and the duke was so much pressed by Francis, that he was obliged openly to declare himself in favour of the emperor.

IN the mean while, the constable of Bourbon having, as may be seen in other parts of this history, withdrawn his allegiance from Francis, and joined the emperor, the duke of Savoy went so far as even to pledge his family jewels, to enable the constable to raise ten thousand Germans, who afterwards were greatly instrumental in gaining for the emperor the battle of Pavia. Francis, all this while, was carrying on a secret negotiation with the duke of Milan; of which the emperor having received information, he loaded that duke with reproaches, and proceeded to menaces. Sforza, who was a man of no principle, was afraid of disobliging the emperor, and employed some of his courtiers, who picked a quarrel with Merveille the French agent, which occasioned some disturbances at court; and the duke, after confining Merveille, ordered his head to be struck off in prison, to convince the emperor that he considered him only as a private gentleman, on a tour of pleasure at the court of Milan. Francis demanded satisfaction for so atrocious a violation of the law of nations; which being refused, he not only renewed his family claims upon Savoy, but demanded from that duke a passage for his troops through his dominions to Milan. This being likewise refused, Chabot, the French general, entered Savoy at the head of an army, and in a short time stripped duke Charles of the greatest part of his forts and cities, and would have taken them all, had not the emperor amused the king with hopes that he would grant the investiture of Milan to his second son; which were confirmed by the cardinal of Lorraine, and the French ambassador at Rome.

THE duke of Savoy being thus weakened, the republic of Bern took advantage of his condition, and seized the city of Lausanne, a great part of Rosgau, and the county of Vaud; MOD. HIST. VOL. XIV. L 1 while while the Swiss Fribourghers invaded Romont. The city of Geneva, at the same time, took that opportunity to expel popery, and establish protestantism, and deprive the duke of the small remains of his power over the city, and its neighbourhood. The unfortunate duke, seeing himself thus reduced, retired to Vercelli, where he died of heart-break, never having been able to recover any part of his losses.

Emanuel Philibert.

HE was succeeded, in 1553, by his son Emanuel Philibert, one of the greatest soldiers and statesmen of that age. This prince had been bred up at the court of Charles V. and he performed the greatest services to him and his son Philip II. of Spain, at the battle of St. Quintin, where he commanded the imperial army, which defeated that of France, but the victory was in a great measure owing to the valour of the English troops. The duke was, at the same time, governor of the Low Countries, and his reputation was so high, that he was offered the command of the army of the pope, Spain, and Venetians, which was raised against Selim II. emperor of the Turks; but he declined it, being intent on the recovery of his family dominions, great part of which was restored to him by the peace of Chateau Cambresis. The French, however, still kept possession of Turin, Pignerol, Asti, Chivas, and some other towns. When Henry III. of France was on his journey from Poland, to take possession of the French crown, he had an interview with Emanuel at Turin, and the duke managed so well, that the king agreed to give him up all the places that the French had in his dominions. Soon after, the duke of Alva, general to the king of Spain, who was the ally and friend of the duke of Savoy, marched an army through the duke's territories, towards the Low Countries, which struck the Genevois and the Swiss Protestants with so much terror, that the city of Bern restored to Savoy the three bailiages, Tonon, Gye, and Ternis, and the duke renounced his pretensions to all the other dominions belonging to his family, which they had seized upon.

War with the Vaudois.

THE war with the Vaudois is one of the most remarkable incidents in this duke's history. That poor people were harmless, inoffensive, and submissive to the duke's government: but, as we have already hinted, they had been always irreconcilable enemies to the church of Rome. It would exceed the bounds allotted to this part of our work, should we recount all the wars and persecutions they suffered, and the glorious victories they obtained, in defence of their religion, over the troops of the pope, and other bigotted Italian princes, who were perpetually spiring up the dukes of Savoy against them. Duke Philip had resolution enough to withstand all their importunities and zeal, and admired the courage with which, armed only with stones and flails, the Vaudois defended the passes into their country, and defeated the numerous well-disciplined armies of their enemies. Being resolved to put an end to their persecutions, he permitted them to send twelve of their principals to his court, to make their submissions, and to pay a small acknowledgement of his sovereignty; which the Vaudois did, ordering their deputies to do whatever the duke should direct them, provided their religion was safe. It is remarkable on this occasion, that the duke ordered some of their young children to be brought from their vallies, to satisfy himself whether they were not born with black throats, shaggy manes, and four rows of teeth; all which he had been assured by their enemies, and which he found, upon inspection, to be false.

A peace.

War again.

THIS unreserved submission procured them but little respite from persecution, which was renewed against them about the year 1532; but, leaving their prayers, they betook themselves to their fastnesses, and their usual arms, and defeated all the repeated efforts of their enemies, and at last, having settled a correspondence with the reformers of Germany, they embraced Protestantism. Their resolution and valour obliged the government of Savoy, who durst not break with the pope, to change their method of persecution, and, instead of invading their vallies, they cut them off from all communication with the rest of their dominions, where they were put to death whenever they were found. This could not satisfy the zealots, who persuaded duke Emanuel, against his own better judgment, to attempt an utter extirpation of the Vaudois. The duke's troops were joined by those of the pope and the French king, and the whole were commanded by the marshal Montelie and Charles Truchses, who lost their lives in the service, and their troops were defeated on every occasion; so that the duke was at last obliged to grant the Vaudois the free exercise of their religion, under certain restrictions. This duke Emanuel acquired the principality of Oneglia, by giving John Jerome Doria in exchange for it the marquisate of Civis, which he was, however, to hold as a fief of Savoy. Emanuel likewise purchased the county of Tend, and, after a glorious government of twenty-seven years, he died in 1580, universally esteemed and beloved for his wisdom, courage, and the great encouragement he gave to science. He married Margaret of France, daughter to Francis I. a princess of incomparable prudence and virtue. It was chiefly owing to her that the Vaudois were delivered from their persecutions; and she was so little an enemy to the reformed religion, that she is said to have sent every year 4000 crowns to Geneva, for the use of the French Protestants there.

CHARLES

a CHARLES EMANUEL, son to Emanuel Philibert, though of a feeble constitution, had a bold, restless enterprising genius. While Henry III. of France was distressed on the one hand by the leaguers, and on the other by the Protestants, Charles invaded the marquisate of Saluces, which he long had an eye upon, and wrested it from the crown of France, on pretence of securing it against the Protestant general Lesdiguières, who was master of Dauphiny, and might, perhaps, introduce his religion into the marquisate. But the duke did not bear his success with moderation; for he ordered a medal to be struck, with his own head on one side, and on the reverse a centaur, in the action of discharging an arrow from a bow, with the motto "Opportuné," insinuating, that he had seized the lucky crisis of conquest.

Charles Emanuel.
He invades and seizes the marquisate of Saluces.

b UPON the assassination of Henry III. the affairs of his successor Henry IV. looked so gloomy, that the duke renewed his invasion, and seized several places in Dauphiny and Provence, but was soon obliged to give them up. When the peace of Vervins gave Henry the peaceable possession of his kingdom, amongst the first things he did, was to demand from the duke restitution of the marquisate of Saluces. Charles, being conscious he was no match for Henry in power, employed all means to prevail with him to desist from his demand; but finding all ineffectual, proposed to comply with it, provided his majesty would desist from protecting Geneva. The reader, in the history of that city, will see what followed upon this. The duke even paid a visit in person to Henry, at Paris; but all his address and cunning could not prevail over that king's resolution and good sense.

A. D. 1625.

c He immediately invaded and reduced the greatest part of Savoy, and ordered a medal to be struck, in answer to the provoking one of the duke. It contained his own head on one side, and on the other a Hercules killing a centaur with one hand, and with the other raising a crown from the ground, the motto being "Opportunus," that is, more opportunely. At last, the pope made himself a mediator for a peace between them, by which the king kept possession of Bresse, Bugey, Valeromey, Gex, Fort l'Ecluse, and some other places upon the Rhone, such as Auché, Choufi, Vonlai, Pont d'Arley, Seissel, Chaucey, and Pierre Chatel. The duke retained possession of the marquisate of Saluces, and its dependencies; but what he lost in property was made up to him in conveniency, for he thereby gained a frontier for his capital of Turin, which before was exposed to the inroads and insults of his enemies.

b His attempt to scale the city of Geneva, which we have so amply recounted in the history of that city, followed the peace; and the duke was, by the French king and the Bernois, forced to give the Genevois satisfaction, and to agree to build no fort within four miles of their city.

IN 1613, duke Francis of Mantua dying without male issue, the duke of Savoy, who, as we have seen in the history of Mantua, had strong pretensions upon that succession, seized Trino, Alma, and Monte Calvi; but he was forced, by the grand duke of Tuscany, and the republic of Venice, to restore them in a short time. He still, however, kept his army on foot, and was required by the governor of the Milanese, on behalf of the king of Spain, to dismiss it, which he refused to do. Upon this the governor besieged Vercelli and took it, after losing above 6000 men in the siege, together with some places of smaller importance, which the duke had seized on. France offered her mediation, which was accepted of, for restoring the tranquility of Italy; and by the peace that followed, Vercelli, with the other dominions of his, which he had lost, were restored to the duke, who, on his part, was obliged to give up all that he held in Montferrat and the Milanese. The peace being concluded, the duke ordered the marquis of Bottio's head to be struck off, and his estates confiscated, for having sided with the Spaniards, though he was a subject of Savoy. Scarcely was this war finished, when the court of France persuaded the duke to fall upon the Genoese, for their having bought the marquisate of Zuccarella, which had been taken from the marquis de Caretto, by the emperor, and which the duke said belonged to him by a prior cession

e of the marquis in his favour.

THE duke was very successful in the beginning of this war. He gained the battle of Ottaggio over the Genoese, and took from them many of their towns, while the constable Lesdiguières, the French general, took Gavi. The general opinion was, that, if the duke, after this battle, had marched directly to Genoa, he might have taken it; but Lesdiguières is said not to have been proof against the Genoese gold, and it is certain he relaxed in his operations, so as to give time for the Genoese to recover their consternation, till they could be assisted by the Spaniards, who had laid siege to the strong fortress of Verrue, in Piedmont, but were obliged to raise it, and march to the relief of Genoa; which they not only effected, but assisted the Genoese in conquering several places belonging to the duke. A peace then

g followed, by which each party was to re-enter into possession of what it had before the war; and the marquisate of Zuccarella remained with the Genoese, who, however, paid to the duke of Savoy 160,000 crowns for renouncing all his pretensions to the same.

It was the fate of this active but too turbulent prince to govern the most submissive ^a obedient people in Europe, who supported him in all his wars of ambition or justice with equal chearfulness. Scarcely had he concluded peace with the Genoese, when the elder line of the Gonzaga family failed in the person of Vincent II. duke of Mantua; and Charles, on that event, renewed his claim upon the duchy of Montferrat. We have already seen, in the history of Mantua, how warmly the court of France supported the duke of Nevers in his claim to that succession. Charles was obliged to abandon the country of Susa, and went to the relief of Casal, which was besieged by Gonsalvo de Cordova, the governor of the Milanese. When he was intent upon relieving that place, the French, making the best advantage they could of the juncture, attacked Pignerole, which they took in a very short time; and the loss of that important place broke the duke of Savoy's heart, in the year ^b 1629, after governing, or rather reigning, over Savoy fifty years. He was indulged with a long life and reign, which, like his character, was chequered with good and bad. He was undoubtedly a prince of great abilities, but too much enterprize. His subjects, though forward to serve him, were not endowed with a military genius that could answer the suddenness, the variety, and boldness, of his operations in the field; and he was but very indifferently served by the foreigners he took into his pay. Notwithstanding all this, and though the most powerful princes in Europe, at times, were his enemies, yet the greatest part of his reign cannot be said to have been otherwise than prosperous, if not glorious; though it must be acknowledged, that the French being in possession of Pignerole, at the time of his death, was a most unfavourable circumstance for his dominions. His attempt ^c upon Savoy reflects great dishonour upon his memory; and his insolence towards Henry IV. the greatest monarch, and best-natured man of his age, deserved the chastisement it met with. In point of religion, he is said naturally to have been no bigot, and that he was forced by churchmen and priests, to give way to the persecutions which his protestant subjects suffered.

Victor Amadeus I.

He was succeeded by his son Victor Amadeus I. who in 1630 wisely agreed to the treaty of Quevasque, in Piedmont, by which he accepted of an annuity of fifteen thousand crowns for all his claims upon Montferrat, and left the family of Nevers in full possession of that duchy. To insure the payment of this annuity, he was, by a separate writing, put in possession of Trino, Tricerto, Palazzuolo, and of eighty other places upon the Po; so that, in ^d fact, he held the finest part of Montferrat. The truth is, the French, on this occasion, sacrificed the interest of the Nevers family for their own; for they obliged Victor, in consideration of what he had got in Montferrat, to abandon to them Pignerole, Perusa, Angrogne, and Lucerne. It is said by the French historians, that the famous father Joseph, the confidant of cardinal Richlieu, was the main instrument in concluding this treaty; and that, after its conclusion, when he visited the duke of Mantua, that prince could not help testifying his discontent at what had been done; and that, on the other hand, the duke of Savoy did every thing he could, to avoid ratifying the treaty; but all was to no purpose, because the cardinal was resolved to carry his point, which he did, to the infinite danger of all Italy.

A.D. 1637.
Francis Hyacinth,

Two years after the conclusion of the peace of Quevasque, the duke took it in his head ^e to assume the title of king of Cyprus. The Venetians took this amiss, because of their pretensions upon that crown; and, for some time, all correspondence between them and the duke was broken off. Two years after Victor and his army joined the French, who had been sent, under the marshal de Crequi, to the support of the duke of Parma, and assisted in the fruitless siege of Valenza, the miscarriage of which Victor attributed to Crequi, who, he said, minded the diversions of hunting much more than he did the operations of the field. Afterwards the duke exerted himself so greatly, to repair the failure before Valenza, that he contributed chiefly to the French gaining the victory of Tornavento over the Spaniards, who had almost cut their way to the French intrenchments. Next year, he gained a considerable battle over the Spanish general don Martin de Arragon; but he died soon after, in the ^f same year. He was a prince of spirit and conduct, and leaving a successor Francis Hyacinth, who was no more than six years of age, the Spaniards took great advantage of the minority, by making themselves masters of Vercelli and fort Brema. To increase the misfortunes of Savoy, a dispute arose about the regency of the duchy, which was claimed by the duchess dowager, the cardinal Maurice, and Thomas Francis, prince of Carignan, who were both of them uncles to the young duke. The duchess dowager depended upon the assistance of her brother the French king, while the cardinal, and the prince of Carignan, took the party of the Spaniards; and it was agreed amongst them, that all the places which should willingly submit to the authority of the two uncles, should belong to their government; but all that should be conquered by the Spaniards, by force of arms, should remain in the possession of that crown. While those matters were in agitation, the young duke of Savoy died, October the 4th 1638, and was succeeded by his brother Charles Emmanuel II. who was no more than four years of age. Thus the disputes about the regency continued the same

a as before. The Spaniards seized Chivas and Trino, and the two brothers made themselves masters of Chieri, Moncalier, Pondestura, Asti, Villa Nuova de Asti, Alba, Verrue, Crescentino, S. Agatha, Nice, and Villa Franca. The young duke, all this time, remained under the pupillage of his mother; but prince Thomas, in the night-time, surprised Turin, and the duchess and her son had some difficulty to escape, as they did, to the citadel. It is hard to say what the consequence might have been, if a quarrel had not happened between the two brothers and the marquis de Leganez, during the siege of the citadel, on the following occasion.

b THE marquis pretended, that, by the articles of the treaty between them and his master, Turin and its citadel, when taken, must belong to his catholic majesty. The prince, on the other hand, alledged, that Turin was not understood to be comprehended in the treaty, because it was the capital of Piedmont and the residence of the duke. This dispute took up so much time, that the siege not going on, the French had time to march an army, under the count de Harcourt, which raised the siege of Casal, then besieged by the Spaniards, and marching to Turin, prince Thomas was shut up in that city between the citadel and the French army. The marquis de Leganez having orders to forget all animosities, and to relieve the prince, marched to his assistance, but without effect; and the city being reduced to extremity by scarcity of provisions, surrendered by capitulation. Next year, the French took the strong fortrefs of Coni, and obliged the two brothers to come to an accommodation with the duchess dowager. By that she was to have the guardianship of the prince, the cardinal was to have the government of Nice, and prince Thomas that of Jvrée and Biel, c during the duke's minority. All parties of the ducal house of Savoy being now agreed, they joined in a design to force the Spaniards to quit those places, which their own imprudence, or the necessities of the times, had put into their hands. The marquis de Pianesse retook the important fortrefs of Verrue; and prince Thomas, who had by this time reconciled himself with the French court, retook old and new Asti and Trino, but the citadel of Asti still held out. The year following the Savoyards surprized and retook Asti, and drove the Spaniards out of St. Agatha. It must be acknowledged, that, on this occasion, the duke of Savoy had infinite obligations to the French court; nor shall we examine whether they were not owing as much to the jealousy which Lewis entertained of the Spaniards, as d to his affection for the duchess dowager.

IN 1649, duke Charles Emanuel, though no more than fifteen years old, was declared to be of age. A. D. 1649. Three years after, the Spaniards took Trino and Crescentino, which last was retaken by the Savoyards the same year, and the other was restored to them by the peace of the Pyrennees, in 1658. The duke, by that treaty, having re-established the tranquility of his government, cultivated peace with all his neighbours, never was interrupted but by a slight difference he had with the Genoese, which was soon accommodated, through the mediation of France, without having any remarkable consequences which it had threatened.

e ALL the rest of this duke's reign was spent in cultivating and improving the internal policy of his dominions. Turin, to him, owes some of its most magnificent structures at this day; and he cut the amazing passage through the rock Mont Viso. This is an arch 500 geometrical paces in length, and broad enough for two loaded mules to walk abreast, for transporting goods to and from France and Italy, which, before that time, could not be done without infinite labour and danger. He was equally magnificent in all his other public works, and he is said to have lost his life in the following remarkable manner. Being one day in the menage, or riding-school, the young prince's horse, in going through his exercise, threw him; which accident struck his father with so much concern, that he is thought never to have recovered it, for he died a few days after in 1675.

f HAVING here mentioned Thomas prince of Carignan, it is proper to give some account of his family, and posterity. He was the fifth son of duke Charles Emanuel I. who, as the Italians are very fond of epithets, was called The Great. He held in France the post of grand master, and married the heiress of the house of Soissons, by whom he had the following issue. 1st, Emanuel Philibert Amadeo, who continued the house of Carignan. 2d, Louisa Christina, married to Ferdinand Maximilian of Baden. 3d, Joseph Emanuel John, who died without issue. 4th, Eugene Maurice, count of Soissons, author of that branch of the Savoy family, and father of the famous prince Eugene of Savoy, who, after that, made so illustrious a figure in the affairs of Europe, and was companion, friend, and fellow hero of the great duke of Marlborough.

g CHARLES EMANUEL II. never acknowledged any legitimate son but his successor Victor Amadeus II. to whom his mother Joan Baptist de Savoy Nemours was guardian during his minority. When he grew up he demanded in marriage the infanta of Portugal, and the duke of Cadaval came to Nice with a Portuguese fleet, to carry him to Lisbon; but all of a sudden he changed his resolution, and the marriage was broken off; and two years after he married married Anna Maria of Orleans, daughter to Philip duke of Orleans and Henrietta Anne of England. The issue of this marriage, when the succession of the family of Stuart to the throne of Great Britain was set aside, was nearer in blood to the crown than the house of Hanover, but their claim was disregarded, because they were of the Roman Catholic religion. Victor Amadeo II. imitated the conduct of Lewis XIV. at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, by persecuting his Protestant subjects the Vauds, with all the fury and malice of a bigot; but this inhuman resolution cost a great deal of blood in enforcing it.

THIS duke, however, entered in the grand alliance that was formed against France, and by a secret article of the same, it was stipulated, that the Vauds should be restored to their antient rights. It being thought by the confederates that his alliance would be highly useful, in checking the power of France on that side, they furnished him with considerable supplies both of men and money. Notwithstanding that, the French general St. Ruth took from him all Savoy, while marshal Catinat beat him in the two battles of Staffarde and Marsaille, and conquered from him Carmagnola, Susa, Nice, Villa Franca, and Montmelian. The duke, soon after, retook Carmagnola, and obliged the French to raise the siege of Coni. To give them a farther diversion, he invaded Dauphiny, where he took Gap and Ambrun, and carried away their bells. This small success was far from drawing the French out of his dominions; for they took from him Casal, and Fort St. Bridget near Pignerole. The duke's losses presented him with so melancholy a prospect, that he entered into secret connexions with France; and, under pretence of being indisposed, he returned out of Dauphiny. Soon after, France thought his friendship of so much importance, that she granted him a most advantageous peace, and gave him up Nice, Susa, Villa Franca, Montmelian, and Pignerole, the fortifications of which were demolished, together with the three vallies of Perusa, Lucern, and Angrogne, with a sum of money, by way of indemnification: nay, so intent was Lewis XIV. on forming a strict connexion with the duke of Savoy, that, by the same treaty, he concluded a marriage between his grandson the duke of Burgundy, eldest son to the Dauphin, and Mary Adelaide, Victor's eldest daughter. After this, he entered into a new contract with him for driving the imperialists out of Italy; and actually besieged Alessandria in the Milanese.

IN the year 1701, Philip of Anjou, the second son of the Dauphin, being called to the crown of Spain by the death of Charles II. married Mary Louisa Gabrielle, the duke of Savoy's second daughter, and the duke was declared generalissimo of the armies of France and Spain in Italy. But all those repeated marks of distinction and friendship could not fix the duke in the interests of France. The Spanish succession being disputed by the emperor Leopold, the confederates in the grand alliance joined against Lewis and his grandson the king of Spain. It was easy for the duke of Savoy to foresee his danger if he should continue his engagements with France; and, after prince Eugene had penetrated into Italy, he began secretly to negotiate with the allies. This could not be concealed from the penetration of the French court, and Lewis ordered his generals to make the duke's troops prisoners. Upon this, the duke arrested the ambassadors of France and Spain, a regiment of French horse, and all the French who were at Turin. This drew from the French king the following laconic letter, addressed to him: viz. "Monsieur, since religion, honour, alliance, treaties, and your own hand, are of no force between you and me, I have sent my cousin the duke of Vendosme to explain my mind to you, and he will give you four and twenty hours to consider what you have to do." This threatening letter had an effect very different from what the writer intended. The duke was one of the most penetrating princes in the world, and was remarkable through all Europe for accommodating his situations to his interests; but on occasion of this insolent letter, he shewed a firmness scarcely to be paralleled in history. Though he lost town after town; though his army amounted scarcely to 12,000 men; though he had scarcely territory to subsist even those, and though he was but ill supported by the imperial court, he could not be brought to abandon his allies. At last, on the 5th of June, 1706, the French besieged his capital of Turin. His duchess and his clergy pressed him to comply with the necessities of his situation. He continued firm against her, and he forbade the others to appear before him. He had, however, the satisfaction to reflect, that the places he had lost had made so good a defence, that they gained time for prince Eugene of Savoy to advance to his relief. He even declined the civility offered him by the French marshal de Feuillade, who, by orders of his king, offered passes and a guard to the duchess and his family, to carry them to a place of safety, when Turin was besieged. At last, the glory of taking so important a city lost the duke of Vendosme and Feuillade their command, in which they were succeeded by the duke of Orleans. The duke, who had been driven from place to place by the superior power of the French, on the 15th of June, had the mortification to see his capital bombarded by the French, with red hot balls; the French king being so exasperated, that he ordered the siege to be carried on with unusual fury. The duke did

a did all he could to interrupt the progress of his enemies, by giving them repeated alarms, which retarded their operations for some time; so that the French lost above 14,000 men before the place: but they had made themselves masters of the strongest posts, and the ammunition of the besieged was almost exhausted. In this dismal extremity, the duke's cousin, prince Eugene, with the rapidity, conduct, and good fortune, that attended all his enterprizes, after surmounting most incredible difficulties, on the 30th of August, appeared near Turin, and two days after he joined the duke of Savoy. The action that followed was one of the most glorious that happened in those years of glory, and has been mentioned in other parts of this work. It is therefore sufficient to say here, that, notwithstanding the junction between the duke and prince Eugene, the French thought themselves sure of carrying their point. The duke of Orleans and the general officers were for marching out of the lines; but the marshal Marfin, who served under that duke, but was chiefly trusted by his master, produced an order from the French king, that the duke should follow his opinion. Nothing could be stronger than their situation, and therefore nothing more dangerous than the attack. As the confederates advanced, they were exposed to the dreadful fire of forty cannon. Notwithstanding this they proceeded, and at last formed, and marched, without firing, till they came to the foot of the entrenchments. The resistance was equally brave; and it is said that prince Eugene was repulsed in two of the attacks he made. In the third, he drew his sword at the head of his battalions, and was amongst the first that broke into the entrenchments. In an instant, c all the confederate army followed his example; and room being made for the horse to advance, the French abandoned their defence, and were every-where cut in pieces; so that the duke of Savoy entered his capital that very evening. The loss of the French in this battle was very great. About 5000 were killed in the battle, besides what were killed in the pursuit. The duke of Orleans, who shewed great personal valour, was wounded, as was marshal Marfin, who died next day. Near 8000 men, among whom were a vast number of officers, some of them general ones, were made prisoners. Two hundred and fifty-five pieces of cannon, 180 mortars, 7800 bombs, 32,000 royal grenades, 48,000 cannon-balls, with a proportionable number of small artillery and ammunition, fell into the hands of the confederates, with all their tents, baggage, ready money, and horses of d all kinds; so that, upon the whole, the loss which the French sustained was incredible, and was an ample proof of the great desire their king had to reduce the city, and irretrievably to ruin the duke of Savoy. On the other hand, the defence which Turin made, under count Daun, a name auspicious to the house of Austria, was brave; but in the whole cost above 5000 men, besides 3000 of the confederates, who were killed in the battle. After it the duke of Orleans retired into Dauphiny, and the duke of Savoy not only recovered all the towns and territories he had lost, but enabled the imperialists to drive the French out of Lombardy.

It happened upon this occasion, that, to the misfortune of England, the duke of Savoy, and Holland, prince Eugene was entirely directed by the court of Vienna. The British ministry, in concert with the Dutch, had formed a project for the conquest of Toulon, which e might have finished the destruction of France. The duke of Savoy made the first sketch of this project, and communicated the same to prince Eugene, who finding it disliked by the court of Vienna, was backward in giving him encouragement to undertake it. The truth was, that court was not so intent upon humbling France, as upon aggrandizing itself, by employing its troops in the conquest of Naples; and it was thought that the French had early notice of the design. The court of England was so earnest in carrying it into execution, that the emperor was at last obliged to give way, and prince Eugene had orders to assist in it, but with a very bad grace. A large sum of money was furnished by England, and the enterprize was supported by a strong British fleet, under the command of that excellent admiral, Sir Cloudesley Shovel. The duke of Savoy and prince Eugene, f on the 11th of July, 1707, favoured by this fleet, passed the Var, at the head of 30,000 men, and advanced with great celerity against Toulon. They had been promised great reinforcements from the imperial court, but were disappointed; and prince Eugene, who never appeared hearty in the expedition, had orders from the emperor not to expose his troops too much. Being arrived before the place, they had great success by seizing some of the most important posts in the neighbourhood; but, the duke of Savoy pressing prince Eugene to advance, the latter at last shewed him the emperor's orders, which amounted to a prohibition, and occasioned a delay that was the ruin of the enterprize. Prince Eugene's backwardness, or rather inactivity, did not damp the duke or the English g admiral from acting with the utmost vigour. The latter bombarded the town, and became master of two forts that commanded the mole; so that many houses were destroyed, some magazines were blown up, and eight ships of the line, most of them capital ships, were burnt or rendered unserviceable. But by this time the French had not only recalled their troops

troops from Spain, but were marching with the whole power of their monarchy to relieve Toulon. The duke of Savoy, finding he was thus in danger of having his retreat cut off, and that the troops in the garrison, who made a sally which cost him a thousand men, increased every day, re embarked his artillery, his sick and wounded, and returned in good order, without being pursued, to Piedmont. Thus ended this important expedition, to the great disappointment, though not disgrace, of the English and duke of Savoy, and is a pregnant proof, among many, how regardless the house of Austria is of all interests but its own.

A. D. 1709.

THE unsuccessful expedition against Toulon gave the French an opportunity, in the mean while, of becoming masters of many places in Savoy; so that, when the conferences were held at Gertruydenberg, in May, 1709, the duke, who was admitted to be a party there, claimed restitution of the whole duchy of Savoy, the county of Nice, and all his hereditary dominions, together with the quiet possession of the territory, states, and places that had been ceded to him by the emperor, and his allies, with the sovereignty and sole property of the cities of Exilles, Fenestrelles, and Chaumont, with the valley of Pragelas to Mount Genevre, and its adjacentcies, which were to be the boundaries between his dominions and those of France. The conferences at Gertruydenberg proving, for reasons foreign to this history, ineffectual, and the duke having some differences with the emperor, he remained quiet till the peace of Utrecht, 1713, when he renewed his claims, with some additional ones. By that treaty he was put in possession of the duchy of Savoy, the county of Nice, and all their dependencies. The French king likewise yielded to him, in perpetuity, the valley of Pragelas, the forts of Exilles and Fenestrelles, with the vallies of Oux, Sezane, Bardonache, and Chateau Dauphin. The duke, on the other hand, ceded to Louis the valley of Barcelonetta and its dependencies; so that the ridge of the Alps became the boundary that separated France and Piedmont and the county of Nice; the plains of those ridges being equally divided between them.

BUT as the duke of Savoy had not only behaved in the common cause with unexampled firmness and spirit, but was a great means of its success, and as his importance in the affairs of Europe was now known to be very great, all parties concurred to aggrandize him. The emperor was in a manner forced to confirm to him the possession of that part of Montferrat which had belonged to the dukes of Mantua, with the provinces of Alessandria and Valenza, the territory between the Po and the Tanaro, the Lomellin, the valley of Sessa, and the Vigevanasco. But, to crown all the duke's other good successes, his catholic majesty agreed to resign to him the kingdom of Sicily, by which he and his descendants acquired a royal title; and it was agreed, that, in default of succession from the king of Spain, that crown should go to the house of Savoy, preferably to that of Bourbon.

THE cession of the crown and title of Sicily was disputed with the duke by the emperor Charles VI. who, about the time of the treaty of Utrecht, succeeded his brother Joseph in the empire, for reasons that have been explained in other parts of this history. The duke, however, took upon himself the title of king of Sicily, and entered into possession of that island, which was evacuated by the Spaniards; and the inhabitants were beginning to be reconciled to his government, when he embroiled himself with the clergy, and consequently with the pope, on account of the ecclesiastical immunities. The quarrel went so far, that the archbishop of Messina, and the archbishop of Catanea, left Sicily, after laying their fees under interdicts, and were followed by almost all the clergy of Sicily, who flocked to Rome; but the viceroy paid so little regard to them, that he made it capital for the Sicilians to obey the interdicts.

HIS catholic majesty had made the great sacrifice of Sicily, on the express condition of their joining their troops together, to dispossess the emperor of what he still held in Italy. It appears as if his Sicilian majesty, after getting possession of that island, which was in some measure forced upon him by queen Anne, and which he himself had never thought of aspiring to, had repented of his private treaty with Spain. His catholic majesty suspected this, and demanded that the prince of Piedmont should be sent to Madrid, by way of security for the performance; but the demand was evaded by his Sicilian majesty on account of the queen's tenderness for her son; but he offered to send him the prince of Carignan, his other son. Though this offer was accepted of, yet Victor had his reasons for eluding the performance; and the court of Madrid was given to understand that the prince had, without his Sicilian majesty's knowledge, retired to France. Upon which the turbulent cardinal Alberoni, who was the prime minister of Spain, made vast preparations for conquering Sardinia from the emperor, and Sicily from that king. The court of England interposed in the dispute, and, in conjunction with that of France, undertook to prescribe a peace, by obliging the Spaniards and his Sicilian majesty to comply with the terms they had preconcerted with the emperor. These terms are foreign to this part of our history. They were rejected at the court of Madrid; upon which the court of Great Britain fitted out a out a powerful fleet under Sir George Byng, to enforce its mediation. Sir George failed to the Mediterranean, where he secured the kingdom of Naples to the emperor, but understood by the viceroy count Dann, that that of Sicily was on the point of being entirely conquered by the Spaniards. The marquis de Lede had landed there with thirty thousand men, and the Spanish fleet still lay upon the coasts. He had reduced Palermo, and was then besieging the citadel of Messina, after taking the town; but in the mean while the emperor had come to a compromise with his Sicilian majesty, who was now willing to agree to the terms of the quadruple alliance, and to admit the imperialists into Sicily. Not to repeat too much of what we have said before, the English fleet destroyed that of Spain, off Cape Passaro, and reinforced the garriſon of Messina with some imperialists; but the citadel

b was lost. The event was, that the emperor and his Sicilian majesty, having, by this time, come to a good understanding, it was resolved, that Sicily should be reconquered from the Spaniards; and that Sardinia, with the title of king, should be given to his Sicilian majesty. This compromise was, after some difficulty, executed. His Sicilian majesty resigned that title for that of king of Sardinia, being too wise afresh to embroil the affairs of Europe, or to oppose powers for whom he was no match. This exchange being made, his Sardinian majesty applied himself entirely to propagate the arts of peace, and to prevent his being further embroiled in the affairs of Europe. In the year 1722 his son, the prince of Piedmont, married the princess of Sulzbach, who bore him a son on the 3d of March, 1723, but she herself died on the 12th of the same month. This prince was called the duke of

c Aosta. The expences of the law being very heavy on the subjects of his Sardinian majesty's dominions, he this year completed a plan upon which he had been long meditating; and that was to form a new code of jurisprudence, that was to serve as a directory to the law-courts and subjects of his dominions. It was drawn up with the greatest precision, and calculated to make all decisions in matters of law not only more cheap, but more equitable than they had been before. This code is a curious performance; and the observance of it commenced on the 16th of November, the same year. But another important care now engaged his majesty's attention. The weak health of the duke of Aosta, prevailed on him to strengthen his succession, by giving the prince of Piedmont another wife; and he accordingly, in the year 1724, married the princess Polixena of Hesse Rheinfels, a measure the more necessary, as the duke of Aosta died in the year following. After this marriage Victor Amadeus III. lived for some years in tranquility. The great talents, both in war and government, which he had discovered, rendered him highly respected amongst the other powers of Europe, and, in the subsequent broils that ensued he was equally courted by all parties at variance. But this great prince was not exempted from the infirmities of common life. He began to be tired of the tranquility he had been at so much pains to establish, chiefly through his fondness for the countess-dowager of St. Sebastian, with whom he had been for some years enamoured. And, all of a sudden, he resolved to resign his crown in favour of his eldest son the prince of Piedmont. For this purpose he convoked, in September, 1730, his prelates, his grand chancellor, his ministers of state, the heads of his courts of justice, and his chief officers, both military and civil, and, in their presence, he formally resigned his crown to the prince of Piedmont, Charles Emanuel his son, who in virtue of the quadruple alliance, became king of Sardinia, and succeeded to all his father's other dominions and titles, only reserving to himself a yearly income, some say of one hundred thousand pounds, for his support. The world is well acquainted with what happened upon this abdication. Victor retired to Chambery, and married the countess, who took upon herself the title of countess of Scimereve. But he did not know his own heart. The lady aspired to be a queen, and wakened in her husband a desire to remount his throne, which became so strong, that they tampered with some of the great men, and chief officers of the army, to assist them in their design. This was

f discovered to the reigning king, who was in no disposition to resign his newly-acquired royalty. At first, he endeavoured to dissuade his father from his resolution, but all was in vain; so that the son was obliged to employ force, and he put both his father and the countess under arrest. Victor Amadeus did not long survive his disappointment, for he died at Montcalier, the 31st of October, 1732, at the age of sixty-six years and a half.

Death,
A. D. 1732.and character of Victor Amadeus.

VICTOR AMADEUS was the most extraordinary character, and may be said to have been the most politic prince of his age. Till the finishing scene of his life he had discovered few human frailties, and many great qualities. He considered his near family connections with France as tending only to render him a precarious dependant on that crown; and he seems to have been resolved rather to give up all, than to live in that character. The emperor and the kings of Spain would have treated him in the same manner; but he studied the interests of all the powers in the great alliance with so much sagacity, that, though at variance with one another after the treaty of Utrecht, and though the many calamities his dominions had sustained, left him but little real power, yet they all agreed in not only giving him a kingdom, though an inconsiderable one, but in extending his dominions on the continent, far beyond those that had been enjoyed by the greatest of his ancestors. We are not to place the difficulties and losses he met with, during the course of a fifty years reign, to his intrigues or ambition, but to the conveniency which the three great potentates of Germany, France, and Spain, found in becoming masters of his dominions. But, after all, it was owing to the friendship and policy of Great Britain that he left his son in a respectable condition as a sovereign prince.

Is succeeded by Charles Emanuel II.

CHARLES EMANUEL II. mounted the throne under some disadvantages, through the want of good faith in the imperial court. He complained, that the emperor had no real design to make good his cessions and engagements, because he retained in his hands all the title-deeds and documents of Montferrat, with a view, as his Sardinian majesty complained, of evading the cessions he had made. Count Philip, the imperial resident at that time at the court of Turin, being pressed on this head, had recourse to many excuses (to call them no worse) which plainly shewed his master's insincerity; and the trifling delays made by his court, evinced the same. His Sardinian majesty, however, perceiving that the count was favoured by the earl of Essex, the British ambassador, durst not come to extremities; not to mention, that the great number of persons of the highest rank, whom he had been obliged to imprison on account of his father, had rendered his situation, even in his own dominions, a little suspicious. On the other hand, the marquis de Vaugrenant, who was the French ambassador at Turin, at the same time was carrying on negociations for fixing his Sardinian majesty in his master's interest. Some illicit trade which had been carried on about Avignon and Geneva, furnished the crowns of France and Sardinia with a pretext to send thither other troops. The death of the king of Poland, which happened in 1733, lighted up a war between the king of France and the emperor; and his Sardinian majesty at last concluded, on the 26th of September that year, a treaty with the courts of Versailles and Spain, whose intention was to introduce the infant Don Carlos into Italy. By this treaty, which was offensive and defensive, his Sardinian majesty obliged himself not only to grant a passage into Italy, to the troops of the two crowns, but to join them in certain cases specified by the treaty. It soon appeared that all parties were in earnest. His Sardinian majesty avowed his connexions with France, and published a manifesto, declaring, that his intention was to curb the insolent power of the house of Austria, which was now become odious to him, and to all Europe; and to maintain the ballance of power in Italy. The emperor was so far from expecting this declaration, that hearing the French were preparing to enter Savoy, he ordered count Daun to offer his Sardinian majesty, who was once his ally and vassal, all the assistance in his power to stop their progress; but the answer he received, was, that they did not come as enemies. On the 12th of October, the French troops began their march by Briançon, and the valley of Barcelonetta, headed by marshal Villars, who was to command them under the king of Sardinia; and his troops joined them in the Vigevano. We shall not, for the reason so often specified, give a particular detail of this war; but, for the sake of perspicuity, touch on the general heads. His Sardinian majesty put himself at the head of the combined troops in the Vigevano, and directed his march towards Pavia; but so weak and disorderly were the imperialists then in Italy, that that city and castle was abandoned by the German garrison; and his Sardinian majesty took possession of both. Milan followed its example: and the king sent nine thousand men to take possession of the city, and to block up the citadel. Pizzighitone, though excessively strong, was next reduced; and Cremona, with all the Cremonese, met with the same fate, about the beginning of September. All those, with many other places of importance, fell to the allies, after very little resistance; and, at last, the city of Milan capitulated likewise. Upon the conquest of the Milanese, his Sardinian majesty published an ordonnance, commanding all his vassals and subjects residing there to return home, under pain of confiscation of goods. He then returned to Turin, where, after doing some business, he came back to the army. In the mean while the French found means to pass the Oglio, and to enter the Parmesan. The queen of Sardinia, at this time, falling dangerously ill, his majesty, who tenderly loved her, again returned to Turin; by which means he was not present at the bloody battle of Parma, in which the imperialists were defeated, and their general, count Merci, was killed. After this battle the prince of Wirtemberg, though dangerously wounded, took upon him the command of the imperialists, and made his retreat good to Reggio, where their magazines, both of provision and artillery, were erected.

Villars removed by his means.

It was not in the field only, that his Sardinian majesty shewed his great genius and judgment during this war; the command of the French troops had been conferred on marshal Villars, chiefly on account of his great experience and reputation; but courage was all of the great general that was now left him, and a courage too of the most dangerous kind, because it was romantic, and led him to impracticable attempts. His Sardinian

- a Sardinian majesty perceived and felt the inconveniency of this, and managed matters at the court of France with so much dexterity, as to procure the recal of the marshal, who was now above eighty-four years of age, in such a manner as that the old general was no ways disgusted, and died at Turin upon his return. He was succeeded in his command by the marshals Broglie and Caigny, as the duke of Wurtemberg was by count Konigsegg, one of the best generals in Europe. And it was owing to the king of Sardinia, that the fortune of the war in Italy was not at this time intirely changed. The imperialists had been removed from Reggio to the plains of Carpi, and took such a position as secured Mirandola from danger. On the 15th of September he passed the Secchia by day break, and surpris'd the French marshal Broglie, that he escaped in his shirt, and two thousand of his men were cut in pieces; the
- b French, at the same time, losing a great quantity of baggage, besides a number of prisoners who were taken.

AFTER this surprize, they were forced to retire to Guastalla. And his Sardinian majesty now taking the sole command, a most bloody battle was there fought. The French being drawn up under that fortification, were attacked with the utmost intrepidity by Konigsegg, who did all that a brave general could do, to retrieve the desperate state of his master's affairs; but found himself unable, after making repeated efforts, to break the French cavalry. The battle continued for eight hours, with uncommon fury and carnage; his Sardinian majesty, all this while, exposing his person in the posts of the greatest danger. At last Konigsegg, finding all his skill and courage ineffectual, retreated towards Commands the armies of the two crowns.

- c Luzzara, leaving on the field of battle five thousand of his best troops dead, amongst whom was the brave prince of Wurtemberg, two generals, and many of his other principal officers. The loss of the French was little inferior; and the Germans repass'd the Po, and encamping on the banks of the Oglio, they prevented his Sardinian majesty from taking Mirandola. The king of Sardinia, having thus saved the armies and interest of the two crowns in Italy, continued to employ his great talents in the same cause during the rest of the campaign. The imperial court, notwithstanding its losses, was still intent on prosecuting the war; and when all Europe imagined that both armies were about to retire into winter quarters, Konigsegg's army was reinforced; so that he found himself at the head of forty thousand men, and he and count Wallis, who was joined
- d with him in the command, received express orders from their court to keep the field. This they not only did, but checked the marshal Maillebois from attacking Mirandola, and forced him to retire under the cannon of Cremona, till he should be reinforced by Don Carlos.

His success.

- THE state of Europe at this time presented every week a different face. The court of Great Britain and the Dutch were earnest for bringing about an accommodation; but all their endeavours were frustrated by the obstinacy of the court of Vienna; which induced his Britannic majesty to fit out a fleet, and the states general to make an augmentation of their land forces. His Sardinian majesty, by this time, began to have a very different opinion of the views of his allies, and left his interests entirely in the hands of Great Britain.
- e His queen died on the 13th of January, 1735, and, after performing the necessary duties to her memory, he returned to Lombardy, where he kept the imperialists in awe; so that, in a short time, they lost all the Mantuan, except the capital, which was blocked up, and in great danger of being forced to surrender for want of necessaries.

- It happened about this time that the court of England took great concern in all the affairs of the continent, and had so much influence with the emperor, on account of his
- f German connexions, that his Britannic majesty sounded the court of Vienna on the subject of peace, and found it not so intractable. The French wanted, of all things, to have the war finished, and the Spaniards had got all they pretended to. By the indefatigable endeavours of the British ministry, a congress at the Hague was at last agreed on, and all parties were to submit their differences to the arbitration of his Britannic majesty and the states general. It was now known that France had never been in earnest in settling Stanislaus on the throne of Poland, and wanted only to acquire Lorraine for themselves; that, though the emperor resented, in the highest degree, the losses he had received in Italy, yet he was accessible on one head, which was a fresh guaranty of the Pragmatic sanction. In short, the arms of the two crowns had been every where victorious in Italy, where Don Carlos had been crowned king in Sicily; and all that count Konigsegg could do, was, to preserve the Mantuan, and to make the best retreat he could through the Venetian territories, after abandoning the fortified towns of Ostiglia, Borgoforte, Goito, Castellucchio, Orbitello, and even Mirandola, which surrendered, after a brave resistance. But such was the
- g obstinacy of the court of Vienna, that those losses seem'd only to exasperate it the more, and to shew a greater disposition for continuing the war. Mean while a plan of pacification had been drawn up in England, by which his Sardinian majesty was to have three provinces in the Milanese ceded to him, and Don Carlos was to retain possession of Sicily.

Negotiations for a peace.

His acquisitions.

This

This plan being rejected by Spain, the emperor would not, and France durst not, agree to a it; so that another plan was drawn up, by which his Sardinian majesty was to have his choice of two out of three provinces in the Milanese, together with four fiefs; viz. San Fedele, Terre di Forti, Gravedo, and Campo Maggiore, and likewise the estates of Langhes. His Sardinian majesty acceded to these preliminaries on the 16th of August, 1736, and on the 5th of March, 1737, he married the princess Elizabeth Theresa, sister of the duke of Lorrain, who, by the late peace, became grand duke of Tuscany.

WE have, in the history of Parma, been so explicit both as to the springs and the progress of the war in Italy, which was finished by the peace of Aix la Chapelle, in 1748, and as to the motives which prevailed with the king of Sardinia to oppose France and Spain, that we shall here close this history. It is certain that, in the last-mentioned war, he b shewed as much firmness as his father, by persevering in his attachment to the grand alliance; and their fates, after both wars were over, were similar; for though both, in the course of them, received many severe, and seemingly fatal, blows, yet, at their conclusions, each found himself in a better condition than they had been in at their commencement. It is to the honour of the British ministry, that they saved his Sardinian majesty, in the late war, from entire destruction; and it is equally for his honour, that he persevered to fulfil all his engagements with Great Britain, with the utmost punctuality, notwithstanding the greatest offers which were made him by France and Spain, if he would abandon them. Since the peace of Aix la Chapelle his Sardinian majesty has applied himself to the arts of peace, particularly those of commerce, and for that purpose he observed c the greatest œconomy in his court, which, notwithstanding, is very splendid. He has not, however, been able yet to succeed in his great scheme of rendering his subjects a trading people, though they are at present far more so than they were twenty years ago. It is possible, some time or other, the distresses of the Genoese may enable him not only to effect that, but lay a foundation for making the crown of Sardinia a maritime power.

END of the HISTORY of SAVOY.

The HISTORY of AMERICA.

INTRODUCTION.

- a AS individuals are protected in the enjoyment of their wealth and commerce, by the power of the community; so the publick deduces equivalent advantages from the extensive trade and vast opulence of private persons. With respect to commerce, the grandeur of the state, and the happiness of its subjects, are inseparable; though some refined speculatists have endeavoured to refute an axiom that is self-evident. When mankind left their savage state, they naturally became husbandmen and artizans, which were the first steps towards becoming civilized; because the improvement of arts required the full exertion of their intellects. That policy, indeed, is narrow and violent, which aggrandizes the publick by the oppression of individuals. Every thing is purchased by labour, which, alone, is more valuable than the richest mines of gold and silver: the possession of
- b the latter hath rendered nations poor and contemptible; but never was there any instance, where affluence and felicity failed to accompany industry guided by prudence. A superfluity of labour is a real treasure to society, which may at any time be employed, like money, in the publick service. Hence arises the great advantage of foreign commerce, which, by augmenting the labour, in effect increases the grandeur of the state, and the wealth and felicity of the subjects. By its imports it furnishes the materials of industry, and by its exports it gives encouragement for working up divers commodities, not required for domestic consumption. Hence the mind acquires additional vigour, it enlarges its powers and faculties, and the spirit of improvement is pushed to every art and science. Philosophy and the art of war are best understood in those countries, where the mechanic arts have attained the greatest perfection.
- c

General reflections upon the utility of commerce,

- If we consider commerce as essential to industry, and labour necessary to the opulence and happiness of society, we cannot but regard the discovery of the vast continent of America, and the infinity of wealthy islands with which it is surrounded, as one of the most important consequences of the happy discovery of the compass, and the improvement in navigation. Without a knowledge of the West-Indies, the intercourse with the East-Indies would be of little advantage to Europe; it might even be pernicious, by draining it of the gold and silver: whereas we now purchase the commodities of the latter, not only with European manufactures, but with the silver dug in the mines of Potosi. To her possessions in Chili, Peru, Mexico, and the Antilles, Spain owes all her opulence. Great Britain hath, by means of her colonies on the continent of America, and her islands in the West-Indies, raised herself to her present astonishing and much-envied height of grandeur and importance. Portugal almost holds her existence on her possessions in Brasil: even the barren Canada hath been fruitful of blessings to France, by promoting her trade and navigation, not to speak of the benefits arising from Guadaloupe, Martinico, and Cape-Breton. The intercourse with Surinam, and the Spanish main, has brought great wealth into Holland. In a word, every nation in Europe hath made attempts to obtain some establishment in a country fraught with all these commodities, which the progress of science, of luxury, and refinement, has rendered almost essential to existence; which alone would be sufficient evidence of the utility of the discovery of the justly celebrated Columbus, could not the most
- d
- e irrefragable arguments be deduced from reason and philosophy. At this juncture, the colonies may be considered as the vitals of Great-Britain, which diffuse their spirits through all the members of the body-politic, by which it exists; they are, indeed, the living fountain whence we draw all our nourishment. The trade to these colonies is in fact a foreign commerce, carried on and conducted under the direction of the mother-country; and accordingly we find, that, in proportion as the several crowns of Europe cherish their plantations, they acquire a larger share of maritime strength, establish a more fruitful nursery of seamen, gain a more considerable fund of wealth, and promise fairest for the sovereignty of the ocean. However, to insist on the importance to Europe of the gold of Chili and Brasil, of the silver of Peru, the sugar, indigo and coffee of the Antilles, the furs of Canada, and particularly of the trade with America.

Design of the da, the fish of Newfoundland, the tobacco of Virginia and Maryland, the precious stones, a balsams, gums, drugs, dying woods, and other commodities of the islands and continent of America, would be only to repeat what has been hackneyed by every political writer of the last century. It is our province to inquire into the means of this vast discovery, to relate the history of the nations, to trace the progress of the conquest and colonization of America and the West-Indies, to lay before our readers a minute geographical description of the country, describe its productions, natural and artificial, ascertain the strict limits of each division, and the legal boundaries of the several European settlements, explain the connection of the colonies with each other, the peculiar trade carried on by each, and the general commerce of the country; in a word, to give the publick what was never before attempted, a complete political, commercial, and natural history of this fourth division of the globe, called the New World, or Western Continent, at least as far as is consistent with the nature of our design, and the limits of an Universal Modern History. b

BEFORE we enter upon voyages undertaken to this country under the patronage of the court of Spain, it will be necessary to mention, that Columbus was led to the discovery not only from a consideration of the terraqueous globe, and the relation of certain ship-wrecked modern mariners, but by the idea which several eminent writers entertained of an unknown continent to the westward. In general it was believed, that the land terminated with the Canaries or Fortunate-Islands; yet several of the most penetrating were persuaded, that an immense tract of land must lie beyond the Atlantic Ocean. In one of his dialogues ^b, Plato speaks of the island of Atlantis; and there is still extant, in the collection of Greek Poetical Fragments ^c, a description of it in verse, ascribed to Solon, who borrowed the relation from an Egyptian priest. To confess the truth, all these hints, taken from Plato and Solon, have so much the air of poetic allegory, that they cannot be considered of weight sufficient to determine, whether they absolutely entertained any idea of the western continent. The ingenious political tract left by Sir Thomas More may furnish an equally good argument to posterity, that his Eutopia alluded to some undiscovered country, of which he had a general conception. It is otherwise with respect to the testimony of Aristotle ^d, because he not only concurs with a future historian, but descends to particulars. In a book ascribed to this philosopher, we are told, that the Carthaginians discovered an island far beyond the Pillars of Hercules, large, fertile, and finely watered with navigable rivers, but uninhabited. This island was distant a few days sailing from the continent; its beauty attracted the discoverers to settle there; but the policy of Carthage dislodged the colony, and laid strict prohibition on all the subjects of the state not to attempt any future establishment. This account is confirmed by an historian of no mean credit, who relates, that the Tyrians would have planted a colony in the new discovered island, which some takes to be Hispaniola, but they were opposed by the Carthaginians for state-reasons. It was feared lest the natural advantages, which it was reported this country enjoyed, might induce too many of the citizens to desert their native soil, whereby the government would be weakened, industry checked, and the vast maritime power of the republic diminished. Besides it was urged, that this island ought to be reserved as an asylum, to which they might retire with safety, when oppressed by any change of fortune, or public calamity. A passage hath also been quoted from the third act of the Medea of Seneca (A), in confirmation of the opinion, that although America was undiscovered, the ancients had a strong notion of large countries beyond the reach of their present knowledge. In a fragment that remains of Theopompus ^e, there is an allegory of a new world, inhabited by two nations of warriors and devotees; and one of the fathers affirms ^f, that beyond the ocean there is another world: however, both Lactantius and St. Augustine ridicule this notion, and the opinion that the earth was globular: even to the days of Galileo, the Romish clergy regarded the rotation of the earth on its axis as contradictory to the sacred doctrine. Upon the whole, it is plain that the ancients dreamed something about a new world, and that they transmitted to posterity an imperfect broken account of those regions; but it is equally certain, that the general opinion was, that all the climates between the tropics were uninhabitable; a judgment built on an axiom of their absurd philosophy, that the health and preservation of the animal depended on a due mixture and just proportion of the four elements, which could not happen under the torrid zone, where fire and the emanations of the sun must absorb all a the other qualities. To recite the fabulous story of Madoc, a Welsh prince, and the tale related by William of Newbery, of two green children who were found in a field, in the reign of king Stephen, would afford the judicious reader as little amusement as instruction; we shall therefore omit these, take it for granted, that the actual discovery of the island and continent of America was made in the 15th century, and proceed to a relation of the circumstances of that important transaction (B).

b Containing a general Relation of the Voyages made by the Spaniards in search of America.

AS we have, in the course of our labours, already given a short history of the life and discoveries of Columbus, the famous Genese admiral, it will be sufficient to specify in this place such circumstances as are necessary to place in one collective point of view the complete discovery of the islands and continent of America. It was in the month of April, 1492, that Christopher Columbus, after experiencing repeated mortifications and disappointments at the courts of France, England, and Spain, was at length, under the queen's patronage, honoured with the commission of admiral to their catholic majesties, and viceroy of all the islands and continents which he should discover and acquire in the ocean. Immediately he repaired to Palos de Meguere, where a small squadron, consisting of three vessels, manned with an hundred and twenty men, was appointed to attend him, and be entirely directed by his orders. On the 3d day of August he quitted Spain, and after a tedious navigation, during which the sailors mutinied, he fell in with Guinea, one of the Lucayo islands, on the 12th of October. Finding the island well inhabited, the admiral went on shore, and with proper solemnity took possession in the name of their catholic majesties. The natives were thrown into the utmost astonishment at sight of the ships, which they took for sea-monsters, and their admiration was increased by the strange appearance of the Spaniards, who landed. They gazed with wonder at their beards, fair complexions, and cloaths; and joyfully received the trifling presents distributed by the admiral. When the Spaniards returned to their ships, the Indians swimmied after them, expressed their gratitude for the presents by signs and tokens, and seemed extremely desirous to enter into a more familiar intercourse.

Columbus discovers the Bahamas, Cuba, and Hispaniola.

AFTER calling the island St. Salvador, and learning from the natives, that the gold plates which they wore in their noses came from a large island to the southward, Columbus proceeded on his voyage, touched at several other of the Lucayo or Bahama islands, and on the 27th of October arrived at Cuba, situated between 20 and 23 degrees of north latitude, and 74 and 87 degrees of west longitude, being near 800 miles in length, and about 70 in breadth, and more at the southern extremity. Having intelligence from the natives, that all the gold came from Bobio, an island to the south-east, he pursued his voyage, after making a few general observations, and arrived at Bobio, or the land of cottages, on the 6th day of December, to which he gave the name of Hispaniola (C). He had carried some Indians from Cuba, and by means of these endeavoured to cultivate a familiarity with the inhabitants of this last discovered island; but they fled with the utmost velocity at their approach, and seemed to regard the Spaniards with equal horror and surprize: however, as he had the good fortune to take a female prisoner, whom he treated with great humanity, her report impressed a more favourable opinion of the strangers, and brought about the intercourse so much desired. At first they trembled, and started back upon touching the cloaths of the Spaniards; then they laid their hands upon their heads, in token of respect, cast their eyes up to heaven, and regarded them as divinities; a notion that was confirmed by the presents of glass-beads, and other shining glittering trinkets they received. Here Columbus was visited by the cazique, who expressed great curiosity to see the Spanish ships. His retinue consisted of two hundred men, besides his prime minister and counsellors; he was carried on a bier upon men's shoulders, though a robust young fellow, and distinguished with marks of the deepest respect and veneration. On his coming on board he behaved with the utmost dignity and solemnity, ordering all his train to keep at a distance, except two of his counsellors, who sat at his feet. He eat and drank with the admiral, had his mouth examined by his counsellors, shook his head at what Columbus ordered to be told him, that he was only the servant of the king of Leon and Castile, and believed, with the Indians of Cuba, that the Spaniards were supernatural beings. The admiral made

(B) To speculatists, and persons of more leisure, we leave the useless labour of enquiring by what means America was peopled. This subject may form an excellent disputation in the academy; but we apprehend it would be foreign to our purpose as historians.

some presents of beads, slippers, and cloaths, to the monarch, who was highly delighted a with his reception; and the sailors bartered pieces of broken glass, earthen plates, and other trifles, with the natives for gold rings, which they wore in their noses, and small plates of gold; however, it was soon known that gold was not the produce of the island, but of a country to the eastward. This was the chief object of the voyage; but though Columbus was disappointed in the expectations entertained of the value of the island, he resolved to establish a colony that might prove useful to his farther purposes. To effect this design, it was necessary to consult the inclinations of the five sovereigns, among whom the island was divided. Accordingly the admiral had an interview with king Guacanagari, exchanged presents with him, and settled a colony, built a fort, and mounted it with cannon, in order to command the more respect. The colony was composed of thirty nine Spaniards, b under the conduct of James de Avana; the fort was called Navidad, or Nativity: and Columbus, carrying with him several natives of the island, and a sufficient quantity of gold to evince the importance of his discovery, took his departure for Spain, after losing two of his ships, one of which perished by an accident, and the other was carried off by the treachery of Martin Alonso Pinçon ^h.

We shall stop to relate a few of the general observations which the admiral made on the island of Hispaniola, and the character of the natives. He found the island extremely well peopled, and filled with villages, some of them containing above a thousand houses. His civility to his female prisoner, and her report, soon raised the Spaniards high in the esteem of the Indians; they flocked to the shore, and great numbers swam, or paddled in their c canoes, to the ship. He remarked they were whiter, handsomer, and more tractable and courteous than the inhabitants of the other islands, after they had been once reconciled to the Spaniards. The men were of a middling stature, large boned, and inclinable to corpulence; their nostrils wide, and their foreheads smooth, and uncommonly high. To their nostrils were suspended small plates of gold, which created a suspicion that this metal was the produce of the island. Several of the caziques, whom the admiral visited, wore crowns of gold; and pieces of the same metal, weighing four ounces, were exchanged with the sailors for bits of tin and glass. Guacanagari had several princes tributary to him, and if he did not claim the entire sovereignty, he was at least considered as the most potent monarch on the island. The natives shewed great ingenuity, not only in their military weapons, d some of which were admirably pointed, and rivited with fish bones, but in the form and composition of their earthen pitchers, in which they supplied the shipping with fresh water. Nor was their humanity less extraordinary, as Columbus experienced, in the assistance they afforded when one of his vessels was shipwrecked. King Guacanagari made him a present of a masque, the nose, tongue, and ears of which were of beaten gold, and a girdle elegantly set with seed-pearl; and though he was upon the whole disappointed in his hopes, that Hispaniola contained gold mines, he had great reason to believe the island might become valuable to commerce, on account of the cotton, spices, and variety of drugs and timber it produced, though the value of many of these particulars was not then understood. In a word, after he had sufficiently impressed this simple people with an idea e of his friendship, by the civility of his treatment, and with due respect, by the thunder of his cannon, at the report of which they all fell flat upon their faces, he took his leave, and quitting Port Nativity on the 4th day of January 1492, arrived at Palos on the 15th of March, sending notice of his return to their catholic majesties.

The second voyage and discoveries of Columbus.

THE discoveries made by Columbus filled Spain with rejoicing and admiration. He was caressed by the king, queen, and court; the pontiff was made acquainted with the transaction, and he granted a bull, confirming the crown of Spain in an exclusive right to the West-Indies. The Indians and gold were shewn as the greatest wonders in nature, and in a short time Columbus was equipped for another voyage, with more extensive powers, and a stronger armament than the preceding. He was now made governor-general and admiral f over all the territories included in the apostolical concession; he was authorised to plant colonies, establish judicial courts, and take any other steps that circumstances might require, and tended to promote the general design of the expedition: a squadron of seventeen ships, manned with two thousand two hundred able-bodied seamen and soldiers, was appointed; mares, sheep, cows, corn, wheat, and a variety of European plants, were put on board; a chart of his discoveries and voyage was drawn and kept in the king's cabinet, and every other measure taken that could possibly insure the prosperity of the expedition: after which Columbus once more departed on the 25th of September. In this voyage he discovered Dominique, Marigalante, and Guadaloupe. His boat put to shore at the latter, which made all the inhabitants take to the mountains; however, the g Spaniards had the good fortune to seize upon two Indians, from whom they had some use-

- a ful intelligence. Among other particulars they were told, that a continent lay to the eastward, at an inconsiderable distance. Here Columbus found some pieces of spun cotton and looms, of a very peculiar and simple construction, together with a piece of a ship, which he believed must either have been driven from the Canaries, or from Hispaniola, where his ship perished in the former voyage; for he could not persuade himself that any Europeans had ever before visited those islands. Coasting along the island to the north-west, he discovered, Montserrat, afterwards Santa Maria, and Antigua. In short, he discovered, in the course of this voyage, all the islands to the south-west of Hispaniola, to which he gave the general appellation of Virgins. On his arrival at this island, he found all the Spaniards dead, and the colony entirely destroyed, owing to their own intestine divisions, and the insolence and cruelty with which they treated the natives, which produced a revolt. He visited his old friend Guacanagari, and found that prince confined to his bed by a wound he received in defence of the Spaniards, which encouraged him to settle a new colony, and build the town of Isabella. Twelve of the ships he sent back to Spain, reserving only the five largest for his own use; and after having quelled a sedition, he set out with a body of men in search of the gold mines of Cibao, the ore of which, at that time, raised great expectations.
- After this he resolved to pursue his voyage, touched at Cuba, and came in sight of Jamaica; but being forced back by stress of weather to Hispaniola, he found the colony at war with the natives, owing chiefly to their own licentiousness and barbarity. King Caunabo, one of the sovereigns of the island, had collected a prodigious army, which the Spaniards defeated with a handful of men, on account of the terror with which the horsemanship inspired the Indians; for they took the horse and the rider for one animal. To conclude, the voyage, in general, proved unfortunate, though Columbus exerted every quality of a soldier and politician; such was the factious, rapacious, licentious humour of the Spaniards, who endeavoured all in their power to rob the gallant general of the fruits and glory of so many signal actions and important discoveries. He left his brother Bartholomew Columbus in quality of lieutenant-governor, and set out for Spain, where he arrived after a voyage of three months. Repairing to court, he presented their majesties with the gold dust and ore he had brought with him, and cleared himself of all the aspersions thrown upon his character by the malevolence of his enemies. The farther account of the natives, which he gave to their majesties, was to the following effect. That all the sovereigns, or caziques, lived in palaces at some distance from their towns, where there were a number of extraordinary images made of stone or wood painted. These they called Cemis, and honoured sometimes with the particular names of their ancestors. They were worshipped by the people as titular beings; and offerings were made to some of the images for health, to others for affluence, fine weather, prosperous enterprizes, and other wishes: yet they were considered as inferior deities to the sun, which was reputed the chief, or cazique, of the divinities. Each of the sovereigns of the country was also a high priest, which added greatly to their authority, and enabled the monarchs to practise many religious impostures on the understanding of their ignorant simple subjects. Several of the caziques kept three stones, to which they ascribed extraordinary virtues: one, they alledged, promoted the fertility of the soil; another assisted women in child-bed; and the third procured either rain or sun-shine, as the occasion required. When a cazique died, he was embowelled, and dried by the fire, to preserve his body from corruption, which was then interred in a cave, with his military weapons, and store of provision. The wife, likewise, who bore him the greatest affection, was buried with him; and there could not be a more dishonourable proof of female ingratitude, than any marks of reluctance to pay this last duty to her lord and husband. In general, indeed, there appeared a strong emulation among the women for this favour and testimony of the superior regard of the deceased sovereign. A practice frequent at this day among the negroes on the continent of Africa, also prevailed among the inhabitants of Hispaniola. They strangled all the sick of whose recovery they despaired. After death they imagined they should go to a valley of vast extent, of which the caziques believed they should be sovereigns, and where all imagined they should find their parents, kindred, and friends, be blessed with beautiful women, and an eternal source of uninterrupted felicity. They had physicians among them, who pretended to effect extraordinary cures by the assistance of dæmons. Their idols they believed were immortal, and they persuaded themselves that the dead appeared to the living, which rendered them extremely fearful in the dark and alone. Almost all the men were addicted to beastiality and sodomy, which were the abhorrence of the women, and made them coy with the natives, but exceedingly libidinous with the Spaniards; and with respect to the propagation of the species, no regard was paid to any degree of consanguinity, mothers, sisters, and daughters excepted (A).

Account of the natives of Hispaniola.

(A) The Spanish historian Herrera is very explicit upon this subject. He relates, that the images are made hollow with great art; that the caziques get into the cavity, and pronounce certain words, which the people are persuaded are uttered by the stone divinity. The place allotted for departed spirits they called

WHILE Columbus was soliciting the court of Spain for the reward of his services, and a proper appointment for the prosecution of his discoveries, his brother Bartholomew struggled with a variety of misfortunes in Hispaniola. A great number of the Spaniards had mutinied, at the instigation of one Roldan, the chief Alcade or justice of the island, and engaged the governor in a war with the natives. Several battles had been fought, in which Bartholomew was generally victorious; though he must have sunk under the superiority of numbers, and the inclemency of the climate, had not two ships arrived seasonably from Spain with a reinforcement. The arrival of Columbus a third time restored peace and tranquillity, and enabled the Spaniards to pursue with vigour the plan of a new settlement and city, begun during Bartholomew's government, which was called the New Isabella, or St. Domingo, because the foundation was laid on Sunday.

Third voyage
of Columbus,
and discovery of the continent of America.

THE admiral had long solicited the court of Spain for proper assistance to proceed on a third voyage in search of the continent; at length he obtained his request, quitted port St. Lucas on the 30th of May 1498, and on the 31st of July fell in with an island which he called La Trinidad, situated near the mouth of the great river Orinoco. Here he landed to refresh his men, and received a visit from the cazique, whom he found hospitable and good-natured; that prince having, with one hand, taken a crimson velvet cap off the admiral's head, which he put upon his own, covered the admiral's, in return, with a crown of cotton, encircled with a plate of gold. Sailing from hence he discovered more land to the eastward, which he took for an island, and called it Isla Santa, though it proved the continent, and part of the province of Paria. Thus the Spaniards date the first discovery of the continent from the first day of August 1498, whereas the English claim a prior date. John Cabot, a Venetian, having obtained letters-patent from the seventh Henry, discovered Newfoundland in the month of June 1496, and continued his course along the coast of America as far as the gulph of Florida. It, therefore, any title to the possession be founded on priority or discovery, as the Spaniards alledge, the right of Great-Britain to the main land of America must be as indisputable, as that of Spain to the West-Indies.

NOT to waste time on a controversy of little consequence, at a period when the sword must determine the several pretensions of the rival powers, it is sufficient to our purpose, that the continent of America was discovered about this time; that Columbus had some intercourse with the natives; that he found the country well cultivated, populous, and adorned with villages; that he eat several European fruits, as grapes, apples, figs, and oranges; tasted a liquor greatly resembling green wine, which he imagined was expressed from the grape, and perceived that the inhabitants were not only civil, but industrious and ingenious. In their complexion they resembled the Islanders; their hair was long and flowing, their stature of the middle-size, well proportioned, and robust; and the male distinction of the sex tied up and covered, though the females went entirely naked. They were armed with bows, targets, and poisoned arrows, which they shot with great dexterity: they were not ignorant of the art of spinning and weaving cotton, some ingenious specimens of which they produced, and exchanged for bits of tin, upon which they placed an exorbitant value, calling it Turey, or heavenly, upon account of a certain pleasing subtle flavour which affected their acute olfactory nerves. Many were adorned with plate gold collars, which they alledged was the produce of the country, shewing the admiral, by signs, their method of finding this metal. Having received undoubted proofs that he had now touched

Cocayba, in the island of Saraya; these spirits were shut up in the day, but let loose at night for their recreation. When a physician attended a cazique, he was obliged to go through all the regimen he prescribed to the patient; he wrought himself up to a phrenzy, uttered some unintelligible ejaculations, and directed his discourse to an invisible spirit; whence we may infer, that priests and physicians both supported their credit chiefly by imposture. If they suspected the physician had not discharged his duty, the deceased was questioned about it, and the medical gentleman punished or acquitted, agreeable to certain answers which they supposed were uttered by the departed spirit. The ceremony previous to this extraordinary inquest was truly ridiculous. The juice of a certain herb, the pairing of the deceased's nails, and the hair of his forehead, were mixed, minced, and reduced first to a powder, and then by adding a large portion of the vegetable juice, to a draught, which was poured into the mouth and nostrils of the corpse: Upon this operation he delivered proper answers to the questions of the bystanders, and then was carried back to his former grave. When the physician happened to be accused,

he was seized by the kindred of the deceased, his arms were broke, his eyes pulled out, and the shocking operation of castration performed upon him, in the most barbarous manner. Happy is it for those sons of Esculapius, who now slaughter under protection of the law in civilized countries, that their patients are incapable of rising in judgment against their practice. Columbus was told that the natives of this island had an old prophecy, they should be subdued by men of a white complexion, whose swords should beam like the sun, and whose thunder should be terrible; to confirm which, the admiral ordered some cannon to be fired, the balls of which penetrated the wreck of the ship he had lost, to the great astonishment and utter confusion of the Indians, who now persuaded themselves that the prophecy was fulfilled. This prophecy had for ages been recorded in a song, which they sung at festivals, accompanied with the musick of an instrument made of a hollow thin piece of wood, that could be heard, when beat, at the distance of a league. This instrument was wholly consecrated to the use of the caziques (1).

a upon the continent, he carried off six of the natives, and returned to Hispaniola; discovering in his way a great variety of small islands, on each of which he bestowed names.

WHILE Columbus was employed in reducing the Spanish mutineers in Hispaniola to obedience, and establishing the infant colony upon the best footing, the merchants of Seville, excited to the enterprise by the presents of gold and pearls sent home by Columbus, solicited leave to attempt further discoveries, as private adventurers. They obtained a commission from the bishop, John Roderiques de Fonseca, charged by the court with the care of all affairs relative to the Indies, and equipped a squadron of four vessels, under the conduct of Alonso de Ojeda, assisted by John de la Cosa, a Biscayan, and Americus Vesputius, a Florentine, skilled in cosmography and navigation. On the 20th of May 1499, Alonso set sail from the coast of Spain, and after a voyage of twenty-seven days, fell in with the continent of America: but the particular place at which he first touched is not exactly ascertained, Herrera speaking only in general terms, that it was two hundred leagues to the eastward of Paria, from whence he coasted two hundred leagues more to Cape Vela. The account given by Ojeda and Vesputius of the inhabitants to the eastward, differs from what Columbus related of the natives of Paria. Their faces were broad, their complexions of a tawny red, and the activity both of men and women, in all martial exercises, altogether astonishing. They appeared to have no form of government, caziques, sovereigns, or leaders. In war, every man depended upon his own skill, strength, and courage: they animated each other; and when any affront was received, the injured party assembled his friends, laid his grievances before them, and demanded revenge. This was the occasion of all contentions among them; for they seemed to have only a very imperfect idea of property, and none of subordination. Their food was fish or flesh, served up in earthen porringers, or in half-calibashes; they were temperate in their diet, but had no stated hours for meals, that being determined solely by the degree of appetite and inclination. Their beds consisted of cotton hammocks, slung to the roofs of their houses; they were modest in their conversation with the sex, but extremely indelicate in all the evacuations, never retiring out of company upon their natural occasions. In matrimony, no stated rule, either as to consanguinity, or the number of wives, was observed; fancy determined every thing, and love seldom produced quarrels, because property was unknown, and continence on either side neither expected nor required. The women were extremely prolific, and made so little of the pangs of labour, that they bathed and washed immediately after delivery. Their houses were spacious, well built, of a conical form, and common to all, above an hundred persons living in the same habitation; notwithstanding which they frequently migrated south or north, east or west, just as inclination directed, or the heat of the climate required, leaving their houses, which had cost so much pains and labour. Indeed their effects were not burthenome, all their wealth consisting in feathers of different colours, beads made of fish bones, and a kind of green and white pebbles, with which they adorned their neck, lips, ears, and noses. Gold and pearls were despised by this simple people; commerce was unknown; the use of their wives and daughters was freely given to strangers, and the acceptance regarded as a mark of respect and friendship. The sick were carried in hammocks to the mountains, slung to a tree, and furnished with provision for a certain number of days; in which situation, if they chanced to eat and recover, they were received with great rejoicings by their friends and acquaintance. Sometimes they dipped female patients in cold water, placed them before a large fire, brought on a strong diaphoresis, and then covered them warm in bed, by which means they recovered. Phlebotomy was frequently practised in inflammatory disorders, the incision being made in the loins or calves of the legs; and emetics were used in disorders of the stomach, by holding a certain herb in their mouths, which excited vomiting. Human flesh was eat at festivals when they sacrificed their enemies; and this was the only instance in which they discovered a cruel, brutal, and barbarous disposition. As Ojeda proceeded westward on his voyage, he observed the face of the country improve, and the inhabitants more acute and lively in their genius. Their towns now exhibited a pleasing prospect. One village, in particular, extremely resembled Venice in point of situation (E). It reared itself up out of the water, the houses being built on pillars, and connected by bridges, which the inhabitants drew upon the appearance of danger. Hence it is probable, that this people were molested by some neighbouring powerful nation, which forced them upon this contrivance. Steering along the coast of Paria, the Spaniards frequently landed, and met with the kindest treatment from the natives, who returned these visits, went on board, and were highly delighted with the sails, rigging, and structure of the shipping, bringing the sailors gold and pearls in exchange for glass beads and pieces of tin, iron, and copper. In a word, after coasting a vast tract of continent, touching several islands, and procuring some valuable commodities, Ojeda steered for Hispaniola, where he arrived on the 5th of September, to the great detriment of the new colony, his turbulent humour having given birth to a fresh mutiny against Columbus. This was the issue of a voyage from which Americus Vesputius claimed to himself the honour of discovering a continent that hath ever since been called by his name, in prejudice of the prior right of the great Christopher Columbus. a

ALTHOUGH Ojeda's voyage was productive of no important discoveries, yet the pearls and gold for which he trafficked along the coasts of Cumana and Maracapaná, encouraged the inhabitants of Seville to solicit leave to make another expedition. The draught made by Columbus facilitated Ojeda's enterprize; and now the course to the West Indies being perfectly understood, nothing more was wanting than to proceed farther to the northward or southward. Peter Alonso Nino, who had accompanied the Genoese admiral when Paria was discovered, pushed a fresh attempt with all his interest, and actually obtained a commission b from the court, provided he would not come to an anchor within fifty leagues of the former discoveries; but being unable to support the expences of the expedition, he had recourse to Lewis Guerra, who agreed to equip a vessel, on condition that his brother Christopher Guerra should be appointed commander. The terms being accepted, Christopher accordingly set sail early in the year 1500, touched, contrary to his orders, on the coast of Paria, and having traded with the natives for pearls, to the amount of 150 marks, equivalent to 1200 ounces, he returned to Spain, and was accused of defrauding the king of his fifth, and the owners of great part of the cargo.

Guerra's
voyage.

Pinçon's
voyage.

It was about the same time that Vincent Tannez Pinçon, who served under Columbus in the first voyage, fitted out four vessels at his own expence, set out in quest of discoveries, and was the first who had ventured to cross the equinoctial. Pinçon ventured, if we may credit the Spanish writers, as far as the latitude of ten south the line, discovered land on the 26th of February 1500, and soon after went on shore, and took possession of part of Brasil; though it will appear in the next paragraph, that Herrera himself acknowledges the Portuguese were the first discoverers of this country. c

The Portuguese discover Brasil.

NOR to mention the voyage performed by James de Lesse, who pursued the same course with Pinçon, and was unfortunate, we shall relate the particulars of one more expedition previous to the fourth voyage undertaken by Columbus. Emanuel, king of Portugal, had equipped a squadron of thirteen sail, carrying 1200 sailors and soldiers, destined for the East-Indies, under the conduct of Peter Alvarez Cabral. This admiral quitting Lisbon on the 9th of March 1500, struck out to sea to avoid the coast of Guinea, and steered his course southward, that he might more easily turn the Cape of Good Hope, which projects a great way into the ocean. On the 24th of April he got sight of the continent of South America, which he judged to be a large island at some distance from the coast of Africa. Coasting along for some time, he ventured to send a boat on shore, and was astonished to observe the inhabitants entirely different from the Africans in features, hair, and complexion. It was found, however, impracticable to seize upon any of the Indians, who retired with great celerity to the mountains on the approach of the Portuguese; yet, as the sailors had discovered a good harbour, the admiral thought proper to come to an anchor, and called the bay Puerto Seguro. Next day he sent another boat ashore, and had the good fortune to lay hold on two of the natives, whom he cloathed, and treated kindly, and then dismissed, to make a proper report to their countrymen. The stratagem produced the desired effect. No sooner had the Indians heard the relation of the prisoners, than they crowded to the shore, singing, dancing, leaping with joy, and sounding horns of different kinds, which induced Cabral to land, and take solemn possession in the name of his Portuguese majesty. Hence we may perceive the absurdity and contradiction of Herrera's account, who is desirous of ascribing this discovery to the Spaniards, by alledging, that Pinçon took possession of part of the country south of the river of Amazons, as early as the month of February this year; and yet acknowledges in part, that the Portuguese were the first actual discoverers and possessors of Brasil. The truth is, Pinçon never produced any authentic vouchers of his having coasted further to the southward than the river of Amazons, f from whence he returned, passing along Terra Firma and Paria, and then steering directly for Hispaniola. It is indeed a matter of trifling consequence to which of the kingdoms this discovery belongs; but it is of some importance to discover the blunders into which writers of the best reputation have been seduced by prejudice, and that natural partiality which stimulates them to violate truth for the sake of augmenting the glory of their country.

THESE several voyages were performed during the residence of Columbus in Hispaniola, where he experienced a thousand mortifications, on account of the mutinous spirit of his people, and the ingratitude of the court of Spain. He had transmitted a faithful account of the different insurrections, in the new colonies, to the Catholic king; which were answered by recriminations from his officers, who charged him with tyranny, cruelty, and g avarice; with using the Spaniards as slaves, driving the Indians to despair, and secreting great part of the gold, pearls, and other valuable commodities, which came to his hands.

a As Columbus had enemies in Spain as well as the Indies, these complaints reached the royal ear, and determined the king to recal him from his government; perhaps, more from motives of policy, than justice. The vast wealth which the admiral amassed was the topic of every conversation, and the court hoped, that, by superseding him, all these riches would flow into the treasury. Accordingly, Francis Bovadilla was appointed to go over to Hispaniola, in quality of examiner into the mutual complaints, the causes of the frequent mutinies and disturbances, and judge of the conduct, not only of the private men and inferior officers, but of the admiral himself, and his brother, the lieutenant-governor. To enforce his authority, Bovadilla had the commission of governor-general, with a number of blank warrants signed by their majesties, and a letter to Columbus, ordering him and all his people to obey. He no sooner set foot on the island, than he exerted the utmost power of his authority, demanded all the royal stores, arms, and provisions, seized upon the admiral's effects, ingratiated himself with the Spaniards, by the most liberal concessions in their favour, and an eagerness to receive complaints against Columbus, and at length put the admiral and his two brothers in irons, without hearing their defence; in which situation he sent them prisoners to Spain, under the care of Alonso de Valejo; who treated Columbus with kindness, and offered to knock off his irons, which he refused, until it should be done by order of their majesties.

WHEN the ship arrived at Cadiz, and the king and queen were made acquainted with the indignity put on Columbus, to whose services they owed so many obligations, orders were immediately dispatched for his release, and 1000 ducats remitted to defray his expences to court, where he met with a favourable reception, especially from the queen, who had never withdrawn her patronage, tho' she had been persuaded to consent to his removal, and to give some credit to the malicious aspersions of his enemies. He kneeled for some time before their majesties, without being able to utter a syllable; and when he was ordered to rise, he made a pathetic speech, recapitulating his services, enumerating the hardships which he had suffered, and charging Bovadilla with the most wanton abuse of his authority, and cruel oppression: upon which their majesties resolved to supersede him; and accordingly appointed Nicholas de Obando, knight of the order of Alcantara, a person of worth and integrity, to hold the government of Hispaniola for the space of two years; to revise all the decrees passed by his predecessor, and reverse such judgments as should either appear to be unjust to individuals, or injurious to the general interest of the island. A promise also was made to the admiral, that he should have a proper appointment for undertaking a fourth expedition, which he earnestly solicited, notwithstanding his old age, infirm state of health, and the mortifications he had sustained in a long course of faithful and important services to the public. However, the execution of this promise was artfully deferred, until the report of the new governor should arrive, when their majesties would be better able to judge of the degree of confidence which they ought to place in Columbus.

IN the mean time, the daily reports of the immense wealth of America, and the West-Indies, that were propagated, raised the ambition and avarice of other adventurers; especially of one Bastidas, a man conversant in business, well skilled in geography, of a bold spirit, great integrity, and considerable fortune. Bastidas, having obtained a licence, entered into engagements with one La Cosa, who had served under Columbus, and acquired the reputation of the best mariner in Spain, equipped a ship, and set sail from the port of Cadiz, in the beginning of January 1501, steering the same direction held by Columbus, when he discovered the continent. On his arrival, after a prosperous voyage, on the American coast, he touched at all the good harbours, trafficked with the natives, whom he found extremely ready to enter upon the most intimate correspondence. When he reached Venezuela, he coasted westward, and passed in sight of that shore now called Santa Maria, as far as the bay of Uraba; keeping on his course, until he arrived at port Del Retrete, where afterwards was built the town of Nombre De Dios. Thus Bastidas discovered about an hundred leagues of the continent, and more than any preceding adventurer; after which he sailed directly for Hispaniola, with a considerable cargo of pearls and gold.

Bastidas's voyage.

THE same motives which induced Bastidas to this undertaking, stimulated Alonso de Ojeda to a second attempt towards a more perfect discovery of the continent. He was accompanied in this voyage by the same Americus Vespucius, who claimed the honour of having discovered America in his former expedition, and still persisted in arrogating to himself the merit certainly due to Columbus (E). They kept the same course held by Bastidas,

Second voyage by Ojeda and Americus Vespucius

(E) It is obvious, that all the Spanish writers express a strong spirit of rancour against Americus Vespucius; not because he disputed the discovery with Columbus, who was himself a foreigner, but because he deserted Spain, and entered into the service of the king of Portugal, on whose account he made two more voyages to the New World, as it was then called. Ame-

ricus had great address, his voyages were the first ever published on this subject, and the plausibility of his narrative strongly prejudiced mankind in his favour; notwithstanding it appears from our relation, and the dates of the several voyages, that he can with no truth dispute the discovery with Columbus.

coasted along the same shores, but were less fortunate; as the voyage was neither productive of wealth nor discoveries; though it furnished the artful Vesputius with the means of gaining more credit to his pretensions, by confounding the particulars of both his voyages^b.

Fourth voyage
of Columbus.

At last, after various delays, four ships were provided for Columbus, to undertake his fourth expedition; and he set sail from the coast of Spain on the ninth of May 1502, arriving at Hispaniola on the 29th of June; where he predicted a storm that proved fatal to great part of the Spanish fleet homeward-bound, and to the admiral's two greatest enemies, Bovadilla and Roldan, before-mentioned. Quitting this island on the 14th of July, he held his course along the south side of Jamaica, until he made the small island of Guanaja; which he found well inhabited, as well as several lesser islands in its neighbourhood. These stood in the entrance to the Bay of Honduras, at the distance of twelve leagues from the cape of that name. Here he was visited by a great number of the natives of the continent, in a canoe of vast length, eight feet wide, and constructed with great art, and more ingenuity than he had ever before discovered. After mutual civilities, and the exchange of a few commodities, the admiral dismissed the Indians, detaining only one elderly man, to give him an account of the continent, and serve as an interpreter with the natives. Upon the information given by the old Indian, he steered eastward, trading as he went along, and making his observations on the people and country. All the Indians upon this coast were civil and pacific; they furnished the Spaniards with abundance of provisions, and exchanged gold, and other commodities, with great eagerness, for the glittering baubles offered by the admiral. Some went entirely naked, others covered the pudenda, and a few wore short cotton jackets without sleeves, manufactured in a manner that evinced they understood the use of the loom. The figures of different animals were impressed on their bodies by the actual cautery; and persons of the greatest distinction among them wore pieces of cotton cloth, of various colours, wrapped round the head. On festivals, and extraordinary occasions, some painted their faces black, others red, but the greater number streaked, or chequered, with different tints, which they regarded as the standard of elegance and beauty. Columbus called this coast Oreja, because many of the natives had ears of an extraordinary length, pierced with holes above an inch wide. Nor to dwell upon minute circumstances, a great resemblance was found among the inhabitants of this whole coast, as he advanced; though sometimes they differed in the manner of dressing their hair, in particular ornaments, and certain customs, which it would scarce be worth while to describe and distinguish. We shall only take notice in general, that the more he advanced eastward, the more rich were their ornaments; and as he approached Porto-Bello, the inhabitants wore necklaces, to which were suspended eagles of pure gold, of considerable weight, which they bartered without hesitation for glasses, beads, and hawk's-bells (F). By the 17th of September he came to the little island Quiribiri, opposite to the coast of Arcari. On this side of the continent he landed, and found the people very little different from those we have described, only more warlike, being armed with bows, arrows, and swords, made of hard wood. From thence he proceeded to the bay of Caravaro, where the inhabitants flocked about the ships, offering large plates and eagles of gold, that hung by their necks, in exchange for European commodities. One of these plates, weighing ten ducats, was purchased at the small price of three hawk's-bells. Here the Spaniards procured great quantities of the precious metal, and were given to understand, they might fill their ships with it by venturing two days land journey. Having finished all his commercial business, Columbus proceeded to Aburena; and upon his approaching the shore, the Indians presented themselves in a hostile manner; but giving them to understand by signs, that his intention was friendly, they brought him abundance of gold in plates and eagles, some of which weighed twenty-two ounces. From thence he proceeded to Catiba, where he purchased seven ounces of gold in plates, for three dozen hawk's-bells; sailing along the coast, for fifty leagues, to the town called Ca-biga, and from thence to a fine harbour, to which he gave the name of Porto-Bello, on account of its beauty and convenience. This he quitted on the 9th of November, and discovered to the eastward several small islands, to which he gave the name of Bastimentos, because they supplied him plentifully with provisions. Strong north-east winds obstructing his course, he steered, on the 5th of December, to the westward, upon information

(F) Their method of burying the dead was different from what had hitherto been observed. In their houses they had tombs, in which were laid the dead bodies, dried, preserved, and wrapped in cotton cloths, over which were laid boards covered with the figures of beasts, and the image of the deceased. Many of these tombs were adorned with pieces of gold, and the most valuable effects of the country. Herrera. dec. i. lib. iv. f. iv.

- a that there were gold mines in the province of Veragua; in his voyage to which he encountered such tempestuous weather, and so many disappointments, that he called this part of the country La Costa de los contrarios, or The Coast of Opposition. On the 6th of January he entered the river Yibra, which the admiral called Belen, or Bethlehem; and discovered another river called Veragua, at an inconsiderable distance. His boats went up the former to a town, where the Spaniards were informed, that Veragua abounded with gold mines. A trade was carried on with the natives, and great quantity of this metal purchased for toys of no value. The admiral was visited by one of the caziques, who brought him some gold, and conducted the Spaniards to the mines of Urira, where they gathered several pieces of almost pure gold round the roots of trees, without digging.
- b From Urira the admiral's brother advanced with thirty men up the country to Zabraba, an Indian town, surrounded with fields, six leagues in extent, sown with Indian wheat. Thence he proceeded to Catiba, where he was hospitably entertained by the natives, who supplied him with several plates of gold, some weighing ten crowns, in exchange for those baubles, upon which they put so high a value. It was the abundance of the precious metal which this country afforded, that suggested to Columbus the idea of settling a colony on the river Bethlehem, and of leaving his brother, with some other Spaniards, in the country, until he could return with more numerous forces. Accordingly Bartholomew, with eighty men, consented to remain, and immediately set about building a small fort and town in the most commodious situation, which was the first colony ever established on the continent.
- c The utility of this project was manifest; but it met with such obstruction in the execution, that after great progress had been made, Columbus was forced to receive the colonists on board, to save them from the vengeance of the cazique Quibia, with whom they had some difference. Being thus disappointed in his principal object, that of founding a colony upon the continent, and being greatly reduced in ship-provision, he determined to make the best of his way to Hispaniola, and coasting eastward towards Porto-Bello, he touched upon the province situated opposite to three islands, called Las Barbas, then at Tortuga, and the Caymanes, and taking his course directly for Cuba, landed upon that island, and proceeded for Jamaica; which particulars we mention, to evince that Columbus, in his different voyages, was the actual discoverer of all the great islands
- d of the Antilles, and indeed of almost every island in the West-Indies. He found Jamaica extremely populous, abounding with animal and vegetable provision, and the inhabitants not only very obliging, but extremely desirous of trafficking. During his residence here, he combated difficulties which would have thrown in despair any other person less firm in adversity than Columbus. After spending twenty years in the service of the crown of Spain, and other European powers, and making discoveries which will eternize his memory, he was now reduced to the melancholy prospect of spending the remainder of his declining life among savages. His ships were stranded on the coast of Jamaica; the hope of procuring relief from Hispaniola was extremely precarious, upon account of the distance, the roughness of the sea, and the extreme slenderness of the Indian canoes, which
- e were the only vehicles or means to transmit the account of his situation to Obando, governor of the new colony; besides, great part of his crew deserted, and not only threatened his life, but raised disturbances among the natives, which exposed him to perpetual danger, over all which he triumphed by his prudence, perseverance, and valour, arriving first at Hispaniola, and then in Spain, where he found his royal patroness was dead, and his services coldly received by the court. Columbus, chagrined and disgusted, retired to Valadolid, breathed his last, and received those honours after death which were denied while he was living (G).

(G) As the reader hath already seen an abstract of the life of this celebrated discoverer, in our fourth volume, we have here touched only upon those circumstances of his voyages which are absolutely necessary to our present subject. We have seen the progressive discoveries of the islands and continent of America during the life-time of Columbus; and it may not be improper to subjoin a short account of the state of the settlement in Hispaniola at this period, and of those difficulties which the admiral encountered while he resided in Jamaica. When the admiral was sent back in irons, after his third voyage, he presented so spirited a charge against Bovadilla, the new governor, who had not only superseded him in his authority, loaded him with chains, and robbed him of all his effects, but pardoned, promoted, and countenanced all the seditious who had occasioned so many disturbances in Hispaniola, that their majesties resolved to recal him, assigning the government to Obando. This gentleman acted with more integrity; he soon perceived that Columbus had been injuriously treated, and the colony greatly prejudiced by the arbitrary proceedings of Bovadilla, whom he now sent on board the fleet bound for Spain, there to answer for his conduct. All his endeavours, however, could not curb the mutinous spirit and licentious humour which had so long been indulged in the colonists. They not only disobeyed their governor, and threw off all restraint, but massacred, enslaved, and plundered the natives with the utmost barbarity. Amacaona, a lady of great authority, was cruelly murdered; several of the caziques were burnt in one of the chief Indian towns, as they were preparing an entertainment for the Spaniards; Calubananamo, the principal cazique in the island, was taken prisoner, and hanged, by order of the governor; and other violences, and acts of the most ruinous consequences,

Settlement on Puerto Rico.

BESIDES the voyage performed by Sebastian Cabot to the northward, other mariners had made some discoveries under the same parallels; particularly Gaspar de Cortoreal, a Portuguese, and Jacques Cartier, a Frenchman, in the life-time of Columbus. We shall, however, defer the recital of these, until we come to describe the northern provinces of America, to prevent interrupting the narrative of the Spanish discoveries, conquest, and settlements, fraught with the most important and interesting events, which the history of this new world affords. The first colony established after the death of Columbus, was in the island of St. John de Puerto Rico, called Borriquen by the Indians, distant about fourteen leagues from Hispaniola. Ponce de Leon had learned from the Indians, that it abounded in gold; he desired leave from Obando to visit the island, obtained his request, was hospitably received by the inhabitants, and shewn two mines extremely rich in the precious metal. Obando being superseded in the government of Hispaniola, and don James Columbus put in possession of the grants made to his father, the colonization of Puerto Rico was dequences, were daily committed, which obliged the natives to desert the island, fly to their canoes, and take shelter in the island of Guanabo, at the distance of eight leagues from Hispaniola.

SUCH was the state of affairs while Columbus was detained in Jamaica, for want of vessels to transport his people and effects to the new colony. Here the admiral struggled with such manifold difficulties, as must have weighed down a soul less elevated and inured to hardship and adversity. It was no easy matter to find persons, daring and intrepid enough, to undertake a voyage to Hispaniola in canoes; however, Columbus had the good fortune to prevail on Mendez de Secura, and Bartholomew Fiepo, to risque their lives for the recovery of liberty. They set out, attended by six Spaniards and ten Indians to row, and arrived in ten days at Hispaniola, after sustaining incredible fatigue. They delivered their dispatches, and represented the admiral's situation to Obando; who promised them assistance, but was extremely dilatory in the execution. The Spaniards, under Columbus, grew impatient of delay, discontented and mutinous. Francis de Porras, one of his chief officers, put himself at the head of the mutineers, threw off all obedience to the admiral, seized upon all the canoes, with intention of transporting themselves to Hispaniola, and leaving him behind; but were frustrated in their design through cowardice, ignorance, and tempestuous temper. A few remained faithful to Columbus; but the Indians perceiving the Spaniards divided among themselves, thought to profit by this happy opportunity, of ridding themselves of the strangers, whom they greatly dreaded. They refused to supply him with provision in exchange for his commodities; but Columbus soon gained their veneration and esteem by a stratagem. He predicted an eclipse of the moon, which he told the Indians, denoted the anger of the gods at their inhospitality; which raised such terrible apprehensions in them of the punishment which should follow, that they returned loaded with presents to the admiral, beseeching him to pardon them, and deprecate the wrath of heaven. He pretended to comply with their request; and as a proof of his intercession, he bade the Indians observe how the moon would gradually return to her former colour, an appearance which inspired them with great veneration for the God of the Christians, and determined them to side with the admiral against the mutineers. They supplied him plentifully with every necessary which the island afforded, and were instrumental in the victory gained over the mutineers, their reduction, and the imprisonment of Porras, taken in the field of battle by the admiral's brother. It was soon after that Columbus set out for His- paniola, on the return of Mendez, with a ship and cavel, which he had purchased at St. Domingo, without any assistance from the governor.

To prevent interrupting the ensuing narrative, it may be proper to mention, that several laws were now issued for the spiritual and temporal government of Hispaniola, the only colony yet established in the West Indies. The profits arising from the gold and other commodities of the island, proved so considerable, that the Spanish ministry were sensible the colony could not be too much indulged and cherished, though the proper means were often mistaken. The product in gold only amounted at this time to 460,000 pesos, which was sufficient to excite hopes of greater profits, when the method of purifying and refining was better understood, and the colony better regulated. Accordingly, a variety of civil ordonnances passed, an India-house was established at Seville, and a bull obtained from the pontiff, for erecting an archbishoprick, bishoprick, deaconries, and other spiritual dignities, in Hispaniola, and whatever other parts of the Indies the Spaniards should think fit to colonize. For the support of the clergy, all the tithes and first-fruits were established, excepting those of gold, silver, copper, precious stones, and pearls, each of which were the produce of Hispaniola, or the adjacent islands. A school was also established for the instruction of the natives, and the clergy desired to exert their utmost endeavours in propagating christianity. Several persons, skilled in navigation, were employed in drawing charts of the islands and continent hitherto known, and for laying down schemes for further discoveries, especially to the southward. Great numbers of people were brought from the Lucayos to Hispaniola, to supply the room of those who had deserted the island, upon account of the severity of the Spanish government: and don James, son of Columbus, solicited the king to be restored to all his rights and privileges, in consequence of the grants made to that admiral, or to sue for them by a legal process. This was granted; don James entered his plea, claimed to be admiral of the Indies, with the same privileges as the admiral of Castile enjoyed within his jurisdiction; to enjoy the tenths of all the gold, silver, pearls, and other valuable productions of that country, and an eighth of all the profits arising to the crown, together with a variety of other immunities, specified in the grant to his father. The affair was debated, and a verdict given for don James and his heirs, with this restriction, that all business should be transacted in the king's name. Vid. Herrera, D. i. l. vii. f. vii. & l. viii. f. i. ii. iii. & iv.

ferred,

a feared, until the return of the former to Spain; at which time, Ponce de Leon was appointed governor of this island, independent of the new admiral's authority, with full powers to build towns and plant colonies, in the manner he should think most convenient and advantageous to his own and the general interest. Accompanied by two hundred Spaniards, and a great number of Indians, Ponce de Leon set sail for his government; built a town called Caparra, and afterwards Soto Mayor, and distributed all the natives in tribes among the Spaniards, to dig and search for gold, plant cotton, and cultivate the earth. This subjection proved irksome to the Indians, and laid the foundation of a general revolt; which, after much bloodshed, was suppressed by the valour of Leon and the Spaniards, and the fidelity of a number of large dogs, with which they were attended. Of these dogs, several, almost incredible, stories are related. Herrera affirms, that they were more formidable to the Indians than the bravest Spaniard; and of one particular dog he asserts, that he could distinguish whether an Indian was well or ill disposed towards his master, and that in regard to his signal services, he had a certain proportion of all the plunder which his master received.

ABOUT the close of the year 1507, Alonso de Ojeda, and James de Nicuesa, entered upon articles with the court, to plant and colonize a part of the continent of America. To the former was assigned all the territories extending from Cape de la Vela, to the middle of the Bay of Uraba, beyond Cartagena; and to the latter, from the middle of the same inlet to Cape Gracias a Dios. The first of these grants being made by the name of New Andalusia; the other, by that of Castella del Oro; though this name be now transferred to the interior parts of Terra Firma, and the large province called New Granada. The island of Jamaica was also annexed to these governments, which don James could not but regard as a violation of his right, an incroachment on the grants made to Columbus, and an aggravation of the affront he already sustained in rendering Puerto Rico independent of his jurisdiction. Young Columbus had formed powerful connexions by marrying a niece of the duke d' Alva: he had obtained a verdict in the regular course of law, but the king delayed the execution; and it was entirely through the interest of the Alva family, that he was now appointed admiral and governor, with the same limited powers as the two last governors; an employment, however, which he accepted, even under these unjust restrictions. He was empowered by the king to furnish all possible assistance to the intended establishment of colonies on the continent, and to encourage every plausible scheme that should be projected, for the colonization either of the main-land or the islands. The establishment of a colony on the little island of Cubaqua, called The island of pearls, was especially recommended, as the ministry entertained the most sanguine hopes of a profitable fishery in pearls upon this coast, as soon as proper restrictions were laid, and the frauds, now committed by the Indians, prevented: nor were the hopes of the court disappointed, for the king's fifth of this fishery soon exceeded fifteen thousand ducats yearly.

Voyages of Ojeda and Nicuesa to the continent.

Don James no sooner reached his new government, than, forgetting the king's instructions, he consulted only the dictates of resentment, and gave all possible obstruction to the expeditions preparing by Ojeda and Nicuesa; who likewise differed about the limits of their governments and several jurisdictions. This dispute was accommodated, all the difficulties thrown in the way by young Columbus were removed, and the two adventurers set sail from Hispaniola for the continent; Francis Pizarro, afterwards so celebrated, serving under Ojeda. When Ojeda arrived at Cartagena, the natives were in arms, resolving to dispute his landing, because they had been insulted by Christopher Guerra, and some other Spaniards, who had lately touched upon their coasts, under pretence of trafficking. Every method was practised to soothe their resentment, and to convince them, that the intention of the Spaniards was for their mutual advantage; but all endeavours proving fruitless, the governor determined to try the effects of arms, fell upon the Indians, and defeated them with considerable slaughter, and booty in gold and prisoners. This advantage had almost proved fatal to the Spaniards; they marched up to a little town four leagues from the sea, and finding the Indians had retreated to the mountains, they dispersed themselves carelessly in small parties, in quest of gold and plunder; in which situation they were attacked by the enemy, who wounded and killed them with vast flights of poisoned arrows. The inhabitants of Yarbaco fell upon Ojeda and the small party with him; he maintained the fight for a long time against a multitude of Indians, kneeling upon the ground, covering himself with his target, and making dreadful havock with his sword; but at length perceiving that almost all his men were killed, he made a furious effort, pushed through the thickest of the enemy, and directed his course to the sea, in hopes of reaching the shipping. Seventy Spaniards were slain upon this occasion, and among the rest John de la Cosa, who supported the expence of the expedition, fitted out the fleet, and now died fighting valiantly, after his body had been covered with arrows, and swollen to a monstrous size with the malignity of the poison. The long stay made by this party created uneasiness a on board the ships, and several boats were sent out to gain intelligence, and search along the coast, where they found Ojeda hiding himself in a tree, faint, exhausted, and emaciated, with fatigue and hunger.

In this situation were the Spanish affairs when Nicuesa arrived, and not only forgave the injuries he had received from Ojeda, upon the recital of his misfortunes, but generously offered him all the assistance in his power, put himself under his direction, until he had revenged the death of his companions, and embraced him with great cordiality, saying, that it would be unmanly to add to the afflictions of the unfortunate, and unworthy of a good citizen to gratify private resentment at the expence of the public service. The two b governors accordingly put themselves at the head of a party of four hundred men, marched by night to Yrbaco, attacked the Indians unprepared, set fire to the town, burnt and massacred the inhabitants, without distinction of age or sex; and after having cruelly satiated their revenge, returned to their ships with an immense booty in gold; the share of Nicuesa's party alone amounting to seven thousand castellanos.

St. Sebastian
built in the bay of Uraba.

AFTER this transaction the two commanders separated, Ojeda steering for Uraba and the river of Darien, which he had been informed by the Indians produced great quantities of the precious metal. Not being able to find the river, he built a fort, which he called St. Sebastian, upon a hilly ground, to defend his people against the attacks of the natives; several houses were erected in the neighbourhood, and thus was laid the foundation of the second town erected by the Spaniards on the continent, Columbus having before c endeavoured to establish a colony in Veragua. Observing that the Indians were warlike, and little disposed to admit foreigners among them, he dispatched a vessel to Hispaniola, with the prisoners and gold he had taken, to procure in exchange a reinforcement of men, arms, and provisions. This supply was absolutely necessary; but Ojeda exposed himself to great dangers by parting with such a number of them as were necessary to work the vessel, and secure the prisoners. The Indians of this district were the most sagacious and alert at their weapons of any they had seen hitherto. They shot their poisoned arrows d with such force as pierced the thickest armour, unless it was well lined with cotton; besides they used their wooden swords with great address; hit so exactly, and threw their darts with such violence as really rendered them very formidable enemies. They had no temples for public worship; but we are told they prayed to the devil, because to him they ascribed the power of doing mischief. The credulous Spaniards even alledged, that he frequently appeared to them in different hideous forms; a relation which they probably believed upon the credit of the Indians. From this being they pretended to receive information, that the dead should be transported into another country; for which reason, the moment a corpse was deposited in the grave, large store of provision was likewise buried to supply the dead in the voyage; and if the deceased happened to be a male, his arms and military weapons were laid by him for his defence. Thus we see that the Indians in general entertained a crude wild idea of immortality and a future state. The Indians of Uraba, besides their skill in war, had also made the greatest progress in the e arts of civil life of any savage nation which the Spaniards had as yet beheld. Their houses were neat, and commodiously divided into different apartments; their beds were cotton hammocks slung to the roof; and though they went naked upon account of the heat of the climate, they were no strangers to weaving and spinning, as appeared by several ingenious specimens of piece goods. The small organs of generation were contained in cases of pure gold, or of ivory, while the women covered those parts which modesty requires should be concealed, with fine cotton cloths, wrapped round the loins, and flowing down to the feet. They also wore bracelets, beads, and other ornaments round their arms and necks; and all the women valued themselves upon their beauty, cleanliness, and the smoothness of their hair. The poison used upon their arrows was an animal and f vegetable mixture formed into a paste, of different degrees of malignity, according to the number of ingredients used; so that the Indians alledged they could kill with their poison within any limited time, two, three, five, to fourteen days. Their antidotes were the actual cautery, sea-water, and the excrements of the wounded person, applied fresh to the sore; to which they ascribed extraordinary virtues; and it appears that Alonso de Ojeda cured himself by fire, and by the use of actual cautery, in the most resolute manner, plates of ignited iron being applied not only to the wounds, but to all the adjacent parts. It is likewise reported that many of the Spaniards wounded by these poisoned arrows grew suddenly delirious, and died raving, without any feverish symptoms.

THE new colony had not been long established before Ojeda and his people were reduced to great extremities. At first they made some fortunate incursions into the neighbouring territories; but the Indians daily increasing in numbers, and in courage, cooped g them a them at length within the fort, where they almost perished with famine. Happily for them a vessel arrived from Hispaniola, with seventy men, who had escaped the rage of their creditors, and determined to settle on the continent. Ojeda welcomed them as his guardian angels, brought them provisions, and having strengthened the colony, he resolved to sail for further supplies to Martinico, promising to return in fifty days, and allowing his people, in case he failed, to dispose of themselves as they should think proper. This voyage proved exceedingly unfortunate. Ojeda, after suffering the utmost distress for want of provisions, was thrown upon the coast of Cuba, where he was forced to fight his way through the natives to gain the east side of the island, that he might be nearer Hispaniola. His men dropped every day through fatigue and hunger; they traversed vast morasses and forests, living upon such herbs and roots as they met with; half his companions perished; and Ojeda, with a few more, arrived at an Indian town called Cuyba, where they fell down through faintness as if they had been dead, which so much excited the humanity of the Indians, that they treated them with the utmost civility and kindness, bringing them abundance of the best provision the country afforded, and furnishing them with a canoe and rowers to send intelligence by one of their number, to the Spaniards in Jamaica, in which island a colony had been settled under the conduct of John de Esquivel. Young Columbus made this establishment to preserve his right to the island against the encroachments of Ojeda and Nicuesa, who had the jurisdiction of Jamaica included in their late grant from the crown; and the dispute had come to such a height before these adventurers began their last expedition, that Ojeda threatened to put Esquivel to death, if he presumed settling in the island; notwithstanding which the generous Esquivel was no sooner made acquainted with his misfortunes, than he exerted himself for his safety, and by the humanity of his conduct secured the perpetual friendship of Ojeda. He sent a vessel to Cuba, brought him and his companions safe to Jamaica, and transported them to Hispaniola, where Ojeda died before the means of relieving the colony of Uraba were put in execution.

Such were the distresses of Ojeda and his little colony; nor were those of Nicuesa inferior. When the two commanders parted company, James Nicuesa, in a caravel, attended by a brigantine, under the conduct of Lopez Olano, held his course along the shore, in quest of Veragua, ordering the larger ships to keep out to sea for the greater security. This opportunity the treacherous Olano seized of gratifying his ambition, and gaining the supreme command. Instead of keeping close in company with the caravel, he lost sight entirely, and then holding out to sea for the other ships, gave them to understand that Nicuesa was ship-wrecked, and that the chief direction of the expedition belonged now to himself, as lieutenant. As no suspicion was entertained of the truth of this relation, the sailors and officers willingly yielded obedience, and by Olano's order steered for the river Bethlehem, where he proposed settling a colony, though the spot had formerly been unfortunate to a similar attempt. The ships being left upon the coast, the lieutenant with the whole crew entered the river in boats, Olano contriving this stratagem, as was imagined, to secure the river to himself, and prevent meeting again with Nicuesa. His intention was to settle in the country, but he found it might be difficult to prevail upon his people, while the ships remained; they were therefore left in a careless manner, in expectation of their perishing in some hard gale, flood, or other accident. Scarce had the boats advanced a few leagues in the river, when one was overturned, and fourteen men were drowned, which made the sailors so clamorous in the other boats, that Olano was compelled to return to the ships, but without abandoning his design. He had left some men up the river, promising to give them speedy supply of necessaries, and with the brigantines he entered the river Veragua, where he ordered strict search to be made for gold; but the men concealing the gold, lest their officer should think of settling here, obliged him to return to Bethlehem, where he found the little colony greatly reduced in number, ready to perish with hunger, pestered with gnats and mosquitoes, and in the most sickly condition from the moist heat of the atmosphere, and the unwholesomeness of the climate. It was observed that the sick always yielded their last breath at the tide of ebb, and that the bodies of those who were buried in the sand, were as perfectly consumed in the space of eight days, as if they had been fifty years deposited in any European soil; from whence the Spaniards drew dreadful prognostics. As the ship provision was entirely exhausted, the arrival of Nicuesa furnished no relief to the colony, unless consolation was drawn from seeing the number of the wretched multiplied. We may judge of the distress of the whole from a single instance. A mare happened to foal soon after Olano's arrival, and all the Spaniards flew like hungry wolves, and devoured the young animal, and even the placenta, which they regarded as the highest luxury, having for several weeks tasted nothing besides roots and other vegetables.

Nicuesa's expedition.
A. D. 1509.

NOR was the situation of Nicuesa less deplorable. He sailed up the river with the caravel, and was shipwrecked, not a morsel of the provision being saved. As this accident happened in the night, many of the crew were thrown ashore barefooted and naked, in which condition they travelled over bogs, marshes, mountains, rocks, and through forests, feeding upon vegetables, without knowing upon which side Veragua lay, for which they were searching. They likewise found they were beset by Indians, Nicuesa's favourite servant being killed by an arrow. At last, in course of their wandering, they were shut up by the floods in a desert island, which afforded nothing besides a few roots and shell fish. There they spent near three months in the most piteous situation; their repeated attempts to cross upon floats to the opposite shore being all frustrated. Many were reduced to such a state of debility, that they crawled about upon their hands and feet, in quest of those unwholesome vegetables with which they were forced to gratify the cravings of appetite. Happily however for those who survived their hardships, they owed their preservation to the treachery of four sailors, to whom they ascribed all their calamities. They had run away with the boat, when the caravel was lost, and by mere accident lighted upon the place where Olano, with his unfortunate associates, had established a kind of colony. Whether adversity had softened Olano's heart, or that he was afraid of the rebellion of the colony, if he refused sending relief to Nicuesa, who was known to be living, by the relation of the sailors, certain it is that he sent a brigantine for him, with palmetos, and such other provisions as his wretched situation would afford, which arrived as that commander, and the remains of his crew, were reduced to the last extremity. Their joy on sight of the vessel was inexpressible; but Nicuesa prudently restrained it, and moderated their appetite for devouring the palmetos, which might have proved fatal in their faint exhausted condition. When Nicuesa joined the wretched settlement at Betlehem, he demonstrated that his spirit was not broke with adversity, and that he now owed the preservation of his life to the seasonable assistance furnished by his lieutenant Olano; yet justice and discipline required he should be punished for his rash ambition, which not only destroyed the intention of the expedition, but proved fatal to the lives of many, and hazarded the safety of all the adventurers. Without form of trial, he ordered him to be loaded with irons; nor would he hear of his release, until he was forced to yield to the intercession of the whole colony.

NICUESSA perceiving that no hope remained of rendering the colony useful in the spot which Olano had chosen, he re-embarked, with design to return to Hispaniola; but want of provision obliged him to put ashore a few leagues above Porto Bello, where he resolved to make a settlement, saying, Let us stay here en nombre de Dios, in the name of God. Immediately he fell to work in erecting a fort, which took the name of Nombre de Dios, to protect them against the natives, in which he failed, his people being in a short time reduced from 780 to 100 men, through fatigue, famine, and the unwholesomeness of the climate.

A. D. 1510.

IT will be now necessary we should return to the settlement at Uraba, which Ojeda left behind, in order that we may clearly understand the fate of the colony at Nombre de Dios.— When the fifty days, which Ojeda had fixed for his return, were expired, all hopes of relief vanished, and the wretched Spaniards gave themselves up to despair. Two small vessels only remained, and these were insufficient to transport their whole number, amounting to sixty men, to any other country, though they were reduced to the most deplorable situation that imagination can figure. After mature deliberation, it was resolved in a general council not to separate, but patiently to wait the decrees of heaven, or until their number should be so much diminished, by sickness, want, and the arrows of the Indians, that the vessels could transport all the survivors; a period which was not very remote. The Spaniards died so fast, that only hands enough remained to work the two vessels. Accordingly they embarked, laying in all the stock of provision they could, which consisted of four mares they killed and salted, and some palmetoes. Francis Pizarro, afterwards so celebrated, who was appointed his substitute by Ojeda, commanded the largest, and had the good fortune to join the Batchelor Enciso, just arrived in the bay of Carthagena, with a ship and brigantine, an hundred and fifty men, good store of live stock, and other provision, destined for the relief of Ojeda's colony at Uraba, in consequence of a contract with that gentleman, a little before his death. The other vessel was commanded by Valenzuela, and perished at sea. Pizarro used his utmost endeavours to prevail on Enciso to steer for Veragua, and join Nicuesa; but the Batchelor was obstinate in executing his engagements literally; however, as he entered the bay, his ship foundered, and himself with the crew were saved with great difficulty by the brigantines, all the provisions on board being entirely lost. Enciso nevertheless insisted upon landing; but he was so roughly handled by the Indians, and the country offered so little encouragement, that he was persuaded by Nunz de Balboa to sail for the river Darien, which he remembered since the voyage

- a voyage he performed with Bastidas. Balboa described a pleasant town upon the banks of this river, abounding with provision, which proved a strong inducement to the half-famished Spaniards; his advice was followed; and upon their arrival every thing corresponded with his account; it however required the force of arms to gain possession of this land of promise, the cazique, with five hundred men, being in readiness to oppose the Spaniards. A battle accordingly ensued; the Indians were routed, and the town was the reward of the conquerors, who, besides a quantity of provision, and several pieces of manufactured cotton, got a booty of ten thousand pesos of fine gold plates. Balboa gained so much reputation by the success of this enterprize, that his ambition was fired, and he aspired at the government of the colony, which all agreed should be established on the river
- b Darien, by the name of Santa Maria el Antigua del Darien. To effect this purpose, he enlarged his friendships, and concerted a scheme for deposing Enciso, under colour, that as they were not within the limits of Ojeda's government, they owed no obedience to his representative. Several circumstances contributed to facilitate his scheme, which was soon put in execution. Enciso was deposed, and the chief direction of affairs entrusted to Nunez Balboa. In this situation the colony might have flourished, had not fresh subjects of dispute arose, and such a variety of separate opinions and interests, as threatened anarchy and destruction. At length it was agreed, that Nicuesa should be sent for to govern the colony; a vessel was dispatched to transport him, with all his people, to Darien; they found him naked, emaciated, exhausted, and feeble, feeding like a savage upon roots and herbs. The shocking spectacle drew tears from the beholders; but Nicuesa
- c was so much elated with his change of circumstances, that he soon forfeited the good opinion of the colony at Darien, and was deposed before he had scarce felt the reins of authority, and sent to sea in a rotten caravel, with seventeen men, all of whom perished with the vessel; though some writers alledge, that Nicuesa reached Cuba, and was massacred, with all his people, by the Indians. This resolution of the colony, and Balboa's artful conduct, secured him in the administration, by which he was enabled to revenge himself upon the Batchelor Enciso, for the share he had in promoting the late dissensions. He therefore charged him with arrogating to himself an illegal authority, and committing treason, by exerting a power under virtue of Ojeda's commission, which could only be bestowed by the king. Upon this pretext he secured his person, and confiscated his effects; but at length released the Batchelor, on condition that he should take the first passage that offered for Spain or Hispaniola. Further to secure himself in the government, he dispatched two of his most intimate friends to Spain and Hispaniola, sending the Batchelor under their custody, and a process against him, couched in the most artful and bitter terms.

Balboa becomes chief of the settlement.

- THE new colony at Darien began now to flourish extremely, and spread the terror of their arms among the Indian nations, with some of which they contracted alliances, to which the accidental discovery of two Spaniards, who had deserted from Nicuesa, on his
- e first arrival in Veragua, and had lived with the Indians, and acquired their language, with a knowledge of the country, greatly contributed. They gave the first account of the extraordinary wealth of this part of America, especially to the southward, which was afterwards confirmed by a young prince, who offered to accompany Balboa to a country where the precious metal was in as great abundance as the Spaniards alledged iron was in Europe; but he said it would be necessary to be attended with a thousand soldiers, as he should be opposed by mighty monarchs. Balboa had contracted a particular intimacy with a neighbouring cazique, named Careta, whom he had first taken prisoner, and then released, on the promise of his friendship, and that he would supply the colony with provisions; an engagement which the Indian punctually executed. Careta was then at war
- f with another cazique, whose name was Ponca; and this prince, learning that the Spaniards took part with his enemy, fled to the mountains, leaving his country to be wasted, and his treasures pillaged by the allies. By this means the Spanish influence became daily more considerable; princes solicited their friendship, and, among others, the cazique Cemagre, lord of the adjacent country, who advanced with his seven sons, and grandees, to invite Balboa to his city, where he lodged his troops, supplied them with every necessary, and compelled them to accept the best services of the women of the country; the greatest mark of confidence that can be shewn by an Indian, and an indissoluble tie of friendship. The Spaniards were struck with the magnificence of Cemagre's palace far beyond any thing they had beheld in America. It was 150 paces in length, 80 in breadth, raised
- g on wooden pillars, inclosed by a stone wall, with rails at the top, so beautifully carved, that the Europeans were utterly astonished at the workmanship. Several of the apartments distinguished a rude genius for architecture and the fine arts; but what was peculiarly pleasing to the soldiers, was the great abundance of bread, venison, and pork, which they found in the storehouse, together with a variety of red and white pleasant liquors, drawn from Indian wheat, roots, and the palm. The wealth and generosity of this prince greatly increased their satisfaction. His eldest son, desirous of obliging the strangers by every means in his power, ordered several pieces of gold, valuable for their workmanship and purity, and weighing about 4000 pieces of eight, together with seventy slaves, to be presented to Nunez and Calmenares, who, he perceived, were the leading men among the Spaniards; and it was upon the division of these presents that they quarrelled, and obliged the young prince to express himself in the following terms.—“ The christians “ have no occasion to fall out about an affair so trifling as gold; for if they prize it at “ so high a rate as to forsake their native country, and disturb peaceable nations, in “ search of this metal, I will shew them a province where they may enjoy it to satiety, “ at the distance of six suns, or six days journey from hence, pointing towards the “ southern ocean; where the natives have vessels little inferior to the Spanish ships, with “ masts and sails, and where they eat and drink out of this same gold, so much valued.”

 The young prince’s report was confirmed by the testimony of the more grave and experienced Indians, which so inflamed the ardor of Nunez Balboa, that he resolved immediately to solicit the king for the necessary reinforcement, and to lay before the ministry the inexhaustible source of wealth he had discovered. Valdibia was chosen to transact this important affair, and he was also charged with the king’s fifth of the gold found by the new colony, which amounted to 15,000 pieces of eight.

Settlement on the island of Cuba.

November.

WHILE this affair was negotiating, and Balboa preparing to penetrate further into the country, in order to supply the colony with provisions, which now began to fail, don James Columbus, in quality of admiral and governor-general, was taking measures for establishing a colony on the island of Cuba. The advantages of this settlement were obvious, because the soil was excellent, the country populous, abounding with provisions, and the most valuable articles of commerce. James Velaquez, a person of understanding, temper, and integrity, was chosen to conduct this enterprize, and great numbers of persons involved in debts resolved to share his fortune. No less than three hundred men rendezvoused at Salvatierra de la Zavana, and embarked on board some vessels destined for Cuba, together with divers Indians in their canoes, headed by the cazique Hatney, of the province of Guababa. It was imagined this prince was disposed to countenance the Spanish expedition; but his conduct soon evinced that he had quitted Hispaniola, where he could make little resistance, only to assist the inhabitants of Cuba in preserving their liberty, and thereby acquiring more weight and authority than fell to his share, in a country wholly subdued, and governed by the Spaniards. Accordingly, on the arrival of Velaquez at the port called Palmas, the cazique stood upon his defence, and encamped, with a considerable body of Indians, in the woody grounds, which were inaccessible to the Spanish cavalry. Here he maintained his situation for the space of two months, but was at last dislodged by the superior skill and courage of the Europeans, who drove him to the heart of the island, and soon after took him prisoner, and burnt him alive; which produced such an effect upon the inhabitants, that the whole province of Maya immediately submitted. Civil divisions afterwards arose, which had almost destroyed three parts of the settlement. Ferdinand Cortez, so celebrated in history, took part against Velaquez, was seized, imprisoned, and on the point of losing his life as a traitor and mutineer. Happily, however, dissension ceased, and the Spaniards made daily progress in the reduction of the island, building towns, and laying the foundation of that valuable colony which hath ever since been maintained (A).

IN

(A) The great extent and fertility of the island of Cuba were at first the chief inducement for colonizing it; for as yet the Spaniards had no idea of the service it might be of to their American traffic in gold and silver. It exceeds two hundred and thirty leagues from east to west, though its breadth is unequal. From Cape de Cruz to Port Monati is reputed forty-five leagues; but this is the greatest breadth of the island, which in some places doth not exceed twelve leagues over. It is finely watered, and agreeably diversified with woods, lawns, and vallies, the whole standing within the tropic of Cancer, and the climate rather hot than unsalutary. The cedars produced here are of so extraordinary a size, that the Spaniards had seen the Indians make canoes of a single trunk able to carry fifty men. The fruits were delicious, the quadrupeds numerous, and the sea and rivers well stocked with fish. A few copper mines were discovered, and some gold; but the precious metal was not found in sufficient abundance to give birth to a settlement, had not the other commodities of the island compensated this deficiency. In a word, it was thought that Cuba might soon be rendered the granary of the Spanish settlement on the continent and islands, which was the principal motive with the admiral for prosecuting his design of settling colonies in a country which furnished but a small quantity of the commodities upon which alone the Spaniards at that time put any value. With respect to the inhabitants, they greatly resembled the natives of Hispaniola, in temper, stature, and particular customs. They professed no religion, performed no worship, and built no temples; though their physicians might be regarded as a kind of priests, who pretended to communicate with an invisible spirit, called the Devil by the Spaniards. They were called Behiques; and the people were deluded by them into the most monstrous superstition and absurdity; it was believed, for instance, that a Behique could cure certain dangerous diseases, by blowing a In this manner were the Spaniards making new settlements in the West-Indies, while Balboa was using every expedient to procure gold and provisions, and extend his influence on the continent. Towards the beginning of this year he had intelligence that a cazique of the province of Dabayba was possessed of immense treasures; the offerings made in gold, at a certain temple in his dominions, exceeding belief. This excited his avarice, and produced the resolution of attacking the cazique. Accordingly he embarked with 160 able-bodied men, in two brigantines, and a great number of canoes, ordering Calmenares, with a third of this force, to enter a great river, almost nine leagues to the eastward of the gulph of Darien. On the first notice of this expedition, Ceneaco, the grand cazique of Darien, withdrew to Dabayba, leaving the intermediate country entirely depopulated, and a prey to the Spaniards, by which means they obtained a booty in gold amounting to seven thousand pieces of eight; all which was lost in a storm on their return. Upon this loss Nunez again entered the river, joined Calmenares, subdued several caziques, and then returned to Darien, without procuring any other advantage to the settlement, than that of impressing the Indians with dreadful notions of the power and invincibility of the Spaniards, and gaining some further information respecting the country (B).

Further proceedings of the colony at Darien, and exploits of Balboa.

THE report of the young cazique of Cenagre, concerning the southern ocean, and the prodigious wealth of certain countries lying along that coast, suggested to Balboa the necessity of repeating his instances to the court for farther succours of men, arms, and ammunition. He eagerly desired to enter upon fresh discoveries and conquest, but he was sensible that his force was unequal. For this reason it was determined in a general council of the members of the colony, to send Calmenares and Cayzedo, two gentlemen of ability and character, to Spain, to make the strongest remonstrances to the king, of the great expectations entertained; and to give weight to their negotiation, a fifth of all the gold belonging to the colony was sent as a present; but just as the ambassadors had departed, and Nunez was pleasing himself with the hopes of their success, a conspiracy to seize his person was discovered. The colony was divided, and every thing conspired to the destruction of all the sanguine notions entertained by Nunez Balboa. One Alonso Perez incensed at the distribution of the gold made by Balboa, had contrived a scheme for seizing ten thousand castellanoes kept in bank as the common property; this he executed, and divided in such a manner as secured him an equal, if not a superior party. The Spaniards had twice formed in order of battle, to destroy each other, when some more considerate persons interposed, and represented the terrible consequences of such a measure, which must leave the conquerors an easy prey to the Indians. This produced a cessation of hostilities, and prevented the immediate shedding of blood, but did not effect a reconciliation; it is probable therefore the parties might have proceeded to the most fatal extremities, had not Christopher seasonably arrived from Hispaniola, with two ships, 150 men, great store of provision, and a commission signed by the treasurer Passamonte empowered by the king, constituting Balboa captain-general of all the country possessed by the Spaniards round the isthmus of Darien. Nunez was overjoyed with this prosperous circumstance, which, by re-establishing his authority, and placing it upon a more solid foundation than the capricious will of his companions, enabled him to break the conspiracy, and reduce the mutineers to reason, without striking a blow, or shedding a drop of blood. However, his satisfaction was considerably diminished by the accounts he received, that Enciso arrived safe in Spain, presented bitter remonstrances against his tyrannical conduct and so far gained credit with the court, that his majesty directed a process to be made against Nunez, who was ordered to make good all the damages sustained by the Batchelor, and to answer the charge in person before the ministry. Balboa not doubting upon this intelligence, but he should be superseded upon the arrival of the first ship from Spain, resolved to go in pursuit of the treasures mentioned by the young cazique, and the discovery of the South Sea, hoping that he might give the court a better impression of his conduct, if he could succeed in performing so essential a piece of service. To carry this design into execution, he began with animating his people, and exciting their ambition by the prospect of immense wealth and immortal honour. When he had roused a spirit of enterprize

ing upon the patient. A general notion of the deluge prevailed, and the Indians of Cuba affirmed they were the descendants of an old man who built a vessel, in which he put the male and female of all animals, and thereby saved all animated beings from the universal devastation by water. As to the form of government established among the natives of the island, it was monarchical, but not despotic; for the cazique had not power to enslave any of his subjects. Obiedo accuses them of a certain unnatural passion; but this is denied by Acosta, Herrera, and other writers of credit. Obiedo, p. 57. Herrer. dec. i. l. ix. sect. 2.

(B) It was about this time that Ponce de Leon, being superseded in the government of Puerto Rico, resolved upon a voyage in quest of discoveries; in consequence of which he fell in with a great number of small islands, some of them before unknown to the Europeans, and with the coast of Florida, to which he gave this appellation, because it was discovered on Easter, called Pasqua de Flores, by the Spaniards. Here he landed at an inconsiderable distance from Cape Corrientes, took possession in the name of his catholic majesty, and erected a stone with an inscription. Herrer. dec. i. l. ix. sect. v.

and emulation, he selected 100 men, of whose strength, valour, and attachment to his person, he entertained the best opinion, 1000 Indians, and several fierce dogs, with all which he embarked in two brigantines, and a great number of canoes, and sailed to the territories of the cazique Carata, by which he shortened the march considerably. He then proceeded by land to the dominions of the cazique Ponca, who hid himself in the mountains, on the news that the Spaniards were approaching. Nunez sent some Indians belonging to his ally Carata, to assure Ponca of his friendship, which had the effect, and drew that chief out of his retreat, with a present for the Spanish commander of 110 pesos in gold, which was all he possessed. As it was of the utmost consequence to leave no enemies behind, Nunez entertained him civilly, and dismissed him with presents of hawks-bells and beads, upon which the Indian placed a greater value than all the treasures of Peru and Mexico. Ponca granting the Spaniards a free passage, loading them with provisions, and furnishing them with Indians to carry their baggage, they proceeded to the territories of the next prince, whose name was Quaregua. This cazique was powerful, and hearing of the approach of the Spaniards, he had collected a small army to oppose them; but the sound and fire of the musquetry so terrified the Indians, that they scampered about the hills, fully persuaded, that as the white men could command both thunder and lightning, they must be something supernatural. The action was but of short duration, though the carnage was considerable, the dogs making terrible havock among the fugitive Indians. Here the cazique was killed, his brother taken prisoner, rich booty obtained in plates of gold, and a dreadful idea of the Spaniards impressed on the minds of the inland natives, who hitherto knew nothing of them except by distant report. Leaving behind, in Quaregua's town, which had now entirely submitted, several Spaniards, who were either sickly, or too much fatigued, to pursue the journey, Nunez proceeded to the summit of those mountains, whence he was told he might behold the southern ocean. The distance from thence to Ponca's territories was no more than six days march; but it cost the Spaniards five-and-twenty days, on account of the roughness of the country, the scarcity of provision, and the weakness and fatigue of the soldiers. At length they reached the top; and Nunez no sooner cast his eyes upon the sea, than he fell down upon his knees, and in a kind of prophetic extasy returned thanks to heaven, as if he had foreseen all the happy consequences resulting to Spain from the discovery. Having finished this act of devotion, he turned towards the sea, and bid his men behold it as the end of all their toils, repeating his promises of immense wealth, and unbounded reputation, to all who should follow him to that scene of riches and glory. He then drew up a certificate of his taking possession of the South-Sea, all the wealth it contained, and the coasts by which it was hemmed in, for his catholic majesty and the crown of Castile; the better to confirm which he cut down trees, erected crosses, raised heaps of stones, and cut the king's name on the bark of several trees of different kinds, to the great astonishment of the Indians, who could neither conceive the cause of joy in the Spaniards, nor the meaning of all these ceremonies.

NEXT he began to descend the mountains, still advancing towards the ocean, and proceeded with great caution towards the frontiers of a potent cazique called Chiapes, who marched out to meet him at the head of a formidable army. When the cazique came within a proper distance, the Spaniards fired a volley of small arms, the sound of which being reverberated by the neighbouring mountains, made so dreadful a noise, that the affrighted Indians deserting their chief, fled to the mountains for shelter, against those dreadful enemies, who they imagined had power over the elements, and could produce storms, lightning and thunder, at pleasure. As to the cazique, he sought refuge in his town, and Nunez sent some prisoners he had taken, to assure him that nothing more than provisions, and a free passage through his dominions, was wanted; upon which he thought it better to put himself into the hands of the Spaniards, and rely on their generosity, than run the hazard of renewing those belches of fire and smoke. Accordingly he came with a present in gold, amounting to 400 pieces of eight, apologizing for the smallness of the offering, "because, said he, we Indians set no value upon the dross, and take no pains in collecting it." Chiapes was graciously received, and his presents were returned by what he deemed more than an equivalent, a present of beads, looking glasses, scissars, and hawks-bells, together with some hatchets, the use of which, in cutting down trees, the Spaniards shewed him. Nunez, and his people, were so well entertained in this cazique's metropolis, that he sent for the sick and wearied whom he left behind in Quaragua; but before their arrival he detached Francis Pizarro to survey the coast and adjacent country. John Escoray and Alonso Martin were sent by different routs upon the same business, each being attended with twelve men well armed; and Martin was so fortunate as to hit upon the shortest road to the sea, where he no sooner arrived than he went into a canoe which he found upon the shore, and desired his companions to bear witness, that he was the first European who entered the South Sea. On the return of these parties, first seen.

- a Nunez made ready to quit the territories of Chiapes, who offered to attend him to the next province, together with a great number of his people, loaded with provision and the baggage of the Spaniards. When he reached the sea, he took possession in the name of the catholic king, with all the usual formalities, and made public declaration that he would defend the rights of the crown of Castile against all opposers. Then he seized upon nine canoes that he met with on the coast; he passed over a river to the dominions of a chief named Cocura, who resolving to oppose him drew out his troops, and was going to attack the Spaniards, when a single discharge of the musquetry filled his whole army with terror and dismay, which was succeeded by a general rout, and soon after by submission, and a present from the cazique of 650 pieces of eight in gold.
- b NUNEZ Balboa had now discovered the South Sea, but the wealth which he expected to find among the nations bordering on the coast, fell greatly short of expectation. It was therefore highly necessary to support his credit with the Spaniards under his command, by making further attempts. Accordingly he embarked much against the inclination of the cazique Chiapes, in canoes, with intention of crossing a bay that run far into the land, and searching the surrounding country for the precious metal. This enterprize had almost proved fatal; for a storm came on, the canoes were in the utmost danger of being overset; and they at last made a desert island, in the middle of the bay, often struggling with great dangers and difficulties. In the night a flood came on, that not only staved the canoes, but covered the whole island, the Spaniards remaining for several hours up to the waist in the sea, expecting every minute to be swallowed up. Provision failed them, their spirits were exhausted with the fatigue of standing so long, and all must have perished with famine had not a calm ensued, and the Indians, with great address, repaired some of the canoes, which wafted them to the lands of a chief whose name was Tumaco. With much persuasion this chief was prevailed on to regard the Spaniards as friends, and to assist them with provision. At last he visited Nunez in person, with 614 pieces of eight in gold, and 240 large pearls of inestimable value, had not their colour been injured by the fire; by which method the Indians always separated the shells, until they had been taught by the Spaniards. Observing that the Spaniards set a great price upon the pearls, and pleased with the returns they made of looking-glasses, beads, and hatchets, he dispatched some of his people to fish for more; who returned with 96 ounces of beautiful pearls, quite undamaged by the fire; all which the cazique gave to Nunez, telling him, that there was an island, at the distance of no more than five leagues, where he might find abundance of pearls of immense size. This information was sufficient to rouse the avarice and curiosity of the Spaniard, who began immediately to prepare for the expedition, but was prevailed on by the cazique Chiapes to defer it till the summer, when he might cross the sea with less danger, and fish with more success. As he had laid aside the notion of penetrating further, until the season became more favourable, he thought of returning to Darien, and making the necessary preparations for a fresh attempt, having received information that the coast extended without bounds to the southward, meaning Peru; that there was a prodigious quantity of gold; and that the natives used certain beasts, which the Indians described, to carry burthens. These were no other than the Peruvian sheep, which the Spaniards took to be camels or deer, from the figures of them made with earth by the Indians of Tumaco; and this we may regard as the second intimation of Peru given to the Spaniards, who were not yet sufficiently acquainted with the situation of the country, with respect either to latitude or longitude, or the extension of the land, to annex other ideas to those imperfect hints and obscure descriptions. In general Nunez collected information sufficient to raise the most sanguine expectations of the immense wealth that must accrue from the summer expedition he meditated. It was agreed on all hands, that the nations both to the south and north of the isthmus overflowed with gold, upon which the inhabitants put no value; so that it was the less likely to become an object of contention. However, the jealousy which the Indians in general expressed with regard to foreigners, and the difficulty with which they were prevailed on to suffer the Spaniards to enter their country, evinced Balboa of the necessity of making all the preparations he could to penetrate, by force, should the caziques offer to oppose his designs.

Intelligence of Peru.

g WITH this view he began his march back to Darien, taking leave of the cazique Chiapes, who wept at his departure, and leaving under his protection all the sick that could not travel, until they should be perfectly recovered. He now took a different rout, on his return to the north, than what had brought him to the south, in order to examine the country more accurately, and to extend the fame of the Spaniards more widely among the Indian nations. He soon reached the territories of a prince called Teaochan, who conceiving a high opinion of the generosity of the Spaniards from the report of the Indians who attended them, came out of his town to meet Nunez, with the greatest marks of respect respect and affection, bringing with him a present of a thousand pieces of eight in gold, a curiously wrought, and two hundred beautiful pearls, though somewhat discoloured by fire. He desired the Chiapese Indians might be returned, and he would supply the Spaniards with a sufficient number of his people to carry their baggage and provision, which he liberally provided. In a word, after refreshing themselves for three days in the dominions of this cazique, Nunez and his companions began their march over steep and barren mountains, in ascending which they encountered manifold difficulties. At last, they reached the dominions of a great lord, named Poncra, who was no friend to the obliging Tcaochan; for the subjects of this latter were perpetually soliciting Nunez to make war upon Poncra, and lay waste his city. Upon entering the metropolis, they found it abandoned by the inhabitants, though the Spaniards obtained a booty in gold, amounting b to three thousand pieces of eight. Nunez sent out several Indians to search for Poncra in the woods, to assure him that he might return with safety to his town; but if he refused, that the Spaniards would hunt him with their dogs, and exterminate the whole nation: menaces which produced their effect; for Poncra, terrified with the thoughts of being exposed to the dogs, waited on Nunez with a present of gold to the value of three thousand pieces of eight. It is not much to the honour of the Spanish commander that he violated his faith on this occasion, and suffered Poncra to be torn in pieces by the dogs, under pretence that he was forced to comply with the importunity of all the neighbouring caziques, who demanded his death as a testimony of his friendship for them; altho' in fact Nunez was actuated to this measure by the obstinate silence of the cazique, who refused to c give him any information concerning the country where he found his gold.

HERE it was that Nunez was joined by the Spaniards, whom he had left under the protection of Chiapes. When they found themselves tolerably recovered, they began their march through the dominions of the cazique Boneniamia, who received them with testimonies of the strongest friendship; entertaining them with the best things his country afforded, loading them with provisions, making them a present of 2000 pieces of eight in gold, and escorting them in person, with a large retinue, to Poncra; where, taking Nunez by the hand, he harangued him in the following words: " Brave and bold man, d " here are your companions, whom I bring to you safe and well as when they arrived " in my territories. He that makes thunder and lightning, and bestows on us the " fruits of the earth, preserve and keep you and them." When he spoke, he fixed his eyes upon the sun, whence the Spaniards concluded, that he worshipped that luminary as the fountain of all temporal blessings. It was from Boneniamia that Nunez had the best intelligence of the state of Peru, which he could hitherto obtain; though the want of good interpreters rendered his information still imperfect and defective. After acknowledging the civilities of this friendly cazique, by the present of some trinkets, and other testimonies of regard, the Spaniards quitted Poncra, after having refreshed themselves in that town for the space of a month, ascending dreadful mountains, and travelling from one hill to another, without a tract or vestige of human foot, and guided only by their compass and the Indians, to whom all roads were indifferent. When they were almost e spent with fatigue, they reached a town belonging to the cazique Bucbebuca, which they found abandoned by the inhabitants. The Indians were sent in quest of the cazique, who was taken, concealing himself in the thickest woods, out of shame and concern that he had no provisions, or any other means of demonstrating his esteem for the Spaniards; desiring, however, that they would accept of certain pieces of gold, in token of his regard and friendship: provisions would at this time have been more welcome than gold to the Spaniards; but the extreme poverty of the surrounding country convincing them of Bucbebuca's sincerity, they proceeded on their march, pining under the united pressure of hunger and fatigue. As they were attended with no beasts of burthen, all the stock, which the Indians carried on their shoulders, was consumed in three days, and they were f thus left destitute in a country that furnished scarce any necessaries of life. In this situation, Nunez was addressed by ambassadors and presents from the cazique Chiovoso; who, after many professions of esteem and friendship, sought his assistance against a potent neighbour, with whom he was at war. The presents consisted of thirty pieces of gold, which weighed above 14,000 pieces of eight; but they were not sufficient to engage the Spaniards in an unnecessary quarrel in their present unhappy circumstances, though they acknowledged them with civility, and sent in return some pieces of looking-glass, glass-beads, and hatchets, to the cazique, directing their march to Pacorosa, the cazique of which country fled at their approach, but returned on the civil message sent him by Nunez, and made that commander a present in gold to the value of fifteen hundred g pieces of eight. The Spaniards rested a month in the dominions of this prince, and then set forward for the territories of Tubanama, a lord much dreaded for his power and valour. In their present situation it was not thought advisable to enter upon open war with this cazique, a cazique, notwithstanding Nunez was assured, that he would obstruct the passage of the Spaniards; recourse, therefore, was had to stratagem, and a resolution pursued of attacking Tubanama by surprise, in which they succeeded; the cazique, his whole family, and eighty of his women, being made prisoners. As this prince had governed with great severity, and oppressed all his neighbours, the report of his captivity was no sooner spread, than the people flocked from the adjacent towns to complain of his conduct, and solicit that he might suffer condign punishment. The cazique denied the accusations, which he alledged were founded upon envy and malice; he wept bitterly, threw himself at the feet of the Spanish commander, and promised eternal friendship and submission. Perceiving that Nunez entertained no resentment, and that he intended setting him at liberty, he presented him with gold bracelets and female ornaments, to the value of three thousand pieces of eight; and next day a present came from the lords his vassals, to the amount of six thousand pieces of eight: but Tubanama obstinately refused to acquaint the Spaniards whence he drew the gold, fearing they would never quit his dominions should he divulge this important secret. Yet, in despite of the cazique's silence, Nunez found, upon searching, that the country yielded gold, and therefore resolved to establish a colony in Pacorosa's dominions and Tubanama's; not only for working the mines, but for the convenience of carrying on a trade over the isthmus, between the South and North Seas. The only punishment inflicted on the cazique for his obstinacy, was, the carrying away his women and son; though it was thought he freely parted with the latter, to serve him as a spy over the actions of the Spaniards. At parting, Nunez charged Tubanama to collect as much gold as he could, and send it to Darien; in return for which, he might always depend on his friendship and protection: the cazique promised every thing, but never thought of the performance of his engagements.

Just as Nunez had quitted the territories of Tubanama, he was seized with a fever, in consequence of the diligence and activity he exerted through the whole course of this fatiguing expedition; but he would not suffer his own illness to prove any obstruction to the public affairs. The men pursued their march, while Nunez was carried in a kind of litter, on the shoulders of the Indians, in which situation he arrived in the dominions of the cazique Cemagre, his ally, who was now dead, and the chief power vested in his son, the young prince who had given the first information concerning the South Sea, and the riches of Peru. The Spaniards were joyfully welcomed by the young chief, who made Nunez a present in gold exceeding two thousand pieces of eight; in return for which, the Spaniard gave him a linnen shirt, and some other trifles, which he deemed of inestimable value. After refreshing himself in Cemagre, and recovering his health, Nunez set out for Darien, where he arrived on the 19th of January; having received intelligence upon his march, that two sloops, loaded with provisions, were lately arrived from Hispaniola, which infused great spirits into the whole company. In this manner ended Nunez Balboa's expedition in quest of the South Sea; during which he displayed every quality of a great commander, gaining the esteem of his own people, the respect of the Indians, forming alliances with all the nations through which he passed, marking every circumstance that could facilitate further discoveries, and promote the design he formed of repeating the expedition, and establishing a commerce between the South and North seas; and returning with immense wealth, without any diminution in the number of his companions, and with great increase of glory and reputation. He now divided the spoils, reserving a fifth for the crown, with so much justice and impartiality, that all were satisfied, and Nunez equally admired by the companions of his toil, and the Spaniards who remained at Darien for the defence of the colony. A. D. 1514.

IMMEDIATELY an account of the success of the expedition, with the king's fifth of the riches brought back, was dispatched to court, which Nunez was in hopes would efface all the bad impressions of his conduct made by the suggestions of his enemies. The effect did not, however, correspond with his reasonable hopes; for the news no sooner arrived in Spain of the discovery of the South Sea, than his majesty appointed Peter Arias d'Avila to succeed Nunez Balboa in the government of Darien, allowing him twelve hundred men to reinforce the colony, and push the discovery; a number which Arias increased to fifteen hundred able-bodied soldiers. A bishop, and several clergy, were also sent for the religious government of the new colony, by this fleet, which entered the bay of Uraba towards the close of the month of July, proceeding from thence to the settlement at Darien, where Arias and the bishop were received by Nunez with all possible respect. It was Balboa's intention to give all the assistance in his power to the new governor, and not to obstruct the publick service out of private resentment; but the coldness with which Arias met his civility, and the bitter prosecution he commenced against the old governor, soon broke all his resolutions, and rendered the two commanders implacable enemies. To encrease the misfortunes of the settlement, sickness broke out among

among the troops lately arrived from Spain; and provision beginning to fail, it was found a necessary to send back great numbers by the return of the fleet. Nor was this all; the misconduct of Arias, and of the persons he employed, raised such a cloud of enemies, as threatened the entire destruction of the colony. One Ayora had been sent with a party of 400 men to erect settlements in different parts of the Isthmus towards the South Sea, and collect as much gold as circumstances would admit. Ayora was mindful only of the last part of his instructions. He fell upon the Indians without distinction, robbed, pillaged, massacred, and perfidiously violated all the alliances formed by Nunez, returning indeed with some booty purchased at the expence of national honour, and the friendship of the caziques, so essential to the welfare of the settlement, and the success of the designs formed by the Spanish ministry. Several other excursions to the same purpose were made, all of them tending to weaken the settlement, and irritate the natives, for the sake of an inconsiderable quantity of the precious metal. In some of these expeditions, all the Spaniards perished, and the particulars of the misfortune were afterwards collected from the Indians. Ayora had erected a kind of little fort in the cazique Tubanama's dominions, in which he left a garrison, under the conduct of Menezes. The Indians kept this handful of men perpetually shut up, and Arias found it necessary to withdraw the garrison, and employ the soldiers in some more profitable expedition. Tello de Guzman was accordingly ordered with a party to make discoveries as far as he could to the westward along the South Sea, and to take along with him the little garrison in Tubanama's territories. On his arrival he found the little garrison closely blocked up, and reduced to extreme necessity; but the sight of his troops obliged the Indians to retire; upon which the fort was deserted, the Spaniards marching in a body to the countries possessed by the caziques Chepo and Chepauri, with whom Guzman contracted an alliance. The last-mentioned chief, in particular, treated the Spaniards with the utmost hospitality; but while they were entertaining themselves in the most friendly manner, an Indian boy entered, and informed Guzman, that the town and dominions in which they were feasting were his right, of which he was deprived by the villainy of his host, who had been appointed guardian to him by his father. He besought his assistance against the usurper, and promised him abundance of gold, if he would restore him to his dominions. This promise was sufficient to induce Guzman to break all the most sacred ties of friendship, hospitality, and solemn treaties. Immediately he ordered his host to be hanged upon the nearest tree, delivered up seven of the principal persons of the court to be tortured and put to death by the boy's friends, without ever enquiring into the truth of the allegations; and then received six thousand pieces of eight in gold, as the reward of his treacherous cruelty. With this booty he proceeded to the place where Panama now stands, at that time the residence of a few fishermen, whence it took the name of Panama, which in the Indian language signifies a place where fish is caught. From this place he dispatched Albitez, with eighty men, towards the province of Chagre, eighteen leagues distant from Panama. Albitez arrived at the capital, while the inhabitants were wrapped in perfect security, and fast asleep; but he had too much generosity to seize the opportunity of enriching himself by an act of unprovoked humanity: he forbore all violence, waited with patience until morn, and by this noble action so charmed the cazique, that he presented him with twelve thousand pieces of eight in pure gold. So large a sum only served to rouse the avarice of Albitez. Upon seeing the money, he asked whether the cazique could not spare more, and fill him a large bag, that he presented, with the precious metal? To which the cazique replied with astonishment, "That he might fill his bag with stones out of the brook, for he neither had any more, nor could make gold." With this answer Albitez departed; but though he was disappointed, he would not suffer any violence to be offered to the inhabitants. Soon after he joined Guzman, and both marched to Tubanama, where the whole country was in arms to oppose them. The Spaniards were under the necessity of fighting their way through clouds of poisoned arrows; they behaved with admirable intrepidity, but sustained such losses, that, before they reached Darien, they were reduced to one-third the number with which they set out, and the remainder were almost dead with fatigue and hunger.

A. D. 1515.

ANOTHER party sent under the conduct of Francis de Valejo proved still more unfortunate. This officer had been sent against the Indians of Uraba, who were continually molesting the settlement at Darien. Being now within three leagues of the principal Indian town, he fell upon the enemy, and no sooner obtained a victory, than his men separated in quest of gold, thereby leaving the Indians an opportunity of reassembling. Nor was the occasion lost; the Indians united, and poured in their poisoned arrows with such fury, that several Spaniards were killed on the spot, and many more wounded, all of whom died raving with the most excruciating torture. In a word, the Spaniards were forced to retreat on floats of timber and bundles of reeds, sustained incredible hardships, and all perished, except a few who providentially found their way to Darien.

a The unfortunate issue of these two expeditions could not oblige Arias to alter measures, the folly of which was demonstrated by fatal experience. On the contrary, he hoped by perseverance to wipe off all former disgraces; and for this purpose detached Francis Bezerra with one hundred and eighty men, well armed, to penetrate into the province of Zener. Bezerra landed on the coast of Uraba, his instructions being to put all to the sword whom he met in that province. Here he underwent numberless hardships, and sustained great losses from the flights of poisoned arrows which the Indians shot from thickets and bushes. When he arrived on the banks of the river Zener, the inhabitants appeared disposed to cultivate peace, which encouraged Bezerra to begin his passage over the river in canoes; but no sooner had the Indians observed that half the party was landed on the other
b side, than they rushed out of the thickets on both sides, fell upon the Spaniards with the utmost fury, and slaughtered them, without suffering a single man to escape to carry the news of the misfortune to Darien. The circumstances of this affair were afterwards related by an Indian boy, in the service of Bezerra, who hid himself in the woods, and travelled by night through bye-paths, until he arrived at Darien, half-famished.

ALL this while Nunez continued unemployed at the settlement, to the great prejudice of the public service, and dislike of the Spaniards, who knew the activity of his disposition, the generosity of his mind, and the prudence with which he conducted all the enterprizes in which he was engaged. It was even expected that he would be recalled, in consequence of the bitter accusation sent by Arias to court; and instead of being rewarded for noble c discoveries and eminent services, have a similar testimony with the great Columbus of the gratitude of the administration, by standing trial like a criminal. How agreeable was the disappointment to himself and friends, when they found, upon the arrival of the first ship from Spain, that he was instituted Adelentado, or lieutenant of the South Sea, and that Arias was strictly charged to assist and support Nunez in his office. The truth is, the court was disposed to listen to the calumnies of Arias, had they not been refuted by the undeniable testimony of other colonists, who were eye-witnesses of the many gallant actions performed by Nunez Balboa, and whom they recommended in all their letters, as the only person capable of raising the settlement to the most flourishing condition. Arias was enraged at this honour conferred upon the man whom he considered as his implacable enemy, and, instead d of paying any regard to his instructions, used every possible means to thwart the schemes, blast the reputation, and endanger the life of the Adelentado. Instead of leaving the care of farther discoveries to Nunez, he sent Gaspar de Merates with sixty men towards the South Sea, apparently with no other intention than to plunder the Indians, and incense them so much against the Spaniards, that all the Adelentado's endeavours to reunite them, and form alliances, should be fruitless, and consequently his utmost diligence to establish colonies, and make conquests across the isthmus, exerted to no purpose; for it was impossible to assign any other motives for a conduct to the last degree absurd and imprudent. But Nunez had no remedy, the power of the governor was uncontrollable, and he was forced to vent his grief in letters to the court, charging Arias with the most fatal errors, and having e made all the Indian princes the inveterate enemies of Spain, by plundering and massacring the caziques with whom he had formed alliances and strict friendships before the arrival of the new governor.

Balboa made lieutenant of the South Sea.

THE misfortunes of Valejo, Guzman, and Bezerra, served only to aggravate Arias, and render him desperate; while all those under his government expected every moment to be destroyed by the Indians. The panic was so great at Darien, that bushes and thickets had frequently been mistaken for hostile armies; the foundery was now shut up, which never happened but on occasions of the most imminent danger, and it was thought necessary to implore the protection of Heaven by public prayers and fastings. Arias, alone, was undaunted. He detached Badajoz in a ship, with one hundred and thirty men, to Nombre de f Dios, with orders to cross the isthmus to the South Sea, reduce the country to obedience, and make war upon all the princes who should refuse obedience to the court of Spain, as if the colony at Darien had been in the most flourishing situation, and able to support the loss of so many persons, in case he should happen to prove unfortunate. On their arrival at the fort built by Nicuesa, the soldiers, terrified with the horrid spectacle of the bones of their countrymen starved to death, raised many difficulties about advancing; but Badajoz, with undaunted intrepidity, dismissed the ship, and by cutting off all possibility of retreating, reduced them to the necessity of paying implicit obedience to his orders; telling them, that the only danger or shame to a soldier was that of not discharging his duty. He then climbed up the steep mountains of Capira, and fell, by surprise, upon the cazique
g Tanonagua, whom he took prisoner, gaining a booty in gold to the amount of six thousand pieces of eight. Another neighbouring cazique, whose name was Tataracherabi, he likewise attacked; but although he had not the good fortune to seize his person, he obtained a booty of eight thousand castellanos. To this was added the ransom paid by Tanonagua

for his liberty, which amounted to six thousand pieces of eight, and a present brought by Tataracherabi in gold, with a design to impose on the Spaniards, and engage them in a war with the powerful cazique Nata, whom he represented as extreme wealthy, but the sovereign only of a few subjects. The cazique's stratagem succeeded, and the vast flow of prosperity had hitherto attended Badajoz's arms, was converted into an irresistible tide of misfortune. He was so fortunate, indeed, as to enter the town of this cazique in the night, and gain possession of his person, women, and treasures; but he found himself next morning surrounded by several thousand Indians, who poured in showers of darts and arrows, wounding a great number of the Spaniards. According to Herrera, this exploit was performed by Perez de la Rúa, detached at the head of a party, who had the presence of mind, in this extremity, to threaten the cazique's life, unless he immediately ordered his subjects to lay down their arms, with which he complied, and they implicitly obeyed his commands. Several of the adjacent caziques submitted in consequence of Nata's misfortune, and Badajoz had collected to the amount of eighty thousand castellanos in gold; but such a spirit of resentment was now raised among all the Indians, that the Spaniards must rely entirely upon the force of arms, and their valour, in a distant country, and surrounded upon every side by enemies. They had passed through the dominions of the cazique Cheru, and were entering those of Parrizao Pariba, whom the Spaniards called Paris, when a present in gold, amounting to fifty thousand castellanos, was sent by the cazique; which, instead of gratifying, only excited the avarice of the Spaniards. Badajoz imagined, that the prince who could make a present of so much value, must possess vast treasures; he therefore laid a scheme for seizing his wealth, which terminated in his own destruction. Pretending that he would regard the cazique as his friend, he fell upon his town in the night, and collected in gold to the amount of forty thousand castellanos; but the cazique made his escape, laid a snare for the Spaniard, surrounded him, and reduced Badajoz to the necessity of cutting his way through crowds of Indians, with the loss of seventy men slain upon the field, besides great numbers of wounded, few of whom ever recovered. Here commenced the misfortunes of this little party. In the trepidation of flight, Badajoz put the wounded into some canoes which he met with, marching along the shore with the rest of the troops; but the tide rising to a great height, the Spaniards were surrounded by the waters: some saved their lives by climbing up trees, and great numbers perished. In this situation they were attacked by the cazique Nata, who determined to revenge his late disgrace; and his resentment must have been fatal to the Spaniards, had not the night separated the combatants, and furnished Badajoz with the means of retreat, the sound carrying off the wounded upon their shoulders to a place of security. What the Spaniards deemed their greatest misfortune, even in this extremity, was the loss of all the gold they had taken; but a new perplexity now arose. When they arrived upon the frontiers of the cazique Cheru, they found him in arms, supported by a numerous body of forces. He had drawn a line upon the ground, beyond which he prohibited the Spaniards from advancing on pain of his resentment; but he promised to supply them with provision if they retired, which Badajoz thought was most advisable; after which he was accommodated with the best of every thing that the country produced. Having gathered strength by the provision sent by the cazique, Badajoz, with a party of Spaniards, passed over to an island at some distance, which was celebrated for producing large pearls, and, surprizing the cazique, obtained some gold for his ransom, and then returned to their former quarters; after which he forced his way through the dominions of Tabor, an Indian chief, who opposed him, and Pireguetta, another cazique, who had threatened his destruction; arriving at length in a wretched plight in the territories of Tubanama and Pocorosa, where he met with the licentiate Espinosa and his party, after losing near half his men, and all the wealth he had collected by slaughter, treachery, and the most infamous measures (C).

THAT the reader may not be at a loss to know in what manner the licentiate Espinosa came into the territories of the above cazique, we must observe, that upon the intelligence brought by the Indian boy of Bezerra's misfortune, Peter Arias determined to revenge his people, and endeavour to recover those who might have escaped the fury of the Indians; but sensible of the famine that prevailed in the colony, and the horror which the Spaniards entertained, all thoughts of entering Uraba, a country so fatal to many of their countrymen, he fell upon a stratagem to rouse their courage, and animate them to another expedition. He pretended to declare war against the cazique Pocorosa, for which the colony

(C) It may be proper to observe, that this year the great river La Plata was accidentally discovered. John Dios de Solis, celebrated as one of the best navigators in the world, was appointed by the king to go with two ships in search of a commodious passage to the Spice Islands. He sailed on the 8th of October, and soon made Rio de Janeiro, on the coast of Brazil, steering along the shore until he arrived at La Plata, which he took to be a sea of fresh water, on account of the vast breadth of the mouth of the river. He went on shore to observe the inhabitants, fell into an ambuscade, and was slain; upon which the ship returned to Spain, with a cargo of Brazil wood. Herr. dec. ii. l. ii.

a readily declared, imagining it would produce great wealth with little danger; and three hundred able bodied men offered the governor their services to attend him on this enterprise. These he put on board some vessels, and sailing westward to deceive his people until night, he then ordered the pilots to tack about, and hold their course for Uraba. Before day he ordered Hurtado to land with 200 men at Caribana, after having in a stern manner declared, that no man should enquire whither he was going, but implicitly obey the orders of his superior officer. The town was attacked, and set on fire, and the Indians, who run out scorched, and half burnt, fell into the hands of the Spaniards, and were put to the sword. Those, however, who escaped, assembled in a body; and being joined by a great many men from the adjacent country, handled their bows with so much dexterity, b and let fly such showers of poisoned arrows, that the Spaniards were forced to retreat precipitately to their ships, carrying with them some prisoners, who confirmed the boy's relation of the melancholy fate of Bezerra. Arias perceiving that his men were quite disheartened, stood out to sea, and after a voyage of sixty leagues, landed with all his men at Acla, from whence he detached the licentiate Espinosa to fall upon Pocorosa. In the mean time he employed himself in erecting a fort at Acla, in order that the Spaniards might have a place of retreat, which he had scarce finished when the bad state of his health obliged him to return to Darien, leaving captain Gabriel de Rojas.

ABOUT this time he received a letter from the licentiate, soliciting a reinforcement of men, to enable him to revenge the cause of Badajoz, punish the Indians who had shewn c their enmity to the Spaniards, and recover the vast treasure lost in this unhappy expedition. Arias approved of the resolution, and detached Valenzuela, with 130 men, to support the licentiate, who was ambitious to demonstrate that learning and education only sharpen the edge of valour, and unite conduct with courage. With this reinforcement he began his march against the Indians of Cemagre and Pocorosa, who were were assembled to the number of three thousand men, to oppose his progress; but they no sooner beheld the Spanish horses, than they fled in a panic, were pursued by the large dogs, and shockingly gored and mangled. Upon this advantage the licentiate marched to Cheru; and the better to surprize Nata, he fell upon his town in the night; however, the cazique escaping, collected a body of Indians, and attacked the Spaniards with great spirit, and infinite resolution, until the appearance of the few horse under Espinosa broke their courage, and made b them take to their heels, fearing they should be torn to pieces by those dreadful animals; for they believed the horse and rider to be the same creature. In consequence, Nata perceiving that resistance would be fruitless, came and made his submission, while the licentiate sent Hurtado to seize the cazique Escolia, which he performed. Having now secured a retreat, he advanced to the territories of Paris, who attacked him at the head of five thousand men, with so much obstinacy, that the Spaniards must have sunk under the weight of numbers, had not the sight of the horses and dogs spread terror among the Indians, and obliged them to seek refuge in flight from those animals, which they beheld with consternation. Advancing to the country of the cazique Quenca, where he was told e the gold taken from Badajoz was deposited, he found the Indians in arms; but soothing them with assurances of friendship, he not only recovered eighty thousand castellanos, but established peace with the cazique; after which he went in pursuit of the remainder of the treasure to the province of the cazique Chicacotia, where he resided during the rainy season, though he was not so fortunate as to find the gold, the chief object of the expedition.

DURING the whole winter the Indian nations had been taking measures for revenging themselves on the Spaniards, and entirely extirpating this detested race of mercenary foreigners. Just before Espinosa was preparing to begin his march, they assembled to the number of twenty thousand men, attacked his quarters, and fought with more than usual valour and conduct; but the Spaniards, who were now accustomed to the Indian manner of f fighting, relieved each other seasonably, discharged their fire-arms and cross-bows with so much regularity, plied their swords so vigorously, and covered themselves from the arrows of the enemy, with such address, by their targets, that after an obstinate battle the Indians were defeated with great slaughter, and pursued in their flight by 200 confederate Indians, who fought resolutely under the protection of the Spaniards; a proof of the manifold advantages which must have resulted from Balboa's measures, had they been duly prosecuted by the new governor. Having thus defeated all the schemes of the Indians, the licentiate set out for Nata on the 9th of July, and proceeding to the territories of the cazique Escotia, detached Valenzuela in search of proper materials for building canoes, to the province of Guerari. In this country his men suffered greatly by famine, which obliged him to hasten g his return to Acla, where he arrived after a tedious march, and fighting several battles, proceeding from thence to Darien. Here a division was made of the booty brought back, which so enriched the colonists, that dissipation succeeded; and gaming arose to such a pitch, as to render a law necessary, that no man should hazard above ten pieces of eight within within the space of twenty-four hours ; for besides gold, Espinosa brought back two thousand prisoners, who were restored.

IN the course of this expedition, Bartholomew Hurtado and Hernandez Ponce, who were detached from the main body, with a number of men, proceeded to the northward, and discovered several islands, and a long range of the southern coast, as far as the bay of Osa, ninety leagues from Nata. Here a nation, called Chiuchires, opposed their landing, which obliged them to run fifty leagues down the coast, quite to the bay of St. Lucar, now the port of Nicaya, in the province of Nicaragua. The country was pleasant and fruitful ; but finding that the Indians were little disposed to cultivate an intercourse, they returned to join Espinosa, who detached Hernandez Ponce to settle a kind of colony at Panama, on the opposite side of the isthmus of Darien to Porto Bello.

Balboa's scheme for building ships in the South Sea.

WHILE Espinosa was employed in the manner we have just related, Nunez de Balboa, to whom the colony owed the greatest obligations, continued not only unemployed, but detained as a kind of prisoner by the governor Arias d'Avila, notwithstanding the instructions of the court, and the commission of Adelentado, or lieutenant, with which he had been lately honoured. At last a reconciliation was happily effected, through the mediation of the bishop John de Quevedo, who conceived the highest opinion of Balboa's merit ; and to insure their friendship, by the strictest ties, the Adelentado married the governor's daughter by proxy ; for the young lady was at that time in Spain. He now rose in the governor's favour, and was soon appointed to settle a colony at the port of Acla, where Arias had built a fort, which he left with a garrison under the care of Gabriel de Rojas. Balboa accordingly set out with eighty men, who voluntarily offered their service, and arrived safe at Acla, where he immediately made several necessary regulations, appointing Regidores and other magistrates ; built a town, and took all the necessary measures for executing his instructions to build brigantines on the South Sea, to pursue the discoveries which he had so happily began. The design was to prepare the timbers at Acla, which were to be carried over by land to the river de la Balsos, where the brigantines were to be built. To forward the project, Nunez procured a reinforcement of two hundred men from his father-in-law ; the timber was cut down, and carried with great labour to the place appointed, to the astonishment of all men, who believed the scheme was impracticable, because there were at that time no beasts of burden in the country. Balboa then divided his men into three parties, each of which had its department, the one to bring provisions, the other to build the vessels, and the third to transport the iron-work, rigging, and other materials, from Acla. Every thing went on with alacrity, but fortune was not propitious. All the pains hitherto bestowed were lost, worms having destroyed all the timber, which obliged Nunez to begin his labour afresh. He set about it without desponding, and had almost completed his work, when a flood of the river carried the vessels off the stocks, and buried them, together with the timber and other materials, in heaps of mud and sand, the people saving themselves with the utmost difficulty. All his constancy now forsook Nunez, and he began to sink under disappointments, and the pressure of famine, when one Francisco Compagnon offered to cross the river upon floats in quest of provision, the party allotted for this purpose having failed in their endeavours. Compagnon did all that industry, perseverance, and courage, could execute, but he was unsuccessful ; which reduced Nunez to the necessity of returning to Acla, after he had for some weeks subsisted entirely upon a few roots and herbs picked up at random, and eat without any knowledge of their qualities. Here he was joined by the diligent Compagnon, who at length surmounted all obstructions, and came attended by a great number of Indians loaded with provision, which encouraged Nunez the more to resume his project of building ships. The timber was prepared at Acla, and transported as before to the river de la Balsos, where, at last, the vessels were finished, and launched, with incredible labour, after the workmen had combated all the difficulties which fatigue, famine, and the inconvenient situation could throw in their way. He immediately embarked with as many men as the two brigantines could carry, and sailing to the largest pearl island, employed himself in forming magazines, while the vessels were employed in transporting the remainder of his party. While he staid here he is reported to have received a letter from the archbishop of Seville, congratulating him on his discovery of the South Sea, and assuring him, that, if he followed the land to the westward, he would meet with warlike nations, who fought in armour, and used spears ; but that if he steered eastward, the country would be found to produce much gold and cattle. This intimation is said to have induced Nunez to sail to the continent eastward, with above an hundred men ; he touched upon the coast, and took some prisoners, who told him, that, if he advanced, he might find great abundance of the precious metal. Beyond Cape St. Michael the sailors observed a great number of whales, which prevented their putting to shore at Port Pinas, as was intended, and to proceed to the territories of the cazique Chicama, where Nunez debarked his men to revenge the party under Gasper Morales, slaughtered in that country.

a country. The natives advanced to oppose the landing; but they were soon obliged to give way before the Spanish swords and musquetry; upon which Nunez proceeded to the island which he had lately quitted, and ordered timber to be cut down for building two other vessels, sending for more pitch and cordage to Acla, and charging the messenger to get certain information whether Lopez de Sofa had been actually appointed governor of Darien, as was reported.

THE resolution to build two more brigantines, and the new expedition intended, occasioned some suspicion that Nunez designed to render himself independent on his father-in-law Arias d'Avila; the suspicion was propagated, until it at length reached the ears of that gentleman, who gave easy credit to the report, because he was sensible of having injured Nunez. He is likewise said to have received a letter from one Garabeto, a soldier; who overheard some expressions dropped by Nunez, which he misinterpreted, or designedly misunderstood, with a view of gaining the governor's confidence. However this may be, it is certain that an animosity between the father and son-in-law broke out with more violence than ever, though Arias artfully concealed his sentiments until he got Nunez in his power; which he effected by writing him a friendly letter, as if he was desirous of consulting him upon something of importance. He was then deeply engaged in fitting out his little squadron; but he immediately laid aside his employment to obey the orders of his superior, set out for Darien without suspicion, was imprisoned, tried, condemned, and beheaded, all in the space of a few days; for which act of inhuman injustice Arias was never brought to any account: on the contrary, he was continued in the government, notwithstanding the proofs of his misconduct, and the signal services of the person whose blood he had wantonly spilled.

Expedition of Cordova to Yucatan and Florida.

IT was previous to this melancholy event, that the scarcity which prevailed at Darien, occasioned an edict from the governor, declaring all persons who were desirous of pushing their fortune in other parts of the world, at liberty to depart. In consequence of which, an hundred persons, above the vulgar rank, embarked for Cuba, where the new colony was reported to live extremely happily under the government of Velaquez. They were well received, and promises given them by the governor, that he would embrace the first opportunity of promoting their interest. Soon after the proposal was made to them of going upon discoveries towards new countries, lying upon each side of the entrance to the gulph of Mexico, of which the Spaniards at that time had scarce any knowledge. The proposal was embraced: Hernandez de Cordova, celebrated for his wealth, valour, and public spirit, offered to command the expedition; fitted out two vessels, with all the necessary stores, at his own expence, and set sail from the Havannah, with 110 able-bodied volunteers, on the 8th day of February. On the 1st of March they saw land, and could descry a large town, about two leagues from the ocean. When they approached nearer the shore, two canoes, full of men, came on board, and were civilly received. The Indians were dressed in short cotton jackets without sleeves, and pieces of cloth wrapped round their extremities, sufficient to convince the Spaniards that they had made some little progress in the arts; tho' it was apparent that the dress, arms, ships, and beards, of the Europeans, were great novelties. Next day the cazique, with twelve canoes filled with men, approached the ships, crying out Conez Cotoche, come to my house; whence the Spaniards gave the name Cotoche to this cape, which lies opposite, and at no great distance from the western extremity of the island of Cuba. So pressing was the cazique in his instances, and such was the shew of friendship made by the Indians, that Cordova yielded to their intreaties, went on shore, and was surrounded by an army of Indians that poured out of a neighbouring wood. They were cased in armour of quilted cotton, armed with targets, wooden swords having flint edges, wooden cutlasses, spears, slings, and bows, and adorned with plumes of feathers and a kind of paint, with which they discoloured their faces, and rendered themselves very hideous. They began the attack with terrible shrieks and howling, to which they joined the noise of several unmusical instruments, pouring in upon the Spaniards full showers of arrows and spears. Cordova's men did not exceed twenty-five; but they made so brave a defence, and plied their fire-arms with so much dexterity, that the Indians, affrighted with the dreadful thunder, were defeated, leaving seventeen dead, and several wounded, on the field of battle. Two of the prisoners afterwards became proselytes to the Christian faith, and were baptized by the names of Julian and Melchior. Near the field the Spaniards discovered three houses, built with stone and mortar, which they found to be temples filled with earthen idols with hideous faces, and other terrible ugly images, which they contained. There were the images of women, of men in unnatural lascivious postures, and small idols made of wood, with plates, ornaments, and diadems of gold.

FROM this country Cordova proceeded to the bay of Campeche, called Quampech by the natives, where he watered. When the Spaniards were returning to their ships, fifty Indians clothed in jackets, over which they wore long cotton mantles, interrogated them by signs, whether they came from the eastward, and what they wanted, inviting them to their town, at a little distance. The Spaniards were disposed to comply with the invitation; and after putting themselves in a posture of defence, entered some temples, which they found decorated with idols of such deformity as almost terrified them, stained with blood fresh shed, as was supposed, from human victims, and filled with crosses and other emblems of the Roman Catholic faith, which occasioned great astonishment. The people flocked round, beheld the strangers with signs of wonder, and often smiled, as if in admiration of the simplicity and uncouth appearance of the Spaniards. From the temples issued ten priests, covered with long white mantles, resembling surplices, with long black hair plaited up, and in their hands little earthen fire-pans, upon which they burnt a certain gum they called Copal, and perfumed the Spaniards, bidding them leave that country, if they valued their lives. They had no sooner given this warning, than they sounded their warlike instruments, which the Spaniards taking for a signal for the Indians to assemble, retreated to their ships, being pursued only by a few detached parties.

HAVING sailed six days along the coast, the great scarcity of water on board obliged Cordova to put ashore in a bay about a league distant from a town called Polonchau, where the Spaniards observed temples built with stone and lime, in the same manner as the former. Then they were accosted by several armed men, who, after asking divers questions, went back to their houses, and soon returned with great numbers, who began to attack the Spaniards with great fury. To attempt a retreat was dangerous, and nothing remained but the utmost exertion of their courage to oppose such a multitude of Indians. The whole night was spent in fresh skirmishing; and in the morning Cordova perceived that he was hedged by enemies; who were continually increasing, and pouring in showers of stones, darts, and arrows. Near eighty of his men were already wounded; and though they plied their fire-arms and swords with the greatest vigour and address, it was apparent they must soon be overwhelmed in the torrent of Indians that rushed upon them from all quarters. The general cry was Colachini, or leader; meaning that they should take aim at Cordova; which they did so effectually as to wound him in twelve different, Cemara^b says, in thirty-three, different places; upon which he determined at all events to regain the shipping; and accordingly broke through the enemy with desperate resolution, got on board the boats, which were ready to sink with their numbers; the Indians pursuing with loud cries, and running into the water to wound the Spaniards with their spears. In this action Cordova had forty-seven men killed on the spot, five more dying of their wounds on board, which occasioned his giving this bay the name of de Mala Pelea, on account of the unfortunate issue of the engagement with the Indians. Hence he steered for the coast of Florida, the crew almost perishing with thirst; and upon his landing to water, was attacked by Indians greatly resembling those of Yucatan, from whom he extricated himself with an inconsiderable loss, and sailed to the Havannah, then called Port Carenas, without having made any acquisition of gold, or indeed any discoveries with respect to the native commodities of Yucatan and Florida, though the voyage was greatly celebrated on account of the earthen and wooden idols, the golden plates, the diadems, the manners, and the arms of the inhabitants, all which convinced the Spaniards that important consequences might result from this unfortunate enterprize. The Indian prisoners they had taken confirmed this opinion, by declaring that the country produced gold, though further experience has shewn that neither Yucatan nor Florida produce any mines of the precious metal (D).

A. D. 1518. CORDOVA died of the wounds he received from the Indians a few days after his return to Cuba; but the account of the expedition, which he drew up on his death-bed, and transmitted to Velaquez, determined that gentleman to prosecute the discovery; for which purpose he equipped three ships and a brigantine, manned with 250 volunteers, and appointed John de Grijalva to command in chief, assisted by Alaminos, principal pilot in Cordova's expedition. Grijalva's instructions were to barter for gold, contract alliances, gain the best account possible of the country, and, some writers add, to settle a colony, if he could with convenience, though las Casas denies this last circumstance. The squadron sailed from St. Jago on the 8th of April 1518, and in a few days fell in with the island of Cozumel, then first discovered, where the Spaniards saw a town, several temples built of stone, and one in particular in form of a square tower, with windows, galleries, idols, and

^b HERRER. dec. ii. l. i. c. 3.

(D) A Spanish writer, who was upon this expedition, acquaints us, that the name Yucatan comes from Yuca, of the root of which the Indians make Cazabi bread, and Ilutly, signifying the land where the Yuca grows; which was the constant answer made by the natives, when the Spaniards inquired after the root.

Hence he deduces the compound Yucotta; and by corruption Yucatan (1). Other etymologists (2) derive the name from an Indian town called Talaquitlan, which the Spaniards pronounced Lucatan; whence comes Yucatan.

- a a large cross erected in the middle; concerning which Herrera relates a prophecy that has all the appearance of being fabulous; by which, however, he would account in what manner crosses came to be erected in divers parts of America and the West-Indies, before the arrival of the Spaniards, or the Indians had any idea of Christianity. As the natives had fled to the mountains, and all endeavours to establish an intercourse with them proved fruitless, Grijalva reembarked, and kept on his course along the coast, being greatly astonished at the great number of white towers, handsomely built of stone, which he saw upon the island and continent. It was this circumstance that occasioned his bestowing the appellation of New Spain upon the province of Yucatan, which was afterwards extended to all Mexico, and indeed the greater part of the Spanish dominions upon that side the equator.
- b After sailing for the space of eight days, Grijalva entered the gulph of Mexico further, and landed at some distance from the capital of Pontonchon's dominions; a cazique subject to the emperor of Mexico. The Indians opposed the debarkation, and an engagement commenced, in which Grijalva, with sixty Spaniards, were wounded, and three killed, though the Indians were in the issue defeated, with the loss of 200 men; after which he took possession of the town, deserted by all the inhabitants.

He then proceeded to the river Tabasco, to which he gave the name of Rio de Grijalva, and landed with some men. The Indians did not oppose the debarkation; but they soon surrounded the boats with fifty canoes filled with armed men, adorned with plumes of feathers. Grijalva, unwilling to come to blows, sent the two Indians taken by Cordova, and c baptized by the names of Melchior and Julian, to acquaint the Tabascans, that his desire was to establish a friendly intercourse, that might prove mutually beneficial. This produced a parley, which was soon improved into a solid peace, by means of the beads, glasses, and other toys, presented by the Spaniards, and conveyed by the Indians to their cazique, who ordered all manner of provision to be sent to the strangers. Next day he visited Grijalva in person, and without hesitation went on board his ship, giving him as a present a complete suit of gold armour, a wooden helmet plated with gold, studded with stones resembling emeralds; and beautifully wrought, several breast-plates, some of solid gold, and others of wood, plaited thinly with gold, coverings for targets of solid gold, six collars of beaten gold, bracelets, ear-rings, and pendants of the same, all of great value; which

d Grijalva acknowledged by dressing the cazique in a sort of fine linen, a coat of crimson velvet, a cap of the same materials, beads and glasses of different colours, scissars, knives, and other trinkets, which the cazique prized above all the gold in Montezuma's empire (E); for he was a subject of that great monarch; as will appear in the sequel. What most astonished the Spaniards was the ingenious workmanship of the gold ornaments, and particularly of a shield, covered with feathers of beautiful colours, and elegantly disposed; which distinguished both taste and a progress in the fine arts. Many were greatly disposed to remain in a country that exhibited such proofs of wealth and liberality in the inhabitants; but it was apparent, notwithstanding the cazique's civility, that he was not at all inclined to favour a colony, which determined Grijalva to embark,

e as he found the people were too powerful to admit of any attempts to establish himself by violence. As he sailed along the shore, the Indians were seen on the coast in a warlike posture, with shields of tortoise-shell, which by the reflection of the sun's beams made a brilliant and martial appearance. The country seemed to be extremely populous, quite to the river Guazacoalca, and in many places the natives held up flags of cotton, upon long poles, as signals to the Spaniards to land; which at last tempted Grijalva to send Francisco de Mentejo ashore with twenty soldiers; all the cross-bow men and musqueteers, with orders that if he found the Indians in a hostile disposition, he should give immediate notice to the shipping. It was afterwards found that an account had been sent to Montezuma, and the court of Mexico, of the descent made by Cordova, of the actions at Cotoche

f and Potouchan, and of Grijalva's touching upon the coast, by means of painted cotton cloths; and that the emperor perceiving the Spaniards only wanted gold, had issued orders to his subjects to enter upon an intercourse with them, and penetrate into their ultimate designs. When Mentejo approached the Indians, they offered him fowls, fish, bread, and fruits of different kinds, and perfumed him with the smoke of burnt Copal. These civilities induced Grijalva to draw up closer with the ships, and debark, attended by several Spaniards, who were curious to inquire into the manners of the people, and full of expectation of sharing in the presents of those savages, who appeared to be equally wealthy and generous, if they might judge from the behaviour of the cazique of Tabasco. Accordingly

(E) Antonio de Solis censures Herrera for giving credit to this account of Gomara, an author whom he rejects upon other occasions; yet we must confess we see nothing improbable in the relation, if we suppose that Montezuma had given orders to the governors to receive the Spaniards civilly; which is corroborated by the opinion, that all the gold had been sent from the city of Mexico, Yucatan producing none of the precious metal. L. i. c. vi.

Grijalva was no sooner landed, than he was met by the governors, and received with the most profound respect. An exchange and traffic began, which, in the space of six days, brought the Spaniards fifteen thousand pieces of eight; profits that by no means corresponded with the extravagant hopes of the sailors.

CONTINUING his voyage, Grijalva met with several islands, to which he gave names from their several appearances. One he called Isla Blanca; another la Verde; and another he called The Island of Sacrifices, because he found that human victims had been immolated at the shrines of certain idols, just before his arrival. Touching at St. Juan d'Uva, he marched up with thirty men to a temple filled with idols, and inhabited by four priests clad in long black stoles with hoods, who had just done sacrificing two boys, agreeable to their impious and inhuman superstition. The Spaniards were moved with horror and compassion upon sight of the children, whose bodies were ript open, hearts taken out, and offered at the altars of their false divinities. It was from this place that Grijalva dispatched intelligence of his discoveries to the governor of Cuba, who now was exceedingly incensed that he had not founded a colony, notwithstanding his instructions were express, that he should only trade, and make discoveries, if we may credit Herrera. This indeed had been proposed by Grijalva, and debated in council, but over-ruled by Montejo and Alonso d'Avila, who were of opinion that the consequences of a miscarriage might prove fatal to them, as all attempts to build houses and make settlements were contrary to their express orders; which determined Grijalva to return to Cuba, after he had visited the coasts of divers Mexican provinces, before undiscovered, and traded to a considerable value with the natives.

PEDRO DE ALVARADO was the person sent by Grijalva with an account of the success of the expedition to Velaquez, who was transported at the sight of the gold, and elated with discoveries upon which he hoped to build his fortune, and raise himself to independance on the admiral Diego de Colon, his superior in command. A rivalry had long subsisted between these two gentlemen, which was the means of inspiring Velaquez with the first notion of Grijalva's enterprize, and now confirmed him in the resolution of prosecuting discoveries that in all probability would raise his fortune and reputation above all competition. Perceiving that Grijalva's obedience to his instructions proved an obstruction to the progress of his vast designs, he was extremely offended that he had not established a colony in a country where he was so well received, without reflecting that Grijalva, in this, obeyed his orders, contrary to his own opinion. Before the return of the commander, he begun to make preparations for another expedition, and had already communicated his intention to the clergy of Hispaniola, in order to sanctify it by their approbation, resolving the direction should be committed to a person of courage, distinction, and ability; but withal so obedient and pliable, as to entertain no other ambition than that of promoting the glory and interest of his benefactor and superior; which, says a good writer of those times, was to seek for a commander of great courage, and a mean spirit. When Grijalva returned, the voice of the people recommended him to this trust; but Velaquez was strongly prejudiced, though he could not be insensible to his merit, when he perused the written account delivered by that officer of his expedition, and heard his modest defence: however, though he determined not to bestow the command on Grijalva, it was difficult to fix his choice amidst the number of deserving competitors. Antonio and Bernardino Velaquez, both nearly allied to the governor, Balthazar Bermudez and Vasco Porcallo, with other gentlemen of unexceptionable character, were all ambitious of leading an enterprize which opened the prospect of a fruitful harvest in glory and riches; when at length Velaquez was influenced by the insinuations of his favourite Amador de Loris, the king's treasurer, and the intimate friend of Hernand Cortez. Cortez was popular, generous, liberal, and intrepid: at this time he acted in the capacity of alcade, had acquired a considerable fortune, and given proofs of his merit; but as he had formerly been at variance with the governor, nothing less than the powerful arguments of de Loris, and Velaquez's extreme anxiety about the issue of the enterprize, could triumph over the strong opposition made by the other candidates. In the end every difficulty gave way, Cortez was nominated to the command; and he pushed his preparations with so much vigour, that, in a few days after he received the command, he was ready to set sail, as the reader may see in the ensuing section.

AS the conquest of Mexico is one of the most extraordinary and entertaining events recorded in history, we shall dwell more minutely upon the expedition of Cortez, than was deemed necessary in the relation of voyages, which led the way to this vast acquisition to the power of the Spanish monarchy. This hero atchieved, by a handful of men, the overthrow of a vast empire. He surmounted difficulties, he encountered dangers, fought battles, and gained victories not inferior to those recorded of the most renowned warriors of antiquity; and happily for his memory, his actions are described by the elegant pen of Antonio de Solis, a writer, in our opinion, no way inferior to Thucydides or Livy, except some few strokes of the marvellous admitted into his relation, which we shall endeavour to remove, by comparing him diligently with other historians who have wrote upon the same subject. To our account of the conquest we shall subjoin an explicit description of the kingdom of Mexico, of the manners, religion, government, wealth, arts, and other particulars relating to the inhabitants, many hints of which shall however be disseminated through the course of the historical narration. Account of Cortez.

THAT our readers may not be entirely unacquainted with the birth of this famous conqueror, it will be necessary to mention, that he was a native of Medillin, a town of Estremadura in Spain, and the son of Martin Cortez of Monroy, and donna Catalina Pizarro Altamirino; names which sufficiently bespeak the nobility of his parentage, at least by the mother. He was bred a scholar, and had spent two years at Salamanca; but a studious life not suiting his lively and active genius, he obtained his father's permission to engage in the service of his country, and learn the rudiments of the military art, under the celebrated Gonzalvo de Cordova, then at the head of a Spanish army in Italy; but a dangerous illness with which he was seized, just on the point of embarkation, frustrated this design, and turned his views towards the West-Indies, where the Spaniards were reaping a plentiful harvest of wealth and glory. In the year 1504 he went to Hispaniola, being then in the 19th year of his age, and was particularly distinguished by Obando the governor, to whom he had been strongly recommended. After gaining the general esteem of the colony, he attended Velaquez in quality of secretary to the island of Cuba, where he soon established the reputation of an able statesman and commander, a brave soldier, a generous friend, and an agreeable companion. De Solis acquaints us, that his person was pleasing, his countenance engaging, his temper amiable, and his conversation discreet; qualities which first attracted the notice, and engaged the affections of donna Catharina Suarez Pacheco. His engagements with this noble lady involved Cortez in many difficulties, and produced an altercation with Velaquez, which had almost proved fatal to his life; though he afterwards recovered the governor's favour. When all differences were accommodated, Velaquez not only gave away the bride, but bestowed lands upon Cortez, and distinguished him by raising him to the office of alcade of St. Jago, an employment usually conferred upon such as had exhibited incontestable proofs of merit. In these circumstances were our hero, when he was appointed to conduct the expedition to Yucatan and the coast of Mexico, by the title of captain general of the fleet, and of the countries already discovered, or that should henceforward be conquered under his auspices. Sensibly affected with this mark of the governor's confidence, he received the charge with great expressions of respect and acknowledgement; though Herrera dates his ambition and ingratitude to his benefactor from this period (A). The preference shewn Cortez disgusted all his competitors, and made them seize every opportunity of raising scruples and exciting jealousies in the mind of the governor. They reminded Velaquez of the early proofs of ambition and ingratitude which Cortez had exhibited; they ripped up all the sores occasioned by their ancient animosity, and put the most invidious gloss on all the actions of this object of their malignity; they accused Cortez of the meanest hypocrisy, the most daring and presumptuous ambition; even in his courtesy and liberality they discovered an artifice, which they alledged was but too obvious to all who were not deceived by the semblance of real virtue. In a word, they insisted that Cortez had not effaced the chagrin of his former sufferings and imprisonment, and they wished Velaquez to consider this circumstance maturely before it was too late to repair an error that might prove fatal to his honour and to his life, as well as to the public service, and the interests of religion and his country. At first Velaquez received these remonstrances as the effusions of malice and disappointed ambition, assisting Cortez in his preparations, and taking leave of him in the most friendly manner when he was ready to depart from St. Jago. This, at least, is the relation given by Antonio de Solis; although Herrera, and other Spanish writers, affirm, that Cortez stole away privately in the night, upon some intimation that the governor intended to recal his commission; and that upon Velaquez's pursuing him in the morning, he manned a boat, met the governor in a posture of defiance, and acquainted him in the most disrespectful manner, that he would pay no farther regard to his orders^b.

(A) The relations of Herrera and de Solis are extremely contradictory in this, and a variety of other particulars, notwithstanding they appear to have consulted the same authorities. The former, under the appearance of the strictest impartiality, taxes Cortez with the basest ingratitude, by making him the first aggressor, and asserting that he threw off his obedience before Velaquez entertained any suspicion of his fidelity, or the least notion of superseding him in the command (1); whereas de Solis, the admirer of Cortez, and indeed his panegyrist, vindicates the reputation of his hero, and throws the whole blame on Velaquez, in the manner recited in the text: at this distance of time we cannot pretend to ascertain the exact truth of asseverations.

from St. Jago.*

On the 18th day of November the fleet sailed from the port of St. Jago, and arrived in a few days at the port of La Trinidad; where Cortez no sooner published the design of the expedition, than he was reinforced by a great number of volunteers, many of them persons of the best fashion on the island, which furnished his enemies with fresh arguments to impeach his fidelity, and poison the governor's mind with distrust and jealousy. Cortez had engaged so many adventurers to share in his fortune by his obliging behaviour, that his disappointed rivals found it no difficult matter to succeed in their design of ruining him with Velaquez. The opportunity was favourable, and they pressed their instances with so specious an appearance of disinterestedness, that the governor at length yielded to their persuasion, and sent two couriers, with letters to all his confidants, and express orders to Francisco Verdugo, chief alcade of La Trinidad, to prosecute Cortez in a judicial way, and deprive him of the command. Cortez had notice of what was transacting; upon which he immediately assembled his friends and soldiers, informed them of the machinations of his enemies, desired their advice in what manner he should proceed, and to know how far he might depend upon the justice of his cause by the judgment they should pass on his conduct. There needed nothing more to engage the soldiers to make protestations of eternal attachment to his person and fortune. He found them united in his interest, and determined to defend him against so gross an injury, even at the hazard of taking arms, and coming to an open rupture with the governor; upon which he visited the alcade, informed him of the danger to which he should expose himself by obeying orders so iniquitous, disgusting so many persons of distinction as had engaged in the expedition out of friendship to him, and drawing upon himself the indignation of the soldiers, whose affections he studied to gain, the better to promote the public service. He already found it difficult, he said, to restrain their fury within the bounds of obedience; and he could not be answerable for the consequence, should the alcade proceed to the execution of his instructions. Verdugo was a person of sense and candor; he was sensible of the injustice of the governor's orders, of the merit of Cortez, of the danger which would attend any attempts to supersede him, and of the detriment which the public would sustain from the divisions which must infallibly ensue. He told Cortez, that he would not only suspend the execution of his orders, but use his utmost endeavours to dissuade Velaquez from his resolution, in which he was joined by all the other gentlemen in the town and fleet, who had any influence with the governor. All of them wrote to Velaquez, and Cortez accompanied their remonstrances with a letter from himself, complaining, in the gentlest terms, of the governor's distrust, of the confidence he reposed in his enemies, and the facility with which he listened to calumnies raised by disappointed ambition.

*Cortez ar-

HAVING taken all the measures which he thought necessary to his own security, and sufficient to quiet all the scruples entertained by Velaquez, he set sail for the Havannah, and was separated from the fleet in a storm, and in great danger of being shipwrecked. All the other ships arriving safe at the place of rendezvous, and no account coming of Cortez for the space of a week the adventurers were divided in opinion, some regarding him as lost, others advising that vessels might be sent in search of him, and a few proposing that a commander should be appointed in his absence. Of this last opinion was Diego de Ordaz, who, as the friend and confidant of Velaquez, thought he would bid fair to be confirmed in this post if he were once nominated by the soldiers. In this project, he was, however, disappointed by the arrival of Cortez who was received by the joyful acclamations of the soldiers, and the warmest testimonies of esteem from Pedro de Barba, governor of the city. He set up his standard, and was immediately joined by several gentlemen who had already approved their valour, which gave great reputation to the expedition, and facilitated a the equipment of the fleet. He sent the artillery on shore to be cleaned and proved, gave orders for a great number of cotten quilts, in the form of great coats, which were called Escapilles, as a defence against the arrows of the Indians, exercised his soldiers in the use of fire-arms and cross-bows, taught them the several evolutions necessary in action, the method of advancing, retreating, forming into large and small divisions, charging; in a word, all the elements of the military art in the most concise method. Every thing was at last in great forwardness, and the day fixed for the departure of the fleet, when orders arrived to the governor of the Havannah to supersede Cortez, and send him prisoner to St. Jago, with threats and menaces to enforce the punctual execution of these instructions: but Velaquez was no better obeyed in this than on the former occasion. Even the very b courier, who had brought the order, gave Cortez notice, and he had informations from several quarters, that a design was on foot extremely injurious to his honour, and dangerous to his liberty. Cortez was extremely incensed at this new attempt, because he thought he had given all reasonable security of his fidelity, and furnished no room for suspicion. Convinced of the implacable resentment of his enemies, he now began with less temper to think of providing for himself, and throwing off that obedience, the observance of which might prove the ruin of himself and scheme, so promising to the public emolument. When he reflected upon the indignities he had sustained, he blamed his own patience, and believed that the virtue of obedience might be carried to a criminal excess, as if arising from pusillanimity. This determined him to come to an open rupture with c Velaquez, from whom he had nothing to fear, as he was certain of the affections of his soldiers under his command. His first step was to remove from the Havannah Diego de Ordaz, whose fidelity and attachment he had reason to suspect ever since he had proposed himself as commander of the expedition. He then shewed himself to the soldiers, and acquainted them with the new persecution to which he was exposed by the virulence of his enemies; upon which they made the same declarations as before, and became so tumultuous, that it was with difficulty he could restrain their flying to arms; nor could all his endeavours silence their clamorous zeal, until Pedro Barba protested publicly, that he would not execute his orders, or have any share in so flagrant an act of injustice and oppression, with which the soldiers were immediately appeased, and their menaces converted into joyful

d acclamations. Barba shewed the sincerity of his intentions by excusing himself to Velaquez for not interposing in an affair of such delicate consequence, remonstrating upon the impropriety of any attempts against an officer so beloved by his people; and representing, in the strongest terms, the commotions excited among the soldiers by the report of the injury intended to their commander; concluding with pathetic admonitions, that Velaquez would endeavour to regain Cortez by acts of friendship and generosity, and rely upon his gratitude for what could be accomplished neither by threats, force, nor persuasion.

THIS difficulty being surmounted, Cortez divided his men into eleven companies, embarking one in each vessel, appointed captains to each, reserved to himself the command of the largest ship, the Capitana, bestowed the chief direction of the artillery on Francisco de Orozco, a soldier who had distinguished himself in Italy; and appointed for his chief e pilot Antonio de Alaminos, the same person who had accompanied Cordova and Grijalva to the coast of Mexico, in the expeditions recited in the last section. He next drew up instructions for all his officers, in which he provided against contingencies with admirable sagacity, stamped an impression of his prudence on the minds of his soldiers, and afforded a happy presage of the success of the expedition, from the wisdom and caution with which it was concerted. On the 10th day of February he quitted the port of the Havannah, put out to sea, and was soon overtaken in a storm; during which he displayed every quality of a vigilant able commander, and was the chief instrument in saving one of the ships which had lost her rudder in the tempest. The island of Cozumel was the place appointed f for the rendezvous of the fleet in case of separation; and here Pedro d'Alvarado first arrived. This officer had been dispatched with his ship in search of Diego d'Ordaz, towards the north coast; but missing his course, he steered for Cozumel, and landed near a small town, which he remembered since the voyage he performed with Grijalva. Finding it deserted, and that the Indians had fled farther into the country, Alvarado, imagining that inaction in a soldier was want of virtue, marched with a party of his men to survey the country, and came to another town, which was likewise deserted by the inhabitants. This he pillaged, seizing upon all the provisions he could find, destroying the idols in a temple, and despoiling them of all their gold ornaments, and whatever came in his way that appeared to be valuable, without once recollecting that he was injuring the service, by terrifying the g Indians, giving them bad impressions of the Spaniards, and frustrating the design of Cortez, never to use violence, where good usage and persuasion could effect the same purposes. With this booty, and a few prisoners, he returned to the place of debarkation, where he was joined the next day by Cortez and the fleet. Upon relating his conduct, he was publickly censured by the general, and the prisoners were dismissed, after they had been informed by the Indian interpreter Melchior, of whom we have before made mention, how disagreeable the injuries done them were to Cortez, and how contrary to the general intention of the expedition, which was to cultivate friendship and form alliances, with all the Indian nations. All the booty taken by Alvarado's soldiers was likewise restored, and some presents were made to the captives, in hopes that their account to their countrymen, of the behaviour of the Spaniards, might produce an intercourse.

CORTÉZ now encamped for three days on the coast, lest his advancing further into the country might give fresh disturbance to the natives, before the relation of the captives could work the expected effect. This time he employed in mustering his army, which he found amounted to five hundred and eight soldiers, sixteen horsemen, and an hundred and nine mechanics, pilots, and mariners, including the crew of Diego d'Ordaz, who had now joined him in consequence of another message. When the muster was finished, he harangued the army in a lively animating speech, in which he enumerated the difficulties thrown in their way by the malice of his enemies, the happy presage which his triumph afforded, the importance of the expedition, the perils and toils which they must expect to encounter in the pursuit of riches and glory. "I have no design, says he, to diminish the danger of our undertaking. We are to expect bloody engagements, incredible fatigues, and such multitudes of enemies, as will require the full exertion of all your valour; but the glory of conquest will be the greater. You have been accustomed to fight, and to endure hardships in those islands which you have already subdued: our present undertaking is of greater importance; we must pursue it with proportionable vigour, and square our courage and resolution to the difficulty of our enterprize. We are but few in number; but union multiplies armies, and in our agreement consists our strength. We must, my companions, be all of one mind to resolve, and as one hand to execute; our interests are the same, and the glory of conquest shall be equally distributed among the deserving. The valour of each individual must establish the security of all in general. I am your commander, and will be the first to hazard my life for the meanest of my soldiers. Let it be your care to merit my regard, and rather to follow my example than my orders. I find in myself a courage able to execute the most difficult enterprize, and sufficient to undertake the conquest of the whole world: my heart even flatters me with this hope, from I know not what extraordinary impulse, the most agreeable of all presages. In a word, let our professions be succeeded by actions; and let not this confidence of mine be reckoned temerity, since it is so well supported by you, from whom I expect that all deficiencies in myself shall be supplied."

WHILE he was thus exhorting and animating his soldiers with all the eloquence of a Julius Cæsar, notice was brought that the Indians began to appear at a distance, in small parties, unarmed; which, however, did not prevent Cortez from putting himself in a posture of defence, and guarding against being surprised; however, the men were ranged behind the lines, that they might not present a hostile appearance, or discourage the natives from advancing. This gradually drew them on, until some of the more resolute ventured to enter the camp, where they were so kindly received, that they called to their companions to follow their example. The Indians flocked now in great numbers, mingled without fear with the Spaniards, and beheld every thing with signs of wonder and amazement; though, upon the whole, they appeared to be conversant with strangers, as was highly probable, from an idol kept in this island, extremely revered by the Indians of the continent. Next day Cortez was honoured with a visit from the cazique, and a present, which he received with profound acknowledgments and testimonies of his great inclination to cultivate a perpetual friendship with so respectable a prince: to which the Indian replied, that he accepted the friendship offered, and would preserve it as a man who understood the value of the gift. It was during this visit, that Cortez accidentally got intelligence of certain Spaniards who were detained prisoners in Yucatan, since the former expeditions to that country. He had overheard one of the Indians, in the cazique's retinue, repeat the word Castilla; and ordering the interpreter to inquire into the Indian's meaning, was told, that his men very much resembled certain prisoners kept in Yucatan, who said they were natives of a country called Castilla. Upon farther inquiry Cortez found, that the captive Spaniards were in the hands of certain Indians of the first quality, residing two days journey within the province. He expressed his resolution to the cazique of setting them at liberty, and was advised to attempt it by ransom; lest, if violence were used, their neighbours might be compelled to massacre them out of fear or resentment: a caution, which gave Cortez a high opinion of the good sense and policy of the Indian prince. Accordingly, Diego de Ordaz was ordered with his vessel to the coast of Yucatan, with a letter from Cortez to the prisoners, and presents for their ransom, to which some Indians undertook to bring back an answer in eight days; but the time being expired, a expired, Ordaz returned without his business, imagining that he had been deluded and cheated of the presents, and that either no Spaniard was detained at Yucatan, or that no attempt was made to procure his release. This was the source of real concern to Cortez; who, besides the pleasure of setting countrymen and christians at liberty, entertained great hopes from the services of the captives as interpreters, as it was probable they must have acquired the language of the country; but before he had quitted Cozumel, he was joined by the Indian messengers, who very honourably discharged their commission, though they were retarded by accidents, and brought back with them the prisoner, whose name was Jerom de Aguilar. As this person was greatly instrumental in the conquest of Mexico, we shall give an abstract of his adventures.

b ACCORDING to Aguilar's account, he had lived near eight years among the Indians, having been shipwrecked as he was passing from Darien to Hispaniola, and escaping with twenty more in a long boat, driven on the coast of Yucatan, where they were carried to a country of Caribbee Indians. The plumpest of his countrymen were sacrificed to their idols, and afterwards feasted upon by the savages, while his own leanness proved the means of his safety. He was cooped up in a cage to fatten against the next festival before which he fortunately made his escape; and after wandering several days, remote from all settlements, without any other nourishment than herbs and roots, fell into the hands of certain Indians, who presented him to the cazique, by whom, after some severe usage, and trials of his patience and ability, he was raised to the highest offices, and the command of armies. He had obtained several victories over the enemies of the cazique, and acquired such power and popularity, that at the time the Indian messengers arrived with his ransom, he was in a condition to demand his liberty as the reward of his extraordinary services.

Recovers a Spaniard detained prisoner in Yucatan.

WHILE the Indian messengers were employed at the court of the cazique, and treating for the release of Aguilar, Cortez was not idle. He marched with his whole army to take a view of the island; rather with design to preserve discipline, and keep the soldiers in action, than from any apprehension of an attack from the natives, who seemed extremely delighted with the behaviour of the Spaniards. He dissuaded his men from offering violence, by representing the poverty of the people, which could afford no temptation to break through the regulations of discipline, and the laws of hospitality. He told them, b that here they were to stamp that impression of their characters, which must strongly influence the success of all their future undertakings, as the reputation they acquired in Cozumel would soon be diffused over the continent; and he concluded with observing, that the fame of their integrity, humanity, and generosity, would promote their interest, and extend their conquests, more powerfully than the sword. He suffered them, however, to barter trinkets with the Indians in exchange for gold and provisions, by which means the army was abundantly supplied with all the necessaries which the country afforded. Cortez likewise visited the temple of the supreme idol; and was astonished to find the architecture not despicable. The idol was a human figure of a terrible aspect; and, indeed, this circumstance of deformity was religiously observed among the divinities of all degrees worshipped by this ignorant people. The island is said to have taken the name of Cozumel e from this great idol, so much revered by all the adjacent nations, and particularly in Mexico, from which the island is situated only at the distance of a few leagues. The temple was crowded with Indians, in the midst of whom stood a priest, distinguished by a part of a covering just sufficient to hide his nakedness, who seemed to be exhorting the audience, and preaching with an emphatic tone and action, extremely ridiculous to the Spaniards. Cortez took this opportunity of instructing the cazique in such points of the doctrines of christianity, as he imagined were best suited to his capacity. He demonstrated to him the absurdity of his own religion, and made so deep an impression on the mind of this prince, that, instead of returning an answer, he desired to consult with the priest and people. But f it was not so easy to satisfy the mind of the priest, who perceiving that his interest was deeply concerned in supporting the imposture, made loud outcries against all innovation, and threatened the reformers with the vengeance of the gods, if they did not immediately desist from so impious a design: however, the soldiers, overturning the altar, and defacing the idol, the Indians began to wonder that the gods did not interpose; they beheld the heavens were still serene, that the promised vengeance was delayed, and soon changed their adoration into contempt for those gods, who, not being able to vindicate themselves, could afford but little protection to their votaries. Upon this the Spaniards erected an altar, on which they placed the image of the virgin Mary, and fixed a cross at the entrance of the temple, and thinking they had by this act exhibited full proofs of the truths of revelation, departed, leaving the natives in silent astonishment at the wonders they saw wrought. g

By the 4th of March the troops being embarked, Cortez sailed with his whole fleet directly for the coast of Yucatan, and doubling Cape Catoche, arrived safe in the river of Grijalva, Mod. Hist. Vol. XIV.

Destroys the idols of the islanders.

Tabasco, where he expected to meet with the same kind reception from the Indians of Tabasco,^a which the Spaniards met with in the late expedition. The gold likewise brought from that country made the soldiers extremely earnest in their solicitations for leave to go on shore; and Cortez determined to comply, as this he hoped would be the means of establishing a firm alliance with the natives. His intention, however, was only to make a short stay in Tabasco, his thoughts being wholly bent in proceeding to the capital of Mexico; the account of which given by Aguilar and the Indians excited both his curiosity and ambition. Skirmishing in the provinces could only serve to weaken his army and diminish the number of his troops, which should be reserved whole and entire for the most difficult enterprize: besides, the reduction of Tabasco, and other remote provinces, would contribute little towards the conquest of Mexico; the great strength of which was in the capital, and towards the heart of the empire: yet he resolved to gratify the soldiers, and accordingly proceeded to make the best of his way against the current, when a multitude of canoes was observed to line both sides of the river, filled with men completely armed, and giving tokens of hostile intentions. Cortez advanced in close order in his boats, ordering that none should fire until he was commanded; and as soon as he anchored within a proper distance, Aguilar found that he understood their language, and acquainted the general, that the cries of the Indians were menaces and declarations of war, unless he returned to the ships. Aguilar was directed to advance in one of the boats, with proper proposals; but he soon returned with an account, that the Indians were obstinate in their resolution to defend the mouth of the river, and had even insolently refused to hearken to his proposals. Herrera, indeed,^c gives an invidious turn to Cortez's behaviour on this occasion, by affirming, that the Indians only opposed his landing in a hostile manner, and that they supplied him plentifully with provisions; which is denied by De Solis, whose relation is corroborated by the testimony of Diaz del Castillo, who was present in the expedition. According to De Solis, Cortez was averse to a war, because it could bring him no advantage, and must necessarily retard his voyage; but perceiving that he was now engaged in altercation, he thought it might hurt him in the opinion of the soldiers, if he suffered the insolence of the barbarians to pass unpunished. However, after making all the necessary preparations for forcing the enemy, he sent Aguilar a second time, with proposals and assurances, that he had nothing in view but friendly intentions and the mutual advantage of both parties, which were answered by a signal to attack. Cortez had drawn up his fleet of boats in the form of a crescent, towards which the Indians advanced with the power of the current; and when they were within a proper distance, poured such a flight of arrows, as greatly embarrassed the Spaniards to ward off, even with the best of their shields and cotton cloths; but having sustained the first charge, they returned it with a vigour which astonished and broke the Indians, the canoes retiring with great precipitation, and leaving a free passage for the boats to advance. Many were so terrified with the smoke, fire, and noise of the musquetry, and with the death of their companions, that, imagining the heavens were falling, they plunged into the water. In consequence of this advantage, the boats put to shore, and the troops began to debark in a situation so inconvenient, that the Indians recovered their spirits, and renewed the attack, while the Spaniards were almost entirely engaged in disentangling themselves from bushes, briars, and marshes, in which they sunk to the knees. The flights of arrows shot by the Indians increased the difficulty, and rendered the circumstances of Cortez extremely critical; however, his valour and conduct at last triumphed. By his voice and example he animated his men, and without ceasing to maintain his fire, drew up one line, which supported the attack until the rest were formed in battalia, and in a condition to cover the debarkation of the remainder of an hundred men, under Alonso d'Avila, to attack the town of Tabasco; and as soon as the landing was completed, he fell upon the incredible multitude of his enemies with such impetuosity and address, that they yielded to the shock, allowed him to pass the marshes unmolested, and concealed themselves in bushes and thickets. The party under D'Avila had likewise given them the alarm, and contributed to their defeat, as appeared by the swarms who pursued him, and flew to the defence of the city, upon which they imagined he had designs. This furnished Cortez with an opportunity of advancing, without fear, to the assistance of the detachment, which he performed with such celerity, that he arrived at Tabasco before D'Avila, and having joined that officer, gave immediate orders for an assault, before the Indians should have time to recover from their panic, or to reassemble their scattered troops. "Let us follow the victory, cried he, before these barbarians forget their custom of flying before us, or our delay give them time to recollect themselves, and recal their scattered spirits." Saying this he drew his sword, and led the attack. The town was fortified with long stakes, fixed deep in the ground, in the manner of pallisadoes, and so joined, that the Indians had room to discharge their arrows at certain intervals. It had no out-works; but at the joining of the circle, the extremity of one line covered the opening in the other, and a and composed a narrow serpentine street, resembling a spiral line, defended by little wooden towers at the entrances. This was an extreme commodious defence against such arms as were used by the Indians; and it greatly embarrassed the Spaniards too, though it was not proof against artillery, and the refinements in the military art made by European nations. Yet no difficulties could resist the ardor of the Spaniards; they gained the foot of the rampart under a cloud of arrows that darkened the sky, and kept up so perpetual a fire through the intervals, that the Indians deserting their posts, gave the soldiers an opportunity of cutting open a passage in the wall and pursuing to the very heart of the town, where the Indians used their last efforts; but after a short resistance were defeated and dispersed, Tabasco being yielded as the reward of the conquerors. Nor would Cortez pursue them into the woods, that he might give his army time to recover from their fatigue, and the enemy an opportunity of suing for peace. In this action fourteen Spaniards were wounded, but none slain; whereas the slaughter of the enemy was considerable, and their wounded supposed to be still more numerous, though they carried them off; it being a point of honour with the Indians, not to suffer those who have been maimed in action to fall into the hands of the enemy. However, the reduction of Tabasco was of no other value than that it furnished the troops with abundance of provision, the Indians having removed their families, and most valuable effects, before the assault commenced (B).

Reduces the capital, and defeats the Indians in divers engagements.

c THIS night the Spaniards took up their quarters in three temples, situated near that part of the town where they last engaged; and Cortez kept as strict watch as if he had experienced veterans to deal with, and a general who knew how to profit by every opportunity. Next day the country appeared deserted, and round the whole circle of the horizon not a single human figure appeared. The adjacent woods were searched, and found to be equally solitary and abandoned; yet Cortez, apprehensive of some stratagem, did not think it advisable to discontinue his usual caution. The very extraordinary silence that reigned over the whole country raised his suspicions, which were farther confirmed by the desertion of Melchior, the Indian, whom he carried with him to serve for an interpreter. In this uncertainty he detached Alvarado and Francisco de Lugo, each with an hundred men, to examine the country more narrowly, with directions, if they found an army in the field, to return with all expedition to their quarters, in order to avoid engaging with unequal numbers. d After little more than an hour's march, de Lugo was surrounded by a multitude of Indians, who attacked him on all sides with so much fury, that he was forced to draw up his men in a square, presenting a point every way; but as the enemy were continually increasing, he must, in the end, have sunk under the weight of numbers, had not Alvarado, upon hearing the noise of fire-arms, come seasonably to his relief. Alvarado fell upon the rear of the Indians with great impetuosity; and they, surprised at this sudden assault, soon opened him a passage to de Lugo, and retreated. Still, however, there was a numerous body that opposed the retreat of the Spaniards to their quarters, as they had been ordered. Taking breath, therefore, they then attacked the enemy with so much resolution, that they broke their way through, although continually exposed to their arrows, and sometimes e almost borne down with numbers. Whenever the Spaniards faced about, the Indians retreated; and the moment they saw the soldiers again begin their march, renewed their attack with the same astonishing celerity. At last Cortez, who had been advertised of Lugo's distress by a Cuba Indian dispatched by Alvarado, came up with the remainder of the forces; and he was no sooner discovered by the enemy, than they halted, giving the two captains leisure to join the main body. They divided into small parties, yet still maintained a hostile appearance; though Cortez, not caring to waste his strength in skirmishes, retreated to his quarters, to take care of the wounded, of whom there were eleven; a number of great importance, considering the slender strength of the whole army. Upon examining the prisoners who were taken upon this occasion, it was found, that the Indians grounded f their obstinacy upon the assurances of the deserter Melchior, that the Spaniards were but a handful, that they were not immortal, and that their fire-arms, which they mistook for thunder, were less dreadful than they imagined. It was upon the strength of his asseverations they had ventured to attack de Lugo; and Cortez afterwards learned that the barbarians, whom Melchior had persuaded to take arms, having a second time failed in their attempt, revenged themselves on the adviser of the war, by sacrificing him to their idols. The prisoners also related, that all the caziques of the adjacent provinces were summoned to the assistance of the lord of Tabasco, and that next day a very powerful army was to be assembled, of which the body which fell upon Lugo was only a small detachment.

(B) In the recital of this affair, Herrera differs, as usual, from De Solis, not only in the particulars of the action, but with respect to the conduct of Cortez. If we may credit him, the Spanish hero behaved treacherously, surprising Tabasco while he was treating of peace with the Indians: but he seems either to be prejudiced against Cortez, or at least to have borrowed his relation from the enemies of that extraordinary personage. Dec. ii. lib. ii. c. iv.

Upon this intelligence Cortez called a council of his principal officers. He laid before them the difficulties in which they were engaged, the preparations of the Indians to destroy them, and the inequality of their own number; concealing nothing from them of what the prisoners had declared. He then expatiated upon the glory of overcoming such multitudes, their own experience and valour, the nakedness and simplicity of their enemies; but, above all, he insisted upon the ill-consequence that might flow from discovering any symptoms of fear at the menaces of those barbarians, the report of whose triumph might spread as far as Mexico, to the great prejudice of their reputation; a matter of the last importance, as they must expect to conquer that vast empire more by reputation of invincible valour than by dint of arms. In his opinion, therefore, they ought either to abandon all thoughts of the enterprize against New Spain, or proceed no farther till they had established peace with the Tabascans upon the most honourable conditions, or wholly subdued the province. This, however, he urged was only his own opinion, which he would willingly submit to the sentiments of the council. There appeared so much modesty, discretion, and good sense in the general's speech, that all unanimously agreed, it was then impossible to quit their present situation until they had chastised or conquered the inhabitants, without giving the natives unfavourable impressions, which might blast all their future projects. This resolution justified Cortez in his measures; and he accordingly proceeded to make the necessary preparations for giving the enemy a warm reception next morning. The wounded were carried on board, the horses landed, the artillery got in readiness, and such spirits were infused into the troops, as presaged a happy issue to the expected engagement. Committing the infantry to the care of Diego de Ordaz, Cortez marched with the few horse in his army in the front, keeping pace with his artillery, which moved heavily and with great difficulty, because the ground was boggy and uneven. In the morning, mass was performed with great devotion; a religious ceremony which Cortez never omitted, from a conviction that piety, instead of invigorating, inspired resolution and valour, by rendering the soldiers less afraid of the terrors of death. He advanced to the place where, according to the information of the prisoners, the enemies forces were to assemble. This was at the distance of two miles from his quarters; but perceiving not the vestige of a human creature, he proceeded a mile further, to a place called Cintla, and there discovered at a distance the most numerous army he had ever beheld, stretching so far from right to left, that the eye could not take in both extremities. Their weapons were bows and arrows, the bow-strings being made of the tendons of beasts, or twisted thongs of deer-skin, and their arrows armed with bones ground sharp, or pointed fish-bones; for the Indians were all unacquainted with the use of iron. They used also long darts, which they managed according to occasions, either as a pike or javelin. Their swords were so long and heavy, that they were wielded by both hands, made of wood, and edged with flints, as we have elsewhere mentioned of the natives of Yucatan. Some had large clubs, pointed with flints, and great numbers used slings, with which they threw stones with amazing strength and dexterity; but the slingers formed a separate corps, detached from the main army. As to defensive arms, which were only wore by commanders and persons of distinction, they consisted of quilted cotton armour, breast-plates and shields of wood or tortoise-shell, adorned with plates of gold or copper. All painted their faces in the day of action in the most frightful manner, with design to render themselves terrible, as Tacitus remarks of a certain people in Germany; observing, that an impression in the eye is the first step to victory; or, in his concise manner, Nam primi in omnibus præliis oculi vincuntur. Their heads were adorned with high plumes of feathers, which made them look taller, and gave them a very martial appearance. To animate the men, they had different kinds of unusual warlike instruments, with which they likewise made signals for attacking, and sounded retreats; such as flutes made of cane, large shells, and a kind of drums made out of the trunks of trees, and so hollowed, as to yield a very harsh disagreeable sound upon being beat with a stick. The Indians had scarce any order of battle, except that a corps for the relief of the main army was always reserved. This was the only precaution taken, there being neither lines formed, divisions made, nor posts assigned. Every man fought where he thought proper, and the whole engaged in such a tumultuous manner, that they run down each other, and frequently sunk under their own weight and disorder. Their first onsets were furious, and accompanied with cries, intended for the double purpose of animating themselves and dispiriting the enemy. The troops of every province were led by their proper cazique; and although there was a kind of subordination established, it was generally laid aside in battle, every man relying chiefly upon the strength of his own arm, his valour, and address.

Indian weapons, and manner of fighting.

Such was the army that rushed like an inundation upon the Spaniards, and seemed to cover the whole face of the country. Their attack began upon the foot, while Cortez had been taking post on an eminence, where his fifteen horse and the artillery could do most execution, a execution, by playing upon the enemy's flank, and sweeping off crouds at a single discharge. The Indians first shot their arrows, and then closed in with so much impetuosity, that the Spaniards not being able to attack them with their fire-arms and cross-bows, had recourse to their swords, while the cannon made dreadful slaughter from the eminence, destroying whole companies as they pushed on in crouds. Yet were the Indians so obstinate, that, instead of retreating, they threw handfuls of dust in the air to conceal their slain, and advanced with redoubled fury, insomuch that Diego de Ordaz, who commanded the infantry, and behaved with the utmost gallantry, must have yielded to the infinite superiority of numbers, had not Cortez seasonably fallen upon the rear of the enemy with his horse, breaking through the thickest crouds, flashing with his sword, and trampling under the feet of his horses those naked wretches, who were seized with a panic upon the first appearance of so extraordinary an animal; taking the horse and rider for the same creature, agreeable to the poetical idea the ancients entertained of the Centaur. Diego observing the disorder and panic of the enemy, called forth all his strength, and pressed in with so much vigour, that this vast multitude fluctuated like the rolling of the sea from the van to the rear, and at last broke and dispersed, leaving eight hundred slain upon the field, a multitude of wounded, whom they were not able to carry off, and more prisoners than the Spaniards thought proper to seize, contenting themselves only with a few to set a negotiation of peace on foot, and demonstrate to their countrymen, from the usage they received, that the Spaniards harboured no unfriendly designs against the Tabascans. Of the Spaniards, two soldiers were killed, and seventy wounded, but not dangerously. Upon the whole, this was the greatest victory ever obtained by the Spaniards in America; and the more extraordinary, as it was gained by a handful of men over an army of forty thousand barbarians, ignorant, indeed, of the art of war, but extremely obstinate and brave. It justly raised the reputation of Cortez, who during the action displayed courage, sagacity, address, activity, and every other quality of a great commander. In a word, the defeat of such a multitude of Indians appeared so extraordinary, that the writers of those days thought they must have recourse to a miracle to gain belief, and therefore relate, that St. James the apostle appeared mounted upon a white horse, and fought desperately for the Spaniards.

d NEXT day after the battle, Cortez ordered the prisoners to be brought before him, among whom were some persons of distinction. They discovered in their faces symptoms of the strongest fear, imagining they were to be sacrificed to the gods, agreeable to the inhuman practice of their own country. How great then was their surprise to find themselves treated with the utmost respect, and set at liberty, with presents, as if they had actually done some extraordinary service to Cortez, who told them, "that he knew how to forgive as well e "as to conquer." The humanity shewn upon this occasion soon appeared to be true policy; for a few hours after the prisoners had been released, crouds of Indians came to the Spanish quarters, laden with wheat, fowls, and other provisions, designing thereby to facilitate that negotiation which the cazique of Tabasco was trying to establish. Next day an embassy came with proposals of peace; but Cortez refused giving audience, because he was informed by Aguilar, that the persons employed in this commission were of the meaner sort; whereas it was customary with the Indians to send men of figure and distinction upon embassies. He bid the interpreter acquaint the Indians, "That if their cazique was desirous f "of his friendship, he must solicit it with more respect and decency:" believing that punctilio was necessary, and a scrupulous regard to his own dignity essential to keep up that exalted idea of his person and character, with which he had endeavoured to inspire the Indians. It appeared in the sequel that Cortez was right in his judgment. Strangers estimate men in proportion to the value they put on themselves. The cazique apologized for his error, and repaired it by sending thirty persons of better quality, adorned with plumes of feathers and jewels, and followed by a numerous train, with presents of all manner of provision, who solicited an audience with great formality: Cortez granted their request, and, attended by all his principal officers, received them with great state and gravity. The ambassadors advanced with profound submission; and having perfumed Cortez with burnt gum anime, a resin exuding from the tree called Jetaiba, and other fragrant scents, they delivered their instructions, apologized for the last attack, expressed the cazique's great regard for Cortez, and intreated that a peace might be granted upon such terms as the Spanish general should think proper. Cortez, after representing to them the imprudence of the cazique's conduct, the vanity of all attempts to oppose the Spaniards by force of arms, the mutual benefit which would result from a friendly intercourse, and his sincere desire to cultivate the esteem of the Tabascans, granted their request, and, after making some presents of bits of glass, beads, and other trifles, dismissed the embassy, highly delighted with the success of their commission, and filled with sentiments of the deepest veneration for Cortez, whom they deemed little inferior to a divinity. On the day following the cazique in person, attended by a numerous train, honoured the Spaniards with a visit, and made him several presents of pieces of fine cotton, beautiful plumes of feathers, and some plates of low gold, more valuable for the workmanship than for the metal. He was much caressed by Cortez, and the visit passed in ceremonies, compliments, and protestations of reciprocal friendship, all transacted by means of the interpreter Jerom de Aguilar. All the persons of quality in the cazique's retinue were treated with similar respect by the Spanish captains, and nothing appeared but signs of peace and joy, which they expressed by their countenances and embraces, to supply the want of language. When the cazique took his leave, he gave Cortez a proof of his sincerity, by ordering all his subjects to return with their families to Tabasco, and use their utmost endeavours to prove serviceable to the strangers, and accommodate them with whatever they required. Some other testimonies of mutual regard passed, and the cazique made Cortez a present of twenty women skilled in dressing meat and baking bread of Indian wheat, among whom was one of superior quality and beauty; who was afterwards baptized by the name of Marina, and proved highly serviceable to the Spaniards in the course of the conquest (C).

Cortez leaves Tabasco, and arrives at St. Juan d'Ulva in Mexico.

AFTER this Cortez embarked his troops, the pilots pressing his departure, and set sail on the Monday succeeding Palm-Sunday, following the coast to the westward, and arriving in a few days at St. Juan d'Ulva, where two canoes, called in that country Piraguas, filled with men, came out to visit the fleet. The Indians spoke a language which Aguilar did not understand; but fortunately Donna Marina was no stranger to their tongue, and she told the interpreter that those Indians spoke Mexican, and desired audience of the general in the name of the governor of that province. Cortez ordered them to be brought on board, and admitted to his presence; when they acquainted him, "that Pilpatoe and Teutile, the one governor, and the other captain-general of their province for the great emperor Moteczuma, had sent them to enquire with what design the commander of that fleet came upon the coast, and to offer him what succour and assistance might be requisite to enable him to continue his voyage." They were respectfully received by Cortez, who presented them with some baubles, and then replied, "That he came in a friendly manner to treat of some affairs of the last importance to their prince and all his empire; for which purpose he desired an interview with the two governors, and hoped he should meet with the same hospitable treatment shewn to some of his countrymen the year before." Cortez then inquired minutely concerning the grandeur and wealth of Moteczuma, the extent of his dominions and form of his government; and having obtained all the satisfaction it was in the power of the Indian ambassadors to give him, he dismissed them, extremely pleased with their reception. Next day he landed with several companies of soldiers, and ordered the horses and artillery to be forthwith brought ashore, intending to fortify a camp in case of a sudden attack. Fascines were cut for making entrenchments, and barracks built to shade the soldiers from the intenseness of the sun's beams; while the cannon were so disposed as to command all the surrounding country.

His transactions with the Mexican governors.

TEUTILE received Cortez's message with great marks of respect, and immediately sent a detachment of Indians to assist the strangers in their work, and supply them with all manner of provision, by which means the Spanish soldiers were soon under cover in commodious habitations, very ingeniously wove with the boughs of trees, and covered with palm-leaves, by the Mexicans. It was reported by the Mexican workmen, that general Teutile was at the head of a considerable body of forces, with which he had been employed in establishing the emperor's authority in some parts of this province lately conquered, and that Pilpatoe was supreme civil magistrate: however it was perceived, notwithstanding all the external appearances of hospitality, that the great care taken to supply the Spaniards with necessaries, and to oblige by every possible method, was not unmixed with selfish considerations, artifice and fear, supposed to arise from the report of their success at Tabasco. The forces of this province were inferior in number to those lately defeated; it was therefore the policy of the governors to have recourse to civilities, in order to oblige where they were sensible they could not resist. In a few days the two governors came with a magnificent attendance to

(C) As we may find frequent occasion to mention this lady in the course of our relation, it will not be improper to make the reader acquainted with her parentage and adventures. According to Antonio de Solis she was daughter to the cazique of Guazawalea, a province of the kingdom of Mexico, bordering upon that of Tabasco. By an accident which is variously related, she was carried away in her youth to Xicatongo, a strong place on the frontiers of Yucatan, kept by a Mexican garrison. There she was bred in a poor method, ill suited to her birth, until by a fresh accident, either by sale or captivity, she became the property of the cazique of Tabasco, who presented her to Cortez. Of course she understood not only the Mexican, but Yucatan language, and thereby proved highly useful as a check upon Aguilar. Besides, she soon acquired the Spanish tongue, and indeed distinguished an admirable quickness in attaining languages. The account of this lady given by Herrera is somewhat contradictory to the above; but we chuse to follow de Solis, who has copied Diaz Castillo, an eye-witness of all that had been transacted in Mexico (1).

- a visit Cortez; and he received them with equal state in the midst of his officers and soldiers. The first compliments being over, Cortez desired the interpreters to acquaint the governors, that, before he informed them of the motives of his voyage, he must comply with the duties of his religion, and recommend to the God of all other gods the success of his proposition; upon which the Indian chiefs were conducted into a part of the barracks where an altar and cross had been erected, and which had been reserved for the purposes of a chapel. Here mass was celebrated, the Indians gazing and listening with an air of astonishment and devotion. When divine service was concluded, the governors were conducted to the general's quarters, where they were entertained with all the abundance and pomp which circumstances would admit. The repast being over, he told them in a firm tone of voice, by his interpreters, "That he came hither to treat with the great emperor Moteczuma, on the part of Don Carlos of Austria, monarch of the East, concerning affairs of great importance, not only to his own person and condition, but likewise to the welfare of all his subjects; for executing which it was absolutely necessary for him to appear before his royal presence; to which he hoped he might be admitted with all the civility and respect due to the greatness of the king his master." This request produced an extraordinary effect upon the governors; they changed colour, and seemed extremely concerned; but before they returned an answer, Teutile ordered a present which he had provided to be brought in, and immediately twenty or thirty Indians appeared laden with provisions, fine cloaths, beautiful feathers, and a great box, in which were several pieces of gold plate curiously wrought. This present he delivered with a good grace; and perceiving it was well received, he ventured upon making the following reply. "That the small present now offered was made by two slaves of the great Moteczuma, who had given orders to entertain such strangers as might appear upon his coasts with the utmost civility;" adding, "that Cortez must immediately think of pursuing his voyage, it being no easy matter to speak with the emperor; and that they hoped he would regard as an obligation their having thus undeceived him, before he had lost time, and been taught by experience of the difficulty of his pretensions." This answer was such as Cortez expected from the hesitation of the governors; to whom he ordered the interpreters to declare, "That sovereigns never refused audience to the ambassadors of other princes; neither could their ministers, without very positive orders, take upon themselves to oppose so reasonable a demand: That it was their business in this case to acquaint Moteczuma with his arrival, for which he was willing to allow the time necessary for the going and return of a courier; but he insisted upon their informing the emperor, that he came fully resolved to gain admittance into his royal presence, and positively determined not to leave his country with dishonour to the monarch who had entrusted him with his commands." The governors seemed to be confounded with so bold a determination; but instead of opposing it, they contented themselves with intreating the general not to move from his present quarters until the return of a courier from the emperor, offering to supply him with whatever might be necessary for the maintenance and convenience of his army.
- c ALL this while it was observed, that some painters, who had come in the train of the Mexican chiefs, were deeply engaged in painting the ships, soldiers, arms, artillery, and every other peculiarity of the Spanish camp, upon cotton cloths prepared for the occasion. Diaz de Castillo affirms, that all the different objects were distinguished in landscapes ingeniously disposed, and that all the portraits of the principal officers strikingly resembled the originals. To render the pieces more intelligible, and point out particulars, certain characters were placed over certain figures, to explain their signification; whence it may be inferred, that although the Mexicans could not convey all their ideas without the aid of painting, and having recourse to the images of material things, yet they were not wholly unacquainted with the use of letters, and the signs and elements, invented by other nations as types of their ideas. The characters set over the images prove that something was meant to be explained; whence in our opinion it necessarily follows, that the Mexicans were in some measure possessed of the art of carrying on an intercourse by arbitrary signs, which had no immediate relation to their sentiments. Teutile had given orders to have these pictures drawn for the emperor's better information; nor did Cortez oppose it: on the contrary, he went to see the artists at work, greatly admired their ingenuity, and exercised his men, to impart, as he said, greater life and vigour to the painting. He ordered his soldiers to their arms, mounted his horse with his captains, and began a sham battle, which was matter of equal admiration and pleasure to the Indians. The regular evolutions of the soldiers, and docile spirit and ferocity of the horses; the fire, smoke, and thunder of the musquetry, and the tremendous roaring of the cannon, produced such an effect upon the barbarians, that some fell down upon the ground with fear and astonishment, others fled with great velocity, and those of more courage and presence of mind seemed wrapped up in silent wonder, not devoid of terror and trepidation. However, they were encouraged by

by the assurances of the general, that these were only military diversions, designed to make arms appear the more terrible where they produced such effects even when used for entertainment; and the painters again fell to work, inventing new figures and characters to supply what was wanting in their former descriptions. Some delineated the Spaniards in arms, drawn up in form, and performing the several evolutions; others painted the horses in their exercise and motion with astonishing exactness and strength of colouring. The artillery was represented by fire and smoke, and even some idea of the thunder conveyed by the similitude of lightning, and a kind of undulating tremulous appearance of the surrounding objects, that discovered great execution and invention in these barbarous artists. Castillo is extremely minute in his description of these historical paintings, but he is charged by de Solis with running into hyperbole; for which reason we shall avoid transcribing all the curious observations he makes upon this subject; and only relate, that, when the painting was completed, Cortez presented the governors with some small Spanish jewels, and several other curiosities, which he desired might be sent as a testimony of his esteem and reverence for Moteczuma.

Moteczuma sends a present to Cortez, but declines the interview.

Cortez perseveres in his resolution.

WHEN the couriers set out with these dispatches, the governors took their leave, and halted with their retinues at a small distance from the Spanish quarters, to consult upon the necessary measures until the return of the emperor's commands. In consequence Pilpatoe pitched his camp in a convenient spot of ground for observing the motions of the Spaniards, under pretence that he was desirous of superintending the services of his people, and providing all the requisites for the due entertainment of Cortez and his army; a piece of dissimulation at which Cortez found it necessary to connive, that his troops might not be disappointed of provision. In seven days Moteczuma's answer came, and was brought to Cortez by Teutile; though Castillo, and after him Herrera, alledge, that a splendid embassy, consisting of an hundred noblemen, was dispatched by Moteczuma; a thing impossible in so short a time, as is agreed upon by all writers. It is certain that the emperor sent a rich present, which loaded the shoulders of an hundred Indians, and was composed of various kinds of fine cotton robes of elegant manufactures; plumes of feathers, mixed and disposed with so much taste, that, without the assistance of artificial colours or the pencil, they formed ingenious pictures in imitation of nature; a great number of bows, arrows, and targets of curious materials and workmanship; two large plates of a circular form, the one of gold, finely embossed, representing the sun, and the other of silver, representing the moon; a considerable quantity of jewels, pieces of gold, precious stones, gold collars, and pendants adorned with emeralds and rich pearls; bits of gold, imitating the appearance of frogs and insects; grains of virgin gold as they came from the mines, of extraordinary sizes; and other ornaments of greater value, which excited astonishment in the Spaniards at the immense wealth of this empire, and the genius of a people whom they regarded as barbarous. Having dazzled the eyes of the Spaniards with the splendour of this invaluable present, Teutile desired the interpreters to acquaint Cortez, "that the great emperor Moteczuma sent him these trifles in return for his present, and as a proof of the friendship he entertained for the king his master; but that he did not think it convenient, nor was it indeed possible at that time, to grant his request of passing to the court of Mexico." And Teutile endeavoured to palliate this refusal, by urging the badness of the roads, the variety of savage nations who would take arms and obstruct his journey, and the present posture of the empire, with a multitude of other difficulties, which were evidently feigned only to conceal some deeper motive of the emperor's conduct. But Cortez, who was not to be diverted from his designs by specious pretexts, answered Teutile, after returning his acknowledgments for the emperor's magnificent present, "That it was not his intention to be wanting in respect or obedience to Moteczuma; but that he would not return with dishonour to his prince, or forbear persisting in his request with all the earnestness due to the reputation of a crown, honoured and respected by the greatest sovereigns in the world." Upon this point he expatiated with so much zeal, heat, and eloquence, that the Indians, afraid to disoblige if he persisted in the emperor's commands, only replied, that he would importune Moteczuma a second time, and exert his utmost influence to gain a point in which the general imagined his honour was concerned. Accordingly couriers were again dispatched, with a present to the emperor more valuable than the former, Cortez acquainting the Indian chief, that he would expect the emperor's answer, without stirring from his present station; though he should be very much concerned if his imperial majesty's delay should oblige him to go nearer the court, for the greater conveniency of soliciting his request.

As soon as the Spaniards discharged this business, they found leisure to examine Moteczuma's present with more accuracy, and their reasonings and inferences upon it were very different. Some estimated the emperor's power by this proof of his wealth, and thence drew unfavourable presages concerning the event of the expedition; while others promised themselves the greatest advantages, and anticipated in imagination the prodigious riches they

- a they must acquire from the conquest of such a country, and the pillaging of a capital so replete with treasure. A few scrupled not to tax Cortez with rashness, for attempting with a handful of men to subdue so powerful a monarch; but the majority admired his valour and constancy, regarding the downfall of Mexico as certain, and their own fortunes and fortunes, by interposing his authority; but he thought it necessary to divert the attention of his soldiers from inquiring minutely into his conduct, by keeping them in constant employment and exercise; for which purpose he dispatched Montejo with two vessels to run along the coast for a more commodious harbour for the shipping, and station for the camp, under pretence that the ships were greatly exposed to the north winds, and the soldiers b tortured with musquitos, and scorched with the sun-beams, whose heat was doubled by reflection in a sandy gravelly soil. The rest of the men he kept in constant employment, either by military exercises, cleaning their arms, and preparing such materials as he imagined might prove useful in the progress of his designs.

MEAN time the whole court of Moteczuma was thrown into confusion and perplexity by the repeated instances of Cortez, and the firmness with which he insisted upon an interview with the emperor. In the first transports of his fury, Moteczuma declared he would sacrifice all the strangers to his vengeance, for presuming to dispute his will; but on cooler reflection his courage sunk, and his anger yielded to fear, grief, and despair. The account which the paintings gave of the fire, thunder, and horses of the Spaniards, inspired c him equally with astonishment and terror. All his ministers and relations were summoned to attend the council, and public sacrifices were made in the temples, which immediately diffused a tremor over the whole empire. The superstition of the people greatly contributed to extend the consternation more rapidly and universally. Several prodigies, or rather natural phenomena, which their ignorance construed into dreadful omens, were said to have appeared about this time, and occasioned a general despondence. One was a comet of extraordinary lustre, that resembled a pyramid, and vanished at sun rise. Another was a kind of meteor, or exhalation, which was converted into the figure of a fiery serpent with three heads, that rose in the West about mid-day, and run swiftly until it was lost in the clouds. One of the Mexican temples caught fire, by what means could never be heard, d and was entirely consumed in despite of all the assistance which could be furnished. The very stones were supposed to burn, and liquify in a manner deemed altogether supernatural. The great Mexican lake overflowed its banks without any visible cause, with a kind of bubbling, resembling boiling water; but no uncommon heat was perceived. Many affirmed that they heard lamentable voices in the clouds, which predicted the overthrow of the monarchy; and the priests cherished the superstitious fear of the people, by making the idols utter such oracles as best suited their purposes (D). Portentous signs like these, occurring just at the period when a foreign invasion happened, had such an effect on the spirit of Moteczuma and his council, that, on the arrival of the second message from Cortez, they e gave all up for lost, and regarded the empire as already doomed to destruction, though the most powerful in the new world. They deliberated, debated, and consulted, but always broke up with divided sentiments. Some were for opposing the strangers by force of arms, interpreting the omens as warnings to resist the impending danger; while others out of fear extolled the valour of the Spaniards, the force of their arms, the irresistible strength of their horses, and the terror of their lightning, of which the Tabascans had fatal experience. Between these opinions Moteczuma at length determined to steer a middle course, chusing not to offend Cortez either by a direct attack, or to acknowledge his own perturbation, by admitting him to his presence. He therefore sent him another present, and at the same time commanded him immediately to quit his dominions, hoping by this means either to engage or to terrify him into obedience, determining, if neither succeeded, f ed, to raise a powerful army, that there should be no cause to apprehend the same ill fortune that attended the spirited endeavours of the Tabascans: nor were these hopes presumptuous, considering the wealth and power of this great monarch.

The court of Mexico in great consternation.

Another present sent to Cortez.

At this period the empire of Mexico was in the zenith of its glory, having under its dominion almost all the provinces which had been discovered in North America, governed either immediately by Moteczuma, or by caziques, governors, viceroys, or tributary princes, all of whom acknowledged his sovereignty. In length it extended five hundred leagues from East to West, and near two hundred in breadth from South to North, containing

(D) Antonio de Solis, in despite of his natural good sense, appears not only to give credit to some prodigies that have all the appearance of fable, but attributes them to the cunning and address of the devil. It would furnish but little entertainment to a sensible reader to transcribe the great variety of omens related by all the Spanish writers, some of which may be explained from physical principles, and others charged upon the ignorance of the people, the policy of certain ambitious individuals, or to the frauds of the priests, or the credulity of the Spaniards.

parentage and

within this compass some of the most fruitful, populous, and wealthy provinces in the world. It grew from small beginnings to this height of power in little more than the space of 130 years, though the foundation and progress of the monarchy are not well known, and depend chiefly on the fabulous tradition of the inhabitants (E). In general, it is supposed, that the Mexicans, who are naturally a warlike people, were gradually extending their sovereignty by force of arms over the adjacent nations. At first they were governed by a prince of a warlike disposition, who inured them to arms, implanted in their breasts a sense of military honour, and inspired them with the desire of making conquests: afterwards they formed themselves into a more regular monarchy, vesting one of their number with the legislative and executive power, and bestowing upon him the title of king. The person upon whom their choice fell was the most celebrated in the country for his valour and strength; for fortitude and bodily powers were the only qualities at that time in esteem among a fierce, martial people. Where merit was equal, they bestowed the crown on the blood-royal; but more regard was paid to courage than hereditary right, which had occasionally been set aside. Bloody wars had been waged for the regal title; but these, instead of ruining the people, served only to extend the boundaries of the empire. At first justice supported the Mexican arms, and the efforts made to vindicate their liberty against the oppression of the neighbouring nations proving successful, whetted their ambition, and made them equally desirous of trade and of conquest. Their power gradually encreasing, justice was laid aside, tyranny took place, and the sovereign held in bondage not only the provinces which he had reduced, but all his subjects in general.

SUCH was the situation of Mexico at the present juncture. Motezuma, a prince of the blood, had distinguished himself by extraordinary acts of valour during the reign of his predecessor. At his return to court from the wars, he found his reputation so considerable, that he ventured to aspire at the sceptre, and regarded himself as in actual possession of the crown from the moment he first conceived that ambition. This, however, he restrained within the limits of prudence, and instead of attempting to dethrone the reigning monarch, fixed his whole attention upon securing a proper interest against the next election. Policy and cunning were admirably blended with affability, the reputation of valour, and great modesty. He always shewed the greatest obedience and veneration towards the sovereign, as if he was desirous of teaching his fellow-subjects the duty and respect due to so exalted a character, yet with a view of gaining all the influence of the monarch towards rendering his own succession the less difficult. He affected such composure in his discourse and actions, and so much gravity in his countenance, that, before he ascended the throne, the name of Motezuma was said to have been extremely characteristic, and expressive of his disposition, as in the Mexican language it implies a solid, grave temper, which some writers have translated surly, severe, and cruel. Motezuma also obtained the reputation of being extremely religious, an excellent bait for the vulgar, who judge by appearances. To render his piety the more public, he built an apartment in the most frequented temple, to which he retired in sight of the people, to offer up his pretended devotions. In a word, he became so popular, that, on the death of the king his predecessor, he met with scarce any opposition in ascending the throne, to which he was called by almost the universal acclamation of the people; tho' he made a shew of refusing the offered dignity, only that he might be courted to comply with his own desires. No sooner was he possessed of the imperial diadem, than his natural pride broke forth with a violence proportioned to the long restraint imposed on it. The first action by which he manifested the violence offered to his natural disposition while he continued in a private station, was the dismissal all the servants of the court, who were usually composed of the middling class of people and the vulgar; instead of whom Motezuma ordered that he should henceforward be served only by the nobility and their children; believing it an indignity to imperial majesty to be approached by plebeians. The meanest employments in the kitchen were now filled by the quality of the country; while Motezuma shut himself up in his palace from his people and even his ministers, except on extraordinary occasions, imagining, that like a divinity he should be revered in proportion as he became less familiar to the eyes of mortals. He regarded melancholy and retirement, says de Solis, as a part of majesty; and those who were so fortunate as to be admitted into his presence, were forced to pass through such an infinity of ceremonies and prostrations as greatly exceeded the adoration due from one man to another. Fully persuaded that the lives and happiness of his subjects were entirely in his disposal, he exercised horrid barbarities merely to evince his power, and became the terror as well as the idol of his people. Taxes were levied on together with the manners, customs, religion, &c. of the people, touching only at present upon such points as are necessary to elucidate our narrative.

- a the heads of all the Mexicans, without regard to the public necessity, and with no other view than to demonstrate that all belonged to the prince; and these were exacted with so much severity, that the poorest beggar was not exempted from bringing something to the treasury, though it perhaps was thrown by the insolent officers in their faces. In such a situation it cannot be expected that loyalty and attachment to the prince were the familiar qualities of the Mexicans; on the contrary, they detested Moteczuma; but in general their disaffection transpired only in low murmurs, which did not reach the ears of the monarch. A few more remote provinces indeed ventured to rebel, and those of Mechoacan, Tlascala, and Tebeaca had never been conquered; but the vast power of the emperor soon reduced to obedience all those who had ever acknowledged his sovereignty; and as to the three provinces we have specified, Moteczuma said it was not politic to conquer them, as he should then be in want of prisoners to sacrifice to the gods.

WHEN the Spaniards arrived on his coasts, this prince was in the 14th year of his reign, and every thing as we may see ripe for a revolution, the more easily to be executed as the prince who was the best general in his dominions had declined, from a jealousy of the royal authority, to command his own armies. Some other circumstances likewise contributed to accelerate the ruin of Moteczuma, as we shall have occasion to mention; it is here sufficient to observe, that Cortez was no sooner acquainted with the character of the prince, the disposition of the people, and the situation of the empire, than he penetrated with a glance of his eye into all the consequences, and now already deemed himself the conqueror of Mexico, though we shall see that there were still manifest difficulties to encounter. He was revolving the whole scheme of the revolution, when Montejo returned with the ships dispatched to find a better harbour for the shipping, and encampment for the forces, after having coasted a considerable way to the northward, and discovered the town of Quiabitslan, situated in a fertile soil, with a fine harbour, and all other conveniencies wanted for the fleet or army. Cortez was preparing to remove thither, when Moteczuma's answer arrived, or rather command to quit Mexico, the harshness of which was softened by some valuable presents. General Teutile waited upon him with the usual ceremonies, delivered the orders of the court, and retired before Cortez could reply; but was called back, and told, "that one of the principal points of the Spanish embassy was to enforce a tenet of the Christian doctrine, to oppose the errors of idolatry, and propagate the true faith and only means of eternal salvation; and that coming over to so remote a country upon a business in which religion and conscience were interested, he could not refrain from continuing his efforts, and persevering in his applications, until he should be favoured with an audience, since he came with pacific motives, as was apparent from his slender retinue, from which no suspicions could arise." Upon these words Teutile started up hastily, and told him with an air of confusion and resentment, "that hitherto he had been treated with the utmost kindness by the great Moteczuma, and shewn all the civilities required by the sacred laws of hospitality; but he must lay the fault upon his own imprudent obstinacy, if he should henceforward meet with a different behaviour." Having uttered which, he hastily departed, without the ceremony of taking leave, or hearing any reply from Cortez; upon which that general, with admirable presence of mind, turned round with a smile to his people, saying, "We shall see the effects of this challenge; already we have had experience of the prowess of the Mexicans; and for the most part it is observed that threats are the effects of fear; and these presents from Moteczuma, may therefore be regarded as proofs rather of his weakness, than of his generosity."

e

IMMEDIATELY Cortez gave an order to double the guards in case of an attack, keeping himself the whole night in a posture of defence. In the morning it appeared that all the Mexicans had withdrawn themselves, even those persons employed in supplying the camp with provisions, which occasioned some murmurings among the soldiers, that were artfully improved and cherished by the enemies to Cortez, and the friends of Velaquez. They dropped hints, reflecting upon Cortez as rashly ambitious, the absurdity of pretending to maintain himself with a handful of men against the whole force of a potent empire, and the probability that they must all fall sacrifices to his wild projects; insinuating the necessity of returning to Cuba to refit the fleet, augment the army, and lay a proper foundation for the greatness of the enterprize; remonstrances to which purpose ought to be made to the general. Intimations of this seditious humour soon came to the ears of Cortez; and nothing could be more masterly than the manner in which he stopped all the designs of his enemies, and converted them to his own advantage. He employed his friends to inquire privately into the sentiments of the army in general; and when he learnt that a majority were for seconding his projects and pursuing the enterprize, he suffered himself to be addressed by the malcontents, and even heard with the utmost patience a warm remonstrance from Diego Ordaz, insisting upon the necessity of returning to Cuba. Cortez even carried his dissimulation so far as to seem convinced with the arguments

ments offered by Ordaz, and in consequence published his declarations for preparing every necessary for the voyage ; and went so far as to reimark great part of the troops : but no sooner was this resolution spread through the army, than a clamour arose among the soldiers, gained by the general's interests, who loudly complained that he had deceived them by promises of wealth and glory, which he was now going to abandon just as the path was made certain. They declared against returning to Cuba ; adding, that if Cortez had not courage to prosecute the schemes he had projected, he might return with all those that were of the same pusillanimous opinion ; for they could easily find a general. The clamour increased, and was so dexterously managed, that it brought over many who had been persuaded or forced to engage in the contrary faction ; and the more readily, as there was something noble in the resolution of attempting the conquest of an empire, and that success would most assuredly produce immense wealth and eternal glory to the adventurers. At length those who had formerly declared for returning to Cuba, were now the most earnest to remain in Mexico, inasmuch that the general's friends undertook to speak to Cortez, to suspend the execution of his order for sailing. Accordingly, before this ardor cooled, they went attended with a great number of soldiers to the head-quarters, and acquainted the general that his resolution to return had almost occasioned a mutiny among the troops ; they complained of his having relinquished his projects without consulting his officers ; they represented the dishonour of abandoning a great undertaking on the first appearance of difficulty ; they reminded him of the censures incurred by Grijalva in a former expedition, for neglecting to make a settlement in the country he had discovered : in a word, they repeated as their own, with the greatest heat and zeal, the very words which Cortez had privately dictated ; while he listened with attention, and seemed to be drawn involuntarily into the very measures which he had proposed ; making his apology as if he had been wrongly informed that the army in general expressed a desire of returning to Cuba. He now acquainted them that he would stay with the utmost satisfaction, as he found there was a spirit of honour that prevailed in the camp ; but they must know he would not take soldiers against their inclinations, and therefore he would give all those leave to return who had not courage to encounter difficulties in the pursuit of fame and fortune.

No sooner had Cortez uttered this resolution, than the air resounded with acclamations ; some were really rejoiced, others put on the appearance of gladness to prevent the infamy of being thought cowards, and none was so hardy as to presume opposing the making a settlement in Mexico ; by which means Cortez once more reconciled the troops to their duty, and effectually crushed for that time the endeavours of his enemies to ruin his reputation and fortune.

Ambassadors to Cortez from Zempoala.

Just as this affair was happily terminated, ambassadors arrived at the camp from the cazique of Zempoala, desiring the alliance of Cortez and the Spaniards as brave men, the fame of whose magnanimous actions in Tabasco had reached his dominions. This was a further inducement to the soldiers to continue firm in their resolution of pursuing the enterprise, and Cortez did not fail to improve the circumstance to his own advantage. The Zempoalan embassy was received with the utmost civility and respect, and Cortez gave the ambassadors to understand, that he accepted with pleasure the proffers of friendship and alliance made by their master ; considering it as a providential event, that these proposals should arrive just as the Mexicans had withdrawn themselves, and while his people were on the point of mutinying, as it would establish his authority with the latter, and render him more able to resist the attacks of the former. It augmented his satisfaction when he found that the cazique of Zempoala was the declared enemy of Motezuma, whose sovereignty he refused to acknowledge, and that his dominions lay in his way to Quiabitslan, the town discovered by Montejo, to which Cortez proposed removing his camp. He also learned from the ambassadors, that Motezuma was a cruel tyrant, equally feared and detested by his own subjects ; that several provinces in the neighbourhood of Zempoala were ripe to throw off the yoke ; and that the cazique their master, in particular, desired nothing more than an opportunity of cementing a powerful league against the emperor.

HAVING dismissed the Indian ministers with presents, and assurances that he would soon pay the cazique a visit, he began forming his people into a regular corporation, and appointing magistrates, as a necessary previous step to his settling a colony, though the troops were to be quartered in the province of Quiabitslan. Accordingly he summoned a council of his principal officers, and made the following civil promotions, which we specify, that the reader may be informed of the particular departments executed by the chief persons employed in this expedition. Alonso Hernandez Portocarrero and Francisco Montejo were appointed alcaides ; Alonso d' Avila, Pedro and Alonso d' Alvarado, together with Gonzalo de Sandoval, were constituted regidores ; and Juan d' Escalante and Francisco Alvenez Chico, a Chico, were raised to the dignities of chief alguazils and procurators-general. Several other inferior officers were likewise made, and all enjoined by a solemn oath to the strict distribution of justice and discharge of their duty. What reasons induced Cortez to settle a colony on his present quarters, which were extremely inconvenient on account of the situation, we know not; the Spanish historians only relate, that here he began building houses with great diligence, and laying the foundation of the new settlement, to which he gave the name of Villa Rica de la Vera Cruz, taking the first appellation of Villa Rica in remembrance of the gold seen in that country, and the latter of Vera Cruz from the Spaniards having landed there on Good Friday, or the Friday of the cross (F). Upon the first meeting of the newly-formed council, the general, who appeared in the character of a private person in civil affairs, desired admittance to make a proposal which concerned the public good, and was of the last consequence to the colony. He then informed them of the necessity there was to constitute a general, in order to preserve the obedience of the troops, on whom depended the security of the colony. He told them that he was not unacquainted with the defect in his own authority, as his commission had been revoked by Velaquez; he said that to them it belonged to apply the proper remedies, and as they represented the king's person, to enlarge and confirm his powers, if they judged him worthy of that honour, or else to bestow the command on some other person better qualified, to whom he would cheerfully submit for the common service. "I from this moment," added he, "resign all right that may accrue to me from possession, and surrender into your hands the title by which I have held it, that you may deliberate with all possible freedom upon the election. As my whole study is to promote the success of this expedition, I can assure you I can cheerfully, and without offering myself the least violence, take up a pike with the same hand which lays down the truncheon, and act with the same alacrity in the mean capacity of a soldier, as in the important post of a general; for if in war men learn to command by obeying, there are also certain cases in which the having commanded evinces the necessity and propriety of obeying."

Colony of Villa Rica founded.

HAVING said this, he threw upon the table his commission, kissed the truncheon, and delivering it into the hands of the alcaides, retired to his barrack. Cortez well knew upon whom the choice would fall, because he had taken his measures before he put matters to the hazard; he therefore gave himself no concern about the deliberations of the council, well knowing they must be favourable to him, and of consequence give him much greater authority with the soldiers who were sensible that at present he held his employment entirely by their courtesy. The event was just what he expected; the council unanimously voted his re-election, and gave him his commission in the king's name, until such time as his majesty's pleasure should be known; and they immediately communicated the new election to the soldiers, either to make trial how far it was agreeable, or else to stamp their own act with the general approbation. The rejoicings were extraordinary, and the council was thanked by the whole body of the army for their judicious proceedings, altho' in fact the whole was concerted by Cortez. After which a deputation waited upon the general, to acquaint him with the appointment of the magistrates. From all these circumstances we may collect that Cortez was not only a great soldier and able general, but a sound politician, perfectly acquainted with the human heart, and the means of rendering himself respected and honoured.

Cortez establishes his authority among the troops.

HOWEVER there were not wanting some persons, dependants on Velaquez, who endeavoured to give an invidious turn to this transaction, taxing Cortez with cunning and ambition, invalidating the authority of the council, and sneering at the folly of those who suffered themselves to be deceived by so poor an artifice; but they soon had cause to repent their temerity. Cortez, invested with his new authority, determined to apply remedies in time to the seditious humour, which if not speedily checked might poison the whole mass of the soldiers. Instead therefore of having recourse to remonstrances as on former occasions, he resolved to avail himself of his power, and to use rigor where patience might prove ruinous. Accordingly he ordered Diego de Ordaz, Pedro Escudero, and Juan Velaquez de Leon, to be seized, carried on board the fleet, and clapped in irons, which struck their adherents with such terror, that all immediately returned to their obedience. The prisoners he likewise forgave at the intercession of his friends, upon their submission; and by this one well-timed act of severity, not only nipped sedition in the bud, but by his clemency and affability so effectually gained the friendship of the mutineers, that they stuck afterwards to his fortune in the worst extremities, and shewed themselves the bravest soldiers and most faithful friends in his army.

(F) This name may literally be translated the rich town of the true cross. Since the building of the town of Vera Cruz on the river Zempoala, the old settlement has been called only Villa Rica.

S E C T. IV.

Containing the Progress of the Spaniards in the Conquest of Mexico, their Wars with the Inhabitants of Tlascala, and afterwards their firm Alliance with that Republick.

CORTEZ having laid the seeds of that colony which was afterwards to spring up with so much vigour, and established his own authority upon the most solid basis that circumstances would permit, now entered upon measures for removing the fleet and army to Quiabitslan; for which purpose it was necessary to send a party in search of provision, which grew extremely scarce in the settlement. Alvarado was detached with a party for this purpose, and he soon returned with great quantities of Indian wheat, fowls, and such other provision as the country afforded, after having penetrated as far as Cotasta, without having pillaged a single town or cabin. On his return every thing was disposed for the march of the troops. The fleet set sail, and Cortez with the army proceeded by land, taking the road of Zempoala, and sending out scouts to examine the country. On his arrival on the frontiers of the province, he found all the houses and villages deserted, which created suspicion that the cazique's overtures of friendship were insincere. Only the temples were left in their former situation, with their idols, instruments for sacrificing, a few mangled limbs of human victims, and certain religious books, made of long skin, or varnished cloths, folded in such a manner that every doubling formed a leaf, and written with that kind of imagery, cyphers, or hieroglyphics, used by the painters of Tentile. For the space of two days Cortez marched through this suspicious solitude, expecting every moment to be attacked, when he was at last accosted by twelve Indians laden with provisions sent as a present by the cazique of Zempoala, with a second invitation. This gave him some encouragement to proceed, though it did not entirely efface the doubts which he entertained about the cazique's fidelity: however in the present circumstances a retreat might be attended with bad consequences, by giving the soldiers dreadful ideas of the power of the enemy, or at least a contemptible opinion of their general's courage. On the third day they approached Zempoala, and were met by twenty noble Indians, who complimented Cortez in the cazique's name, and apologized for their master not doing himself the honour of paying his respects. These conducted the Spaniards to the town, which was the capital of the province, bearing the same name: the cazique came to the gate to meet Cortez, supported, on account of his monstrous grossness, by several noblemen, made them a short and polite compliment; and soon gained the esteem of the Spanish soldiers, who at first gave way to their mirth, occasioned by his overgrown size, and ridiculous appearance. After receiving the thanks of the general, he ordered the officers to be shewn their quarters in a large commodious square, in which were many handsome apartments. Those of Cortez, in particular, greatly surpassed any thing the Spaniards had ever beheld in America. But they could engage him to stay only one night, as he was in haste to establish his head-quarters in Quiabitslan; however, before his departure, the cazique made him another visit, and to render it the more acceptable, brought a rich present, and had a private conference with Cortez, in which he complained of the tyranny of Moteczuma, and the desire which many provinces had to throw off their bondage; but that they were biassed by the vast power of the emperor, and not very unanimous among themselves. He intimated his wishes that Cortez would assist in recovering the liberties of the Mexicans; but said it was not his design to engage him in so difficult an enterprize, by the trifling civilities which it was in his power to bestow; nor would it be consistent with the laws of friendship to sell at so great a price his insignificant services. Cortez discovered a mixture of art and generosity in this harangue, which he answered by giving the cazique the highest opinion of the Spanish nation and justice; telling him, that he was under an indispensable necessity of proceeding to Quiabitslan, where the oppressed and injured might apply for his protection. This he desired the cazique would communicate to his friends, assuring them that Moteczuma would cease to tyrannize, while he undertook their defence; a speech favouring strongly of the romantic spirit of chivalry, unless we consider that Cortez actually performed all that he promised.

CORTEZ took his leave, extremely satisfied with his reception at Zempoala, and the disposition in which he found the cazique; whence he drew presages favourable to his great design. On his arrival at Quiabitslan he found the town deserted, though naturally strong; upon which the Spaniards took immediate possession. In the temples they found a few priests, whom they gained by presents and civilities, and from these they had notice that cowardice had occasioned the cazique to abandon his town; and that the nobility,

- a though more courageous, had been influenced by his example: however, that as soon as they were informed of the friendly intentions of the strangers, they doubted not but they would return to their habitations; which accordingly happened, for on the same night some families ventured to come back, and next day the town was fully inhabited. Not long after the cazique waited upon Cortez, and with him the chief of Zempoala, who undertook to apologize for his conduct, and the diffidence he had expressed of the Spaniards. They voluntarily introduced their complaints of Moteczuma, and testified their sincerity by the tears they shed in relating his cruelties, and the bitterness of their resentment. They pathetically represented the misery of the people, and dishonour of the nobility; and the cazique of Zempoala added, by way of climax, that, besides raising his wealth out of the calamities of his subjects, Moteczuma even invaded their houses, and tore from them their wives and children, staining with their blood the altars of his gods, after having sacrificed them first to purposes more cruel and abominable. Scarce had the cazique finished the recital of his grievances, when three Indians came in, with all the marks of horror and surprize in their countenances, and whispered something to the caziques, which made them quit the apartment in great confusion, without the ceremony of taking leave. It was presently known that six of Moteczuma's commissaries for collecting his tributes, had entered the town with great retinues, and were then passing before the Spanish quarters. It was this which had thrown the caziques into so much disorder, for they trembled at the severity of those officers, dreaded the indignation of Moteczuma, and were grown so pusillanimous, by the habit of suffering, that they even respected the rod of tyranny, and prostrated themselves before those scourgers of their liberties. Cortez went out with his captains to see the procession, which was a spectacle altogether new to the Spaniards. The commissaries were carried in litters on the shoulders of Indians, attended by a great number of servants, and inferior officers, who cooled their masters with fans made of beautiful feathers. Their dress was magnificent, being composed of fine plumes, pendants of gold and jewels in their ears, noses and lips, with cotton mantles adorned with gold and precious stones. They passed Cortez without paying him any marks of respect; which so irritated the Spanish soldiers, that they would have chastised the haughty officers had they not been restrained by the general, and proceeded to the town-house, where they summoned the caziques, and severely reprimanded them for presuming to conduct strangers into their towns, who were enemies to the great Moteczuma, and by way of atonement demanded, besides the usual tribute and service, twenty Indians to sacrifice to the emperor's gods.

- c

WHEN notice of this inhuman sentence was brought to Cortez, he sent for the caziques in the most private manner, and telling them that he could penetrate into their most secret thoughts, and found they were disposed to yield obedience to the cruel sentence passed by the officers. He therefore charged them not to suffer such abominations, or any longer to comply with the shocking demands of tributes in human blood; but, on the contrary, to assemble their people, seize upon their commissaries, and leave the Spaniards to maintain what was done by the advice of their general. The boldness of the order terrified the caziques; at first they positively refused to execute it; but on Cortez's repeating his orders, in a resolute tone, they assembled their towns-men, and seized upon the commissaries, to the great joy of the people, who were delighted at this spirited exertion, and the punishment which they expected to see inflicted on those instruments of tyranny and barbarity. It was the intention of the caziques to execute them in the most ignominious manner; but finding that Cortez was averse to this, they desired at least to sacrifice them to their gods, as if this was treating the prisoners with very particular lenity. However, to prevent bloodshed, Cortez ordered a Spanish guard upon the ministers; and as he did not approve entirely of commencing hostilities against Moteczuma, nor thought in advisable on the other hand to desert that party of malcontents which was forming, he resolved to keep a middle course, suspend the effects of the resentment shewn by the caziques, and, without deserting his friends, make a merit with the emperor of having saved his officers from the intended punishment. With this view he ordered two of the prisoners to be brought to him with the utmost privacy at midnight; and after receiving them with affability, he told them, that he was studious to save their lives, and restore them to liberty; and as they received their favour solely from his hands, they might assure Moteczuma, that he would endeavour to procure the release of the other prisoners, and to convince the caziques of their fault, in refusing obedience to the sacred orders of their prince. As for himself, he was desirous of peace, and of shewing his reverence for so great a prince, by paying the due respect to his ministers and officers. The Indians were highly sensible of the obligation; and after returning their thanks, set out under a Spanish guard, which saw them safe beyond the frontiers of Quiabissan, where they thought themselves out of danger of being retaken by the caziques. But Cortez carried his artifice still further.

He seizes upon the Mexican commissaries, and gains great reputation.

ther. Next morning, when the caziques acquainted him, in the utmost horror and confusion, that two of the prisoners had escaped, he pretended to be extremely incensed, and severely reprimanded them for their want of vigilance and circumspection, ordering that the remaining prisoners might be sent aboard the fleet, as if he would charge himself with their imprisonment; by which he not only gained the confidence of the two chiefs, but likewise opened the way to favour with Moteczuma, by charging his officers to treat the prisoners with all possible kindnesses.

IN this manner did Cortez pursue his schemes with the most refined policy; the good effects of which became immediately apparent. The justice, valour, and affability of the Spaniards, were reported through all the neighbouring provinces. The caziques of Zempoala and Quiabitslan acquainted all their friends and allies of the happiness they enjoyed under the protection of the strangers, being freed from imposition, and secured in their liberties, by a people equally valiant, just, and generous. It was spread abroad that the gods had come down to Quiabitslan, darting lightning at Moteczuma for his impiety; and this report gained so much credit that it greatly facilitated the projects formed by Cortez. Above thirty caziques from the mountains, the lords of a rustic people called Totonagues, paid their respects to the general, offered their troops to assist him in any enterprise, and surrendered themselves wholly to his obedience, swearing fidelity and vassalage to the king of Spain. This was an important acquisition, as these caziques ruled over rough warlike nations, the inveterate enemies of Moteczuma, and capable, according to Herrera, of bringing an hundred thousand men into the field.

Town of Villa Rica founded,

and the blunders of authors corrected.

It was now probably that Cortez laid the foundation of Villa Rica de la Vera Cruz, though we have dated it earlier, upon the authority of the Spanish writers, who are by no means consistent in their relation. Antonio de Solis alledges, that he founded the colony before he set out for Quiabitslan, not only appointing magistrates, but building houses, and fixing the name of the settlement; whereas in another place he alledges, that hitherto the new corporation travelled with the army; and that Cortez now pitched upon the plain between Quiabitslan and the sea, for the residence of the colony; because the land was fertile, abounding in wood and water, and very contiguous to a good harbour, none of which conveniences were to be met with in the former situation. The workmen were distributed according to their several professions, and the Indians assisting with equal diligence and dexterity, the houses began to rise, and the compass of the town was marked by a strong mud wall, which formed a sufficient defence against the weapons of the country. This was the Villa Rica which some writers place more to the eastward, and among others de Solis, though he afterwards contradicts himself; or else we must conclude what is not at all improbable, that the former settlement was relinquished upon his discovering a place more commodious for a colony. The principal officers of the army laboured with the diligence of the meanest soldiers; and Cortez even applied his hands and shoulders to the most servile occupations, by way of encouraging the people by his example, and shewing them, that whatever promoted the public good was honourable and praiseworthy.

WHILE he was thus busied in the arts of peace, an embassy, composed of Moteczuma's two nephews, assisted by five ancient caziques, as counsellors, and attended by a magnificent retinue, arrived with presents from Mexico. The emperor, upon hearing of the reception given to the Spaniards by the chiefs of Zempoala and Quiabitslan, was so highly enraged, that he gave orders to raise a numerous army, to take signal vengeance on the perfidious caziques, and sacrifice the Spaniards to his gods; for while his anger continued, he doubted not but he should without difficulty be able to seize upon Cortez and his whole army. However, upon the arrival of the commissaries released by Cortez, the scene instantly changed, and those orders were revoked. The prisoners expatiated upon the valour, courtesy, and generosity of the Spanish general, whose views were wholly pacific, and respect for the great Moteczuma as profound as that of the most faithful of his subjects. This appeased the indignation of the haughty sovereign, and made him resolve once more to try the effects of a negotiation recommended by presents; and to give more weight to the embassy, he appointed the young princes, his nephews, to wait upon Cortez. The present was delivered to the general, together with the emperor's thanks for the civilities shewn to his officers. Complaints were made of the rebellious spirit and presumption of the caziques; and Moteczuma's wishes expressed that Cortez would interpose for the release of the other inferior officers; the speech concluding with Moteczuma's earnest request, that the Spaniards would withdraw their protection from their rebellious chiefs, relinquish the fruitless hope of being admitted to the royal presence, and make the necessary preparations for evacuating the Mexican dominions. This last point was the main object of the embassy, and the princes laboured it with great zeal and address, but to little effect, as Cortez had already fixed his resolution. He received the ambassadors with great respect; but a but before he gave his answer, had the four prisoners brought into his presence, and returned them to Moteczuma, telling the ambassadors, that he hoped the error of the caziques was fully repaired by the restitution which he now made; that he found himself under the necessity of protecting them, in return for the many civilities bestowed on him. He exhorted the ambassadors to admonish their prince to restrain his officers from demanding more from the subjects than was required by the sovereign himself, and adding to the oppression of heavy taxes the barbarity of human sacrifices: he assured them, that neither the caziques of Zempoala and Quiabitslan, nor those of the mountains, who were entirely at his devotion, should act in any thing prejudicial to the royal authority; and that for the rest he would explain himself when he had the honour of being admitted b into Moteczuma's presence, assuring the ambassadors, that no dangers or difficulties could terrify Spaniards who were accustomed to seek glory amidst the greatest hazards. This he delivered in so firm a tone of voice, that the ambassadors did not choose to reply, though they appeared to be dissatisfied. He gave them some presents, and dismissed them, in full confidence, that, notwithstanding their disappointment with respect to the principal object of their journey, they could not but make their report favourable to the character of the Spaniards. Besides, the equality upon which he treated with Moteczuma, gave him great credit with the Indians, who were persuaded that only a deity, with so slender a force, durst presume to oppose so mighty a prince, who was even glad to purchase his friendship with presents, although he disdained to bend his knee to his idols; and these sentiments

c were confirmed by the prodigies and omens which had made so deep an impression on this credulous simple people.

PRUDENCE and penetration were indeed no less necessary to Cortez than valour; he was obliged to guard against the snares laid by his friends, as well as to oppose the open attacks of his enemies. Of this there now appeared an instance. The cazique of Zempoala was the inveterate enemy of the chief of the neighbouring province of Zempazingo; and he thought this a proper opportunity of taking vengeance, and enriching himself with plunder. He told Cortez, that a body of Mexicans were quartered in Zempazingo, and that they desolated his fields, and ruined his country, on account of his attachment. Cortez believed the feigned relation, and accordingly marched with a corps of Spaniards
d and Indians to attack Zempazingo; but finding the town deserted, and meeting with some priests, the deceit was discovered: he reprov'd the cazique of Zempoala for seducing him by falsties, to be the mean instrument of his private revenge, and the tool to gratify his avarice: he contracted a friendship with the cazique of Zempazingo, reconciled the two chiefs, and gained the esteem of both parties, by the equity and steadiness of his conduct. On his return to Zempoala, the cazique endeavoured to efface his fault, by a present of eight of the most beautiful virgins in his province. One of them was his niece, and her he presented to Cortez, desiring he would take her for his wife, and distribute the rest among his officers; an honour which Cortez declined, on account of his religion, taking this opportunity to persuade the cazique to abjure idolatry, and embrace the Christian religion: a point which he laboured to little purpose, although he proceeded so far as to e pull down the images in the temple, erecting crosses in their stead, and the other emblems of the Roman catholic religion. Upon this circumstance all the Spanish writers expatiate with great zeal, praising the piety of Cortez; though, for our own parts, we cannot reconcile christianity with the ambitious schemes he had projected, and the unjust attack made upon the dominions of a prince with whom he had no quarrel. Indeed whatever the piety of Cortez might have been, it is certain that the propagation of the gospel was by no means the motive of the Spanish court for extending her conquests in America; and the vast treasures brought from thence into Spain evince, that the pious subjects of the most catholic king laboured more assiduously in the gold and silver mines of Mexico and f Peru, than in the vineyard of salvation. Our intention is not, however, to demonstrate the injustice of these conquests, which point we leave to divines and political casuists, but to shew the absurdity of the Spanish writers in general, who run out into the most extravagant encomiums upon the piety and true catholic zeal of the Spanish leaders of those expeditions, made purely from motives of national interest, and private avarice or ambition.

UPON the return of the Spaniards to their new settlement at Vera Cruz, they were joined by Francisco de Sancedo, who left Cuba with one officer and ten men, to join Cortez, and attach themselves to his fortune. This supply gave great pleasure to the general; but it was considerably abated by the intelligence which Sancedo brought, that Velaquez, governor of Cuba, was still the enemy of Cortez, and had pursued his resentment with such application and diligence, that he remonstrated to the court upon the desertion of Cortez, and obtained a commission from the king, appointing him lieutenant not only of the island of Cuba, but sole director of all the discoveries and conquests which should be made on the continent, with power to bestow employments, and equip expeditions, in whatever manner he should think proper. It was necessary for Cortez to vindicate his own conduct to the court, and efface any bad impressions which might probably remain from the misrepresentations of Velaquez. He likewise thought it incumbent upon him to have his commission immediately from the king, and wholly independent on Velaquez; for which purpose he determined to dispatch Portocarrero and Montejo to Spain, with an account of his proceedings. He laid his intention before the town of Vera Cruz, and obtained a letter, signed by all the magistrates, giving a short relation of the success of the expedition, the provinces already brought under the obedience of his catholic majesty, the settlement made at Vera Cruz, the riches, fertility, and great plenty of this new world, the progress made by the gospel, and the dispositions that were making for bringing the powerful empire of the tyrant Moteczuma under subjection, by means of his own disaffected subjects. In this letter were mentioned the violences offered by Velaquez, with a full vindication of the measures taken by Cortez, the strongest encomiums upon his conduct, his valour, prudence, clemency, justice, and every quality that constitutes the general and statesman. Great praise likewise was bestowed on the courage and constancy of all the other captains and soldiers engaged in the expedition; and his majesty was intreated, in the name of the town and magistrates of La Vera Cruz, to confirm the authority of Cortez, and cherish, by his countenance, an infant colony, that promised to produce the greatest wealth and honour to his royal diadem. To this letter Cortez added another from himself, in which he entered more minutely upon his justification, and gave strong assurances of his well-grounded expectation of bringing the empire of Moteczuma under his majesty's obedience. With these dispatches were sent all the gold, jewels, and other presents and effects, which the colony had acquired since their arrival in Mexico, either by gift, conquest, or traffic, the soldiers cheerfully giving up their shares, that the offering made by their general might appear with the more splendor. The best ship in the fleet was got ready for this voyage, and the two envoys set sail for Spain on the 16th of July, with strict injunctions to pass through the channel of Bahama, if possible, in order to avoid being intercepted by Velaquez, and at no event to touch upon any part of the island of Cuba.

A.D. 1519.
He discovers a conspiracy.

SCARCE had Cortez finished this important business, when he was alarmed by the discovery of a conspiracy to destroy the whole scheme, by giving intelligence to Velaquez of the course of the ship, and the contents of the dispatches. De Solis alledges, that the project was laid, to seize upon the ship, and carry her off, with all the dispatches, to Cuba. Be this as it may, Cortez had no sooner made discovery of the contrivance, than he seized upon the conspirators, two of whom were, after a regular trial, condemned to death, and two others to be whipped. All the rest were pardoned, except the chief mariner, who was sentenced to lose one foot, as a just punishment, which however would not disable him from the service. Herrera alledges, that the licentiate Juan Diaz was engaged in this conspiracy; but that Cortez, out of respect to his function, did not proceed against him; though de Solis vindicates the character of this gentleman: a point indeed of little consequence to the English reader.

CORTEZ having now discharged himself of all that appeared necessary towards confirming his own power, procuring the good of the colony, and promoting the success of the expedition, turned his thoughts towards employing his soldiers upon some greater enterprize than had hitherto been undertaken; but he first resolved to destroy the fleet, to cut off all possibility of retreating, and to convince the soldiers that their only security consisted in their valour and perseverance. This scheme he communicated to some of his friends, by whom it was approved. It was then referred to the council, and obtained their approbation; and the measure was so well conducted, that even the mariners and pilots were satisfied with the prudence of the resolution, upon a presumption that the ships must necessarily sink for want of repairing. Accordingly all the ships were burnt, Cortez only reserving the rigging, and a few boats for fishing; a bold action, the merit of which Castillo claims to himself, by alledging that he had first suggested it to Cortez. Immediately measures were concerted for advancing farther into the country; preparations were made for the march, and a general muster was taken of the army, which was found to consist of five hundred foot, fifteen horse, and six pieces of cannon; a very inconsiderable force, with which to enter upon the reduction of a vast empire. Of this slender corps an hundred and fifty men and two horses were left for the defence of the settlement, under the conduct of Juan de Escalante, an officer in whose valour and abilities Cortez placed the greatest confidence. The cazique of Zempoala had provided 200 Tamemes, or Indians, accustomed to burdens, to carry the baggage; and had besides augmented the army with a body of troops, out of which Cortez picked 400 men that appeared the most strong and desperate, among whom were near fifty of the principal nobility of the province. To the a cazique he recommended, in the strongest terms, obedience to Escalante, governor of Vera Cruz, who would not fail to protect him from all insults and injuries during his absence, provided that his behaviour merited favour and regard.

He begins his march for Tlascala.

Just as the troops were beginning their march, Escalante sent advice to the general, that a squadron had been seen off Vera Cruz, without caring to come to, though he made them signals of peace. Such intelligence was not to be disregarded; accordingly Cortez set out from the army for the settlement, and found, upon his arrival, that one of the vessels had come to an anchor, and some men were landing, who approached without any symptoms of fear. It soon appeared that one was a notary, and the rest witnesses of his notification to Cortez, that Francisco de Garay, governor of Jamaica, had, by virtue of the king's commission, equipped a squadron, consisting of three ships and two hundred and seventy men, under the command of Alonso de Pinada, to make discoveries, and that they had already taken possession of the lands near the river Panuco, where it was intended to establish a colony, about twelve or fourteen leagues to the westward. Garay therefore required that he should not attempt to make any settlements that way. To which Cortez answered, that he was a stranger to forms of law; but if the captain would favour him with an interview, every thing should be adjusted in the manner most beneficial to the public, as they were both subjects of the same prince, and mutually obliged to promote his service. On the notary's refusing to go back with this message, and insisting, in a disrespectful manner, upon a direct answer, Cortez ordered him and his companions to be seized, and had afterwards the good fortune to take prisoners three more of the ship's crew, who enlisted without scruple, in his service, as did the notary and his companions; a reinforcement of some consequence at a time when seven Spaniards were become so valuable. Upon this he returned to Zempoala, giving himself no uneasiness about Garay's attempts, and congratulating himself that it was no armament sent by Velaquez to obstruct his projects. He began his march with a body of Spaniards, in the van, and another of Indians in the rear; the charge of the artillery being committed to the strongest of the Tamenes, and the baggage distributed among the rest, passing through several towns belonging to the mountaineers, in all which he was kindly received, and combated every obstruction, which scarcity of provision, inclemency of weather, bad roads, mountains and precipices, could throw in his way. The cold was excessive, and the showers of rain hard and frequent, insomuch that the soldiers, deprived of the means of shelter, kept on marching to avoid being chilled to death. Cortez at last gained the top of the mountains, just as a struggle began to appear between the strength and resolution of his soldiers; from whence he could discover some villages at a little distance, to which the army proceeded with alacrity, and met with refreshment, that soon effaced the memory of all their past labours. They were now on the borders of Zocotblun, a large and populous province, the cazique of which resided in the capital of the same name with the province, situated in the valley, at the foot of the mountain. Cortez gave him notice of his arrival by two Zempoalans, and received an invitation from the cazique to lodge in his city, where, however, upon his arrival, the soldiers met with such indifferent entertainment, as satisfied the general that he was invited rather from motives of fear than affection. When the cazique visited him, it was apparent that he was the mere tool of Motexuma, employed to inspire his enemies with dread, by exaggerating his power. Cortez penetrated into his designs, and frustrated them, by acquainting the chief, that he was sufficiently informed of the emperor's power; but though his intentions were pacific, he did not fear the whole strength of Mexico, as one of his men was able to cope with whole armies of such troops as Motexuma's. "I shall never," says he, "draw my sword without just provocation; but once drawn, every thing shall be put to fire and sword, and nature will assist me with her prodigies, and heaven with its lightning. I come to abolish human sacrifices, and to vindicate the cause of a tremendous Being, who is shocked at the barbarous superstition and ignorant idolatry of Motexuma, which you reverence as part of his grandeur." The impression which this bold speech made on the cazique was perceivable; he not only accommodated the soldiers with better lodging and provision, but shewed an awful respect towards the meanest Spaniard, as if he believed him his superior; for what could he imagine of a handful of men, who set at defiance what he believed to be the greatest power on earth, but that they were something supernatural? As a difficulty arose about the route which Cortez should take, the cazique recommended Chotula, because the country was fertile, and the inhabitants, who were more disposed to commerce than war, would grant him an undisputed passage; whereas he with great earnestness dissuaded him from the road of Tlascala, as the people were of a bloody warlike disposition. This advice, however, was opposed by the Indians that attended Cortez. They affirmed that Chotula was a very populous city, the people of which were insidious and treacherous; besides that, it was generally filled with Motexuma's troops. As to the Tlascalans, they affirmed, he had nothing thing to fear, since they were bound by the strictest ties of amity and alliance with the Zempoalans and Totonokes, and waged continual war with Moteczuma. What they said was agreeable to the general's own sentiments; and chusing rather to confide in approved friends than in the cazique, who appeared so much attached to Moteczuma, he gave orders for the army to march strait for Tlascala, on the frontiers of which he soon arrived. Then he halted at a town called Xacozango, upon hearing that the province was in arms; but the design was kept secret, in order to gain a more intimate knowledge of the strength and disposition of the people.

At this time Cortez learned that the province of Tlascala was populous and extensive, its frontier being about fifty leagues. The country was rough and mountainous, the towns were built on eminences difficult of access, and the inhabitants brave, hardy, and accustomed to arms. At first the government was monarchical; but the independent spirit of the Tlascalans, not brooking subjection to an individual, threw off the yoke, and after living for some time in a state of anarchy, formed themselves into a regular commonwealth, under the direction of a senate and certain magistrates, whose jurisdictions were limited to certain towns. The republic was now in the zenith of her power and glory, having for a series of years foiled all the power of Moteczuma, and established liberty on the most solid basis, in consequence of alliances formed with several provinces for their mutual defence. In particular the Tlascalans were strictly confederated with the Otomies, a people deemed savage even in this barbarous country, fierce in war, and cruel in conquest. This information determined Cortez to address the Tlascalans with an embassy, to request a free passage through the territories of the republic; and he chose for this employment the Zempoalan nobles, who had advised the road of Tlascala, that their credit might be interested in the issue of the negotiation. Four Zempoalans, perfectly instructed by Cortez, set out to execute their commission, dressed with all the badges of embassy usual among the Indians, and entering the city of Tlascala, were lodged in the Calpisca, the apartments destined for the reception of foreign ministers, and next day admitted to an audience of the senate. The members of this assembly were ranged on low chairs, made of one piece of wood, called Xopales. At the entrance of the ambassadors, they rose up and welcomed them with a kind of reserved civility, and important gravity. After paying their respects to the senate, the Zempoalans walked leisurely up to the middle of the hall, where they kneeled down, and waited for leave to speak; which being granted, the orator of the embassy delivered himself to the following effect, as reported by Antonio de Solis. " Noble republic, potent and valiant Tlascalans, the cazique of Zempoala, and the lords of the mountains, your friends and confederates, send you health; and wish you abundant crops, and the death of your enemies: they give you to understand, that certain invincible men are arrived among them from the east, who seem to be divinities; for they sail upon great palaces, and command thunder and lightning, the peculiar arms of heaven. They serve another God, superior to our gods, who detests tyranny and sacrifices of human blood. Their captain is ambassador from a very potent monarch, who, from motives of piety, is impelled to reform the abuses of our country, teach us the knowledge of the true God, and rescue us from the oppression, tyranny, and cruelty of the bloody Moteczuma. Having already delivered our provinces out of bondage, and placed us in a state of liberty, he desires to pass through your republic in his way to Mexico, and to be informed in what the tyrant has offended you, that he may add your cause to the others which justify his undertaking. We know his valour, justice, generosity, and pacific intentions, and therefore come in the name of the caziques your allies, to request and exhort that you will admit these strangers as the friends and benefactors of your confederates; and on the part of their captain, we can assure you, that his dispositions to the republic are friendly, and that he only demands a free passage through your country, after you shall be persuaded of the sincerity of his goodwill, and that his arms are the instruments of justice, reason, and religion, which vindicate the cause of heaven; mild and good in their own nature, and terrible only to the wicked." Having finished their harangue, the four retired to their seats, and were answered by the eldest senator in the name of the rest, " that the proposition of the Zempoalans and Totonokes was grateful to the republic; but that the answer to the captain of the strangers required mature deliberation:" with which answer the ambassadors retired to the Calpisca, while the senators shut themselves up to discuss the propriety of granting the demand made by Cortez.

On this point they were soon divided in opinion, whence ensued very warm disputes. Some were for attacking the strangers, and destroying them as enemies to the country in general; others were for granting their demand, and attaching them by civilities to the republic; while a third party steered a middle course, and advised giving them no molestation, provided they continued their march without entering upon the dominions of Tlascala.

Divisions in the senate of Tlascala.

- a Tlascala. After abundance of altercation, Magiscatzin, one of the oldest senators, and a person of great authority, desired to be heard. He mentioned the tradition of their ancestors, and the revelations of their priests, that a race of invincible men, of divine origin, who had power over the elements, should come from the east, to subdue their country. He compared the resemblance which the strangers bore to the persons figured in the tradition of Mexico, their dominion over the elements of fire, air and water; he reminded the senate of their prodigies, omens and signals, which had lately terrified the Mexicans, and indicated some very important event; and then declared his opinion, that it would be rashness to oppose a force apparently assisted by heaven, and men who had already proved, to the sad experience of the Tabascans, that they were invincible. In a word, he ballanced the danger of a refusal against the advantages which might result from granting the request of the strangers; and declared his opinion, that they ought not only to be allowed a free passage, but distinguished by all the respect and honour which the republic had power to bestow.

- THE sentiments of this sage met with great applause, and all the senate were inclined to follow his advice, when Xicotencal, a young senator of great spirit, valour, and reputation in arms, rose up, and answered him in the following words, which we quote on the authority of de Solis, as a specimen of the national character, because it seemed to convince the auditors. “Grey hairs,” said the youthful orator, “are not always infallible in their decisions, as being more inclined to cautious reflections, than to hardy enterprizes. I pay all due respect to the authority and opinion of Magiscatzin; but you will not think it strange, considering my age and profession, if I have notions less refined, and politics more daring. When we talk of war, we are often deceived by that which we call prudence; for whatever resembles fear is not virtue, but a passion. It is true, there is an expectation among us of those oriental reformers, which is kept up by a prophecy that is slow in its completion. It is not my inclination to discredit a tradition that has become venerable by the consent of ages; but tell me, I pray you, what security have we that these are the promised strangers? Is it the same thing to come from the east as to come from the celestial regions, which we consider as the birth-place of the sun? The fire-arms and great embarkations which you call sea-palaces, may be the effects of human industry, which are admired for their novelty; and perhaps they may be the delusion of some enchantment, like the deception of the sight, which we call cunning and juggling in our diviners. Was what they did in Tabasco any more than their defeating an army superior to themselves in number; and shall this be thought wonderful in Tlascala, where greater actions are daily performed by natural means? May not the great benignity they have used towards the Zempoalans be an artifice to gain the people? at least I shall deem it a suspicious sweetness to please the palate, and cover the internal poison, as it is perfectly consistent with what we already know of their pride, avarice, and ambition. These men, if they be not in fact some monsters thrown up by the sea on our coasts, rob our people, live at discretion, guided by no other law than their own will, and given up to the delights of this country, despise our constitutions, and endeavour to introduce innovations equally dangerous to religion and government. They destroy our temples, as appears from their conduct at Zempoala, pull in pieces our altars, and blaspheme our gods; and is this the race you call celestial? If the Zempoalans and Totonosques have received them into their friendship, it was without consulting our republic; consequently we are under no ties by the laws of nations. They advance under no other protection than the want of reflection, which deserves to be punished as presumptuous. These prodigies and signals, so magnified by Magiscatzin, rather persuade us to treat them like enemies, as being constant harbingers of calamities and miseries. Heaven, with its prodigies, does not give us notice of what we wish, but what we are to fear; for those felicities never come accompanied by terrors; nor does heaven light comets to lull us to sleep, but to awake us to a sense of our danger. My opinion therefore is, that we assemble our forces, and crush them at one blow, for they come into our power, marked by signals in the heavens, purposely that we may look on them as oppressors of our country, and revilers of our gods; and that establishing the reputation of our arms upon their punishment, the world may perceive that it is not the same thing to be immortal in Tabasco, and invincible in Tlascala (A).”

THE speech of Xicotencal was echoed with loud acclamations; it soon effaced every trace left in the minds of the audience by the more cautious advice of Magiscatzin; it was congenial to the warlike humour of the people, full of fire, spirit and resolution, and Resolution of the senate to oppose Cortez.

(A) The authors have inserted this speech as a masterly piece of elocution, which the reader may, if he thinks proper, ascribe to the imagination of the Spanish historian. At any event it may serve to convey an idea of the disposition of the warlike-spirited Tlascalans.

therefore received as more honourable. It was from this consideration resolved, that Xicotencal should assemble a body of forces, to measure his strength with the strangers, without engaging or hazarding the whole power of the republic. If he overcame the enemy, the reputation of the republic in arms was preserved; and if he should be defeated, there was room to treat of peace, by laying the blame upon the Otonies, and declaring it was a disorder occasioned by their ferocity. In consequence of this determination, the Zempoalan ambassadors were detained, which raised suspicions in the mind of Cortez that the embassy was ill received, and obliged him, after staying eight days in his encampment, to draw nearer to the city of Tlascala. With his army drawn up in good order, he passed a strong wall which joined two mountains, and had been raised at a vast expence of labour by the ancient inhabitants against the invasions of their enemies. It was happy for Cortez that the Tlascalans had not thought of defending this post, either because they chose to give battle in the open plain, or had not so soon expected his approach. He had not marched far beyond the wall, when a party of the Tlascalans was discovered with plumes, which denoted that an army was in the field. These he drove before him by a detachment of six horse, obliged them to join another party, and then reinforcing the advanced detachment, charged the enemy with such vigour, that they began to retire, when five thousand Tlascalans rushed with loud shouts from the bushes in which they had concealed themselves, just as the infantry seasonably came up to support their slender body of cavalry. The enemy attacked with the utmost fury; but they were so much disconcerted with the first discharge of the fire-arms, that they retreated in confusion, and furnished the Spaniards with an opportunity of pursuing them with great slaughter. Cortez, however, suspecting that this could not be their whole force, and that it was rather a stratagem to draw him in than a flight, reunited his corps, and advanced with the utmost caution, in order of battle, to an eminence, from whence he discovered the whole Tlascalan army, composed of near forty thousand men of different nations, under the command of Xicotencal, general of the republic. The experience which the Spaniards gained at Tabasco prevented their being discouraged with the vast superiority of the enemy; they marched down the hill with perfect composure, formed on the plain, brought down their artillery without hurry or confusion, and disposed every thing for attacking the Tlascalans, with the strongest assurance of victory. Xicotencal had indeed shewed his dexterity, by disposing his troops into such a manner as to surround the Spaniards, which he had no sooner effected, than he contracted the circle with incredible diligence, and rained showers of darts, stones, and arrows, which almost covered the little army of Cortez. Being sensible, however, by the terrible slaughter of his troops, of the inferiority of the Indian missile weapons to the fire-arms of the enemy, he closed, in order to try the effects of his pikes and swords. In this particular the Indians were not more upon an equality; they fought with great courage and impetuosity, but they fell in heaps, either by the sword, or the volleys discharged among them from the artillery. It was their policy to conceal their slain and wounded; yet it was apparent their numbers were diminished, and their fury abated, for they fell back to a greater distance, though they still continued the engagement. Cortez, who had all this while fought in the form of a square, presenting a front to every side, now consulted his officers, whether he ought not to force his way through the enemy, to a place where he might extend his line, and fight to more advantage? which they approving, he formed his men into a column, pushed on with irresistible fury, and after an obstinate engagement, entirely broke and routed the enemy, chiefly by means of the horses, animals so wonderful and dreadful to the Tlascalans. In the pursuit, one Nicron, a Spanish horseman, engaged himself too far, was surrounded, and taken prisoner by the Indians, after they had killed his horse, and cut off the head of the monster, which was placed as a trophy on the point of a spear, and carried in triumph to the senate, though Nicron had the good fortune to be rescued by his companions. By this accident the Tlascalans were encouraged to rally, and renew the charge, which they begun with redoubled vigour, that might have proved fatal to the lives of many Spaniards, had it continued; but fortunately Xicotencal had ordered a retreat to be sounded, on discovering that most of his officers were slain, apprehending that he should not be able to govern such a multitude of soldiers by his own authority. Thus the Spaniards remained masters of the field, tho' the Tlascalans likewise claimed a victory, only because they were not completely defeated, and they had taken what they deemed an inestimable prize, the head of a Spanish horse, which was greatly admired, and sacrificed with the utmost solemnity in one of the temples. On their side the slaughter was very great, but not certain as to the number, the killed and wounded having been carried off the field with the utmost diligence; while Cortez sustained no other loss than that of one horse, and nine soldiers who were wounded, and prevented for a few days from doing duty.

a THE field being now open, Cortez marched to a village in the way to Tlascala, of which he took possession without opposition, and then refreshed his soldiers with abundance of provision, which the enemy had left behind; but it was obvious that the road to Tlascala would still be disputed, and that the republic, by no means, acknowledged herself conquered. The death of so many great officers and caziques occasioned various opinions in the senate; but still Xicotencal maintained a majority, who were for trying the fortune of Tlascala in another engagement, notwithstanding the loud clamours raised by Magiscatzin's party against the general's vanity and rashness. Xicotencal, on the other hand, animated his drooping countrymen by the trophy of the horse's head; he desired a reinforcement, and promised to give a good account of the enemy with so much confidence, that the senate was ready to enter into the measures dictated by his revenge, when an auxiliary b cazique arrived with ten thousand men, and infused fresh spirits into the republic, because it was regarded as succours from the gods, being unexpected. Cortez would have made proposals of peace; but he could find no Zempoalans who would undertake the commission, being terrified with the usage their countrymen met with, who had now escaped from confinement, upon notice that they were to be sacrificed in a few days to the gods of Tlascala. He advanced at the head of a party, seized upon several villages in the way to the capital, and returned to the camp with great quantities of provisions, and a number of prisoners, from whom he had intelligence, that Xicotencal was encamped at the distance of two leagues, and diligent in recruiting his forces, which would in a day or two be much c more numerous than in the former engagement. He was sensible, that if victory depended upon numbers, the Spaniards would have no chance with the Tlascalans; Cortez, therefore, released all the prisoners, saying, he would augment Xicotencal's army, to shew the republic how little he feared her utmost strength; an act which gave the enemy the most extravagant ideas of his valour and generosity, and contributed greatly to his future success; besides, that by this means he increased his own strength, having no occasion to employ troops to guard the prisoners. Choosing out the most intrepid and ingenious among the persons whom he set at liberty, he charged them with a message to Xicotencal to the following effect: That he was concerned for the loss which the republic sustained in the battle; but the senate was to blame for treating them in a hostile manner, who had only d pacific designs. Notwithstanding this cause of displeasure, he would still, he said, enter upon a negotiation as if nothing had passed; but insisted upon Xicotencal's disarming, unless he wanted to draw down his vengeance, to be utterly destroyed, and the name and misfortunes of Tlascala be made a terror to all the neighbouring nations.

It was imagined this bold message would intimidate the Indian general; but it produced the very contrary effect, and so roused his resentment, that he sent the prisoners back, mangled for their presumption, with an answer, that Cortez should see him in the field at the first rising of the sun; for his intention was to carry him, and all his people, alive, to offer them up as sacrifices to the gods of the republic. This notice he gave him, that he might prepare himself; saying, that he was not accustomed to lessen the glory of his victories by taking the enemy at a disadvantage. With these menaces Cortez and Xicotencal e irritated each other, while both made the most vigorous preparations for executing their promises, and deciding their fortune by one battle. The Spanish general kept strict guard during the night, and next morning advanced half a league to an advantageous post, where he determined to wait for the Tlascalans, in such a disposition as the experience of the preceding engagement dictated to be necessary. His flanks were secured by the artillery, orders were issued with respect to the times and distances when the cannon could be discharged to most advantage, every contingency was foreseen, and Cortez took his own post at the head of the cavalry, that he might superintend the whole, succour those who were hard pressed, and move with more facility and velocity to the different parts of his army, f as occasion might require. In a short time the enemy's van appeared, and the scouts returned with advice, that an army was in motion which covered the whole country. It consisted of fifty thousand men, the whole strength of the republic united to that of her allies. The golden eagle of Tlascala, which is only brought forth upon the most extraordinary occasions, was displayed aloft in the middle, and every circumstance declared that the engagement would be bloody and decisive; the republic risking her fate on the issue. When the Indian army approached within a proper distance, the artillery poured such destruction upon their ranks, that they reeled back, and seemed divided between the different passions of shame, fear, and resentment; but the latter prevailing, they advanced in a tumultuous manner, and were saluted with such volleys from the musquetry and cross-bows, as g put them a second time in suspense whether they ought not to leave the field to the enemy. Xicotencal, however, raised their passions by his eloquence, and animated them by his example, to such a pitch of despair, that they pushed each other on to destruction, the rear ranks trampling upon those in the front, and rushing like a torrent with such violence, that they they broke the Spaniards and Zempoalans, and required the utmost abilities of Cortez to rally a his forces, and withstand so furious a charge. He flew to every part, exhorted, intreated, and animated with such success, that, recovering themselves, the Spaniards dealt destruction on every side, and Cortez, with the cavalry, bore down all before him, and closed his ranks just as an accident deprived him of the honour of gaining a complete victory by his own valour. The enemy were of a sudden observed to be in the utmost confusion, their troops moving to different parts, and dividing and bearing upon each other, until the rear guard retired in a tumultuous manner, and those who were engaged in the front were left to find safety in flight. Cortez suspected some stratagem, and therefore pursued with caution; but he soon learned from the prisoners that the proud and passionate Xicotencal had affronted one of the most powerful of his allies, who, resenting the injury, drew off his troops, and with them the bulk of the confederate army, which obliged Xicotencal to leave the field, and an indisputable victory to the Spaniards: yet such was the slaughter which preceded this accident, that it is highly probable it was upon the whole favourable to the republic, by preserving the lives of her subjects, and yielding more easily a victory, which must in the event have been the reward of such discipline, and well-regulated courage as the Spaniards exerted on this occasion. Their loss was inconsiderable, only one soldier being killed, and twenty slightly wounded; their triumph was complete; yet were the Spanish soldiers discontented, taking shame that they should have been broken, and put in disorder by barbarians; a circumstance which touched them so nearly, that they returned to their quarters, melancholy and disheartened, as if they had been defeated. This laid the seeds of dissention and mutiny, the soldiers blaming each other, and some charging the whole fault on Cortez, declaring that they would not sacrifice themselves to gratify his humour, and would repair to Vera Cruz, leaving him alone to perfect the dictates of rash ambition. Notice of the seditious disposition of the soldiers was no sooner brought to Cortez, than he assembled the whole army, placing the most discontented near his person, and laid before them his present circumstances, as if he had desired their council and advice. He repented all they had to hope from advancing, and to fear if they retreated; he painted in such lively colours the shame of abandoning the fruits of so many glorious victories, and he placed every thing in so favourable a point of view, that all murmuring ceased, and one of the most mutinous told his companions aloud, "That the general instructed them in what they ought to do, while he was only asking their advice: it is not possible for us, said he, to retreat, without sacrificing our hopes, our glory, and our lives." All were convinced of the rectitude of the general's opinion; and it was resolved, by universal acclamations, to prosecute the enterprize.

The Tlascalans
consult the magicians,
and are again defeated.

MATTERS went otherwise on at Tlascalala, where nothing but confusion, disorder, and dismay, appeared. The second defeat of the army spread a general consternation. The common people cried out for peace; and the nobility, had they been unanimous, were unable to carry on the war without their assistance. It was the opinion of the more timid, that they ought to retire with their families to the mountains; of the more superstitious, that the Spaniards were deities, and ought as such to be worshipped; of the more resolute, that another engagement should be hazarded, and of the more prudent and moderate, that peace should be solicited, and the Spaniards gained by kindness, since they could neither be conquered by numbers nor valour. Consultations were held in the senate, the result of which were, that the Spaniards indeed were not gods, but that their actions were so extraordinary and supernatural, as to require the influence of magical powers; for which reason it would be proper to consult the magicians of the republic. Accordingly these sages were called, and pretending that they had already discovered by their art the point in which they were to be consulted, declared without scruple, that, in consequence of profound study, and deep observation of their circles, they had fully discovered the source of those supernatural acts of valour performed by the strangers. The whole they alledged consisted in this, that the Spaniards were the children of the sun, produced by his own active quality in the mother earth of the oriental regions, impregnated by his spirit; and their greatest enchantment being the presence of their father, whose warm influence communicated to them a force superior to human nature, and rendered them immortal while his beams shone upon them; but that upon his returning to the west, the influence ceased, and his children remained disheartened, weak, and withered, like the herbs of the field, and reduced to the mortal condition of other men: for which reason they advised they might be attacked in the night, and destroyed before the rising sun again rendered them invincible.

As the wisdom of these magicians was beyond all dispute, it is no wonder the senate of Tlascalala should accede to their sage admonitions, especially as the opinions of those mysterious interpreters of futurity was nearly consonant to their own sentiments. They did so, and orders were immediately dispatched to Xicotencal, to begin his attack on the Spaniards after

- a after sun-set, with the utmost privacy, and cut them all off before morning. This general, whether he entertained any opinion or not of the advice of the forcerers, cheerfully followed his instructions, because he desired nothing more than an opportunity of fighting, until he wiped off his former disgrace. Accordingly he selected a body of ten thousand of the most desperate soldiers in his army, and advanced under cover of the night, with profound silence, towards the Spanish entrenchments. Cortez, however, was upon his guard; the centinels on the out-posts brought advice that the enemy were in motion, and every thing was disposed for their reception without noise or confusion. The Indians were suffered to ascend the wall drawn round the camp before any intimation was given that their design was discovered, and then such a shower of bullets was poured from the cannon,
- b small-arms, and cross-bows, as made dreadful havock, and convinced Xicotencal of the delusions of the forcerers; but this served only to animate his courage, and drive him on to desperate efforts. The assault was made in three different quarters, the whole body of Tlascalans rushing upon the Spanish defences. Their exertions of valour were indeed extraordinary, considering how unacquainted they were with forcing entrenchments; they climbed upon each others shoulders, ascended the walls, and paid no regard to the death of those who went before, until themselves met with the same fate. For several hours the battle raged with unparalleled fury; when at length Xicotencal, convinced by the carnage of his troops that perseverance could serve no other purpose than procuring the destruction of his army, ordered the signal to be made for retreating; which was no sooner observed by Cortez,
- c than he detached a party to harraiss his rear, equipped with little bells, that, by the novelty of the noise, spread the utmost terror among the enemy. In the pursuit great numbers were slain; and this complete victory was gained at the inconsiderable expence of one Zempoalan, who was killed; an event deemed miraculous, considering the multitude of darts and arrows that were found within the entrenchments.

- It was now obvious to the Tlascalans that their forcerers were mistaken, and despondency ensued. The Spaniards were found to be proof against strength and stratagem, equally invincible in the middle of the night, as when the sun was in its meridian. The common people grew more clamorous for peace, the nobility were dissatisfied and divided, and the senators ashamed and silent. The magicians were immediately punished, as if this last
- d disgrace had been wholly owing to their impostures. Two or three of the principal were sacrificed at the altars, to appease the supposed indignation of the gods, who afflicted the republick with such heavy calamities, and the rest were severely reprimanded, and delivered over to contempt. The majority inclined to peace, and applauded the prudence and foresight of Magiscatzin, who had predicted all that happened; even the most incredulous believed the Spaniards were actually the celestial beings mentioned in their prophecies. Orders were immediately dispatched to Xicotencal to suspend hostilities, and keep on the defensive, until he was made acquainted with the farther resolution of the senate, and the success of the pacific negotiations they proposed establishing. To this order Xicotencal refused obedience, answering with arrogance, “That he and his soldiers were the senate, and would
- e “support the honour of the republic, which was now deserted by those who were called “fathers of their country.” Disappointment rendered him quite frantic; he resolved upon another assault in the night, but took his measures with unusual caution. Observing that the neighbouring peasants carried provisions to the Spanish camp, which they exchanged for beads, bells, and other trinkets, he detached forty soldiers in the habits of those rustics, and sent them loaded with pearls, fowls, and other provisions, to Cortez, ordering them to mark exactly the nature and strength of the fortifications, and where they might be forced with the least difficulty; a stratagem which sufficiently demonstrates that this barbarian was possessed of sagacity and a truly military genius, although the scheme proved abortive. The curiosity of those spies giving suspicion, they were seized and put to the
- f torture, until they confessed the whole project, and that an attempt was that very night to be made by twenty thousand Tlascalans, at different quarters of the camp, agreeable to the directions they were to bring after inspecting the works. Cortez, who was at this time indisposed, gave the necessary instructions for resisting the enemy, and then deliberated on the punishment of the delinquents, ordering that fourteen of the most obstinate should be punished with the loss of their hands or fingers, and dismissed in that manner, with a message to Xicotencal, that he sent his emissaries back again, to acquaint him with the situation of his fortifications, and that he was waiting impatiently for the assault. The Indian army, that was in full march, was struck with the bloody spectacle, and Xicotencal was particularly concerned at the discovery of a stratagem, in which he rested his last hopes. He persuaded
- g himself, that the secret thoughts of his people, of whose fidelity he was confident, must have been obtained by the assistance of some divinity; and just as he was revolving this thought in his own mind, ambassadors arrived from the senate, with orders for him to resign his command, on account of his insolence and disobedience. All his officers were,

The people desire peace, but Xicotencal is obstinate.

besides, prohibited, on pain of death, any longer to obey his directions; and this accident, so immediately succeeding the discovery of so deep laid a scheme, not only broke all Xicotencal's resolution, but rendered the army extremely averse to the prosecution of a war attended only with disgrace and misfortune. The soldiers dispersed with extraordinary readiness, and took the road of Tlascala, leaving their general to return, attended only by his friends and relations, and to appear before the senate, to answer for his last act of disobedience.

*The senate sues
for peace.*

MEAN time the Spaniards continued in the utmost suspense, whether they were to expect the enemy. The whole night they remained in arms, without venturing to take any rest, until their scouts brought word next day that the Tlascalan camp was removed to a greater distance. It was on the third day that the joyful news arrived, that the hostile enemy was broke up; news that was soon confirmed by the appearance of ambassadors from the senate, with terms of pacification. They apologized for the conduct of the republic, laying the blame of the war upon the Otomies, and other fierce allied nations, whom the senate had not been able to restrain. Although Cortez was sensible of the falsity of this excuse, he suppressed his resentment, and only desired the ambassadors to acquaint the senate, that their proposals of peace were extremely agreeable to him; tho' the senate must consider, as no slight proof of his goodness, that he did not pursue the dictates of revenge, and impose laws upon them as a conqueror. Yet, before he laid himself under any obligations, he would see how they persevered in their resolution to merit his friendship, and employ the intermediate time in appeasing his captains, and endeavouring to prevail upon them to drop their just indignation. In a word, he would suspend the punishment with an uplifted arm, and leave it to the discretion of the senate, either to procure pardon, or sustain the blow which must put an end to the existence of the republic of Tlascala.

By this answer Cortez intended to check the pride of the senate, and particularly of the friends of Xicotencal, who might possibly grow insolent, on the presumption that the Spaniards were greatly weakened, before they would grant peace so readily. He likewise wanted, that the fame of his victories might have time to spread over Mexico, in order to be assured what effect it might produce at the court of Moteczuma, whence he should be enabled to square his conduct to the republic with more advantage to himself. This measure demonstrated the great foresight of the Spanish hero; for every thing fell out just as he expected. Moteczuma, who had regular accounts from his emissaries of what was transacting at Tlascala, was so much struck with the wonders reported of Cortez, that he was resolved to send him an embassy, to compliment him on his conquests over the republic, and engage him by fresh presents and civilities not to approach nearer to his capital, at the same time that the ambassadors were instructed to throw all possible obstruction in the way of the expected pacification between him and the Tlascalans. Five Mexicans, of the first quality, were appointed to execute the purposes of this embassy, and they arrived in the camp soon after the departure of the republican ambassadors. They were received with great ceremony and respect, heard attentively, and thanked for Moteczuma's present, valued at a thousand pieces of eight; but Cortez deferred giving his answer until they should have an opportunity of seeing the Tlascalan ministers; a precaution which answered more important purposes than the general expected; for the Mexicans were not long in the Spanish quarters, before they betrayed their whole instructions, by the indiscreet manner in which they asked questions about the negotiation with the republic.

*Xicotencal
comes ambassador to Cortez.*

ALL this while the senate was exhibiting proofs of their design to regain the friendship and esteem of the Spaniards, who were plentifully supplied with all manner of provision by the peasants, at the expence of the republic; strict orders being issued, not to receive the smallest return or reward for the provisions. Soon after Xicotencal in person, attended by fifty gentlemen of his family, arrived at the quarters, in the name of the senate and republic of Tlascala; this noblemen having requested the commission out of public spirit, and an earnest desire to save his country. He had tried the efforts of arms, as long as prudence dictated to him that the Tlascalans ought to rely upon their own valour; and now he was ambitious of promoting a peace, because he believed it not only salutary to the republic, but the only means by which he could merit the good opinion of Cortez, whom he esteemed, and even adored, as a hero, inspired and assisted by the gods. He appeared with the open bold air of a soldier; and having paid his respects to the general, took his seat, told his name, and confessed himself the sole author of the war, and the general of those forces who had endeavoured to destroy the Spaniards; but, struck with their valour and magnanimity, came now, with the merit of submission, to put himself in the hands of the conqueror, hoping by this acknowledgment to obtain pardon for the republic, whose name, power, and authority, he had to sue for peace, with all possible deference, and to accept it upon the terms which the Spanish general should think fit to impose. "I ask this, said he, once, twice, thrice, in the name of the senate, nobles, and commons
" of

- a “ of Tlascala, intreating you, with all earnestness, to honour the city with your presence, where you shall find quarters provided for your men, and all the respect and service that can be expected from those who are brave, and submit to intreat and obey. I only pray of you, not as a condition of the peace, but as an act of your own generosity, that the inhabitants be well used, and our gods and wives preserved from the licentiousness of the soldiers.”

CORTÉZ was delighted with the noble freedom of the Tlascalan warrior, and expressed his satisfaction in his countenance: however, lest Xicotencal should mistake the motive, and ascribe it to the joy with which he received the proposals for peace, he answered with the utmost gravity by the interpreter, “ That the republic was highly blameable for declaring so unjust a war, and Xicotencal no less faulty in prosecuting it with such common obstinacy: however, that as the Spaniards were averse to blood, except in cases of extreme necessity, and sensible of the valour of the Tlascalans, they granted the peace he desired, out of respect to the gallant exertions they made in their own defence, though upon a mistaken principle; he would favour the city with a visit, and would be careful that no violence or extortion should be committed by the soldiers;” adding, that he would give the senate timely notice of his march, that proper quarters might be provided. Xicotencal, who considered this as a pretence of Cortez to examine into the sincerity of the Tlascalans, shewed his concern at the suspicion, and turning his eyes upon the audience, cried out with vehemence: “ You have reason, great Teules, or gods, to chastise our sincerity with your distrust; but if it be not sufficient to gain your credit when the whole republic of Tlascala speaks to you by the lips of her captain-general, and these gentlemen of my retinue, who are the principal persons in the commonwealth, I and my attendants will remain as hostages in your hand, and even submit to imprisonment, during your residence in our city.” This offer, however, was refused by Cortez, who told him, that the Spaniards wanted no other security than their own valour; that he had no doubts of the sincerity of the republic, as she must know it to be her interest; that the peace remained firm and secure; and that he would proceed to Tlascala, as soon as the proper dispositions were made for quitting his present situation, and dispatching the ambassadors of Moteczuma.

- d WHEN the Tlascalans were gone, the Mexicans used their utmost address to persuade Cortez, that no confidence ought to be placed in the protestations of a barbarous, perfidious people, who only wanted to draw him into an indolent security, the more easily to destroy him and his whole army: but when they found him resolute, they used intreaties, and requested, with the utmost submission, that he would defer his visit to Tlascala for the space of six days, until they could inform Moteczuma of what had passed, and receive his farther instructions. Cortez, thinking it necessary to maintain the respect due to so great a monarch, consented, in hopes of removing those difficulties which had hitherto obstructed his request of being admitted to the court of Mexico. At the expiration of the time limited, the ambassadors returned, and with them were six gentlemen of the royal family, with a splendid attendance, and a present still more valuable than any of the former. They presented the great Moteczuma’s profound respect for the prince whom the Spaniards obeyed, whose grandeur was sufficiently apparent from the valour of his subjects. They represented, that the emperor found himself inclinable to cultivate the friendship of their monarch, by paying him a yearly tribute, dividing with him those riches in which he abounded; because he held him in great veneration, as the offspring of the sun, or at least the lord of those happy regions where light is produced: but that two previous conditions were necessary to this agreement. The first was, that no peace should be concluded with the Tlascalans; and the second, that Cortez should lay aside all thoughts of marching to Mexico, as, by the laws of the empire, the sovereign could not suffer himself to be approached by strangers. They concluded with an invective against the perfidy of the Tlascalans, the danger into which Cortez was plunging headlong, through his own credulity, and the little reason which the Spaniards would have to complain of the most fatal consequences, after having so repeatedly shut their ears to the most salutary admonitions.

Endeavours of the Mexicans to break off the negotiation.

- f FROM the whole of this discourse, the fear of Moteczuma, rather than his esteem or veneration for the Spaniards, was very apparent. Cortez deferred his answer, only telling the ambassadors, that it was necessary they should take some rest after so long and fatiguing a journey. He was willing they should be witnesses to the peace concluded with the Tlascalans, and prevented from returning before that event was placed on the most secure basis, lest Moteczuma, enraged at his resolution, should begin to put himself in a posture of defence. Hitherto he knew no preparations had been made, the court relying wholly upon the force of presents, and the exaggerated representations of the imperial power; and it was his business to keep up this infatuated negligence and security, which had taken possession session of Moteczuma and his council. Yet, though the delays were necessary to Cortez, they proved extremely irksome to the Tlascalans, who were resolved, as the last proof of their sincerity, that the whole senate in a body should wait upon him at his quarters, determining not to return until they had conducted the general to their city, and broke off the negotiations with the Mexicans; a mutual jealousy of their ancient rivals, which Cortez knew how to improve to his own advantage. The appearance of the senate was solemn and numerous; all being adorned with plumes and other ornaments, of such colours as denoted their proper persons. They were conveyed in litters, supported by the shoulders of inferior officers; Magiscatzin, that venerable sage, who had always favoured the Spaniards, holding the most distinguished and honourable rank. Next to him came the father of Xicotencal, blind with old age, but vigorous in his intellects, and extremely respected on account of his good sense and experience. Such was the curiosity of this old man to become acquainted with Cortez, that he advanced before his companions, desired to be led near the captain of the strangers, embraced the general with marks of sincerity and extraordinary esteem, and then touched and felt him all over, as if he was desirous of supplying the want of sight with his hands. Upon this the ambassadors were seated, and the blind sage addressed himself to Cortez in a sensible speech, in which he apologized for the late acts of hostility, demanded his friendship, and assured him of the sincerity of the republic in her proposals of amity. He touched upon the negotiation with the ambassadors of Moteczuma, and their endeavours to frustrate the pacific designs of the senate; and exhorted Cortez not to pay any regard to the tradition and insidious suggestions of the tyrant, their inveterate enemy; concluding with offers to put the liberties of Tlascala into his hands, and earnest intreaties that he would take up his quarters in the city; a request urged with so much importunity by the whole body of the senate, and such appearances of candor and sincerity, as were not to be longer resisted. Cortez, therefore, answered the senate with the utmost civility, making presents to each, and passing his word, that as soon as he could assemble the people from the villages necessary for conducting his artillery, he would set out for Tlascala, admonishing the senate, and indeed exerting his authority, to oblige them to return, as he could not lodge them with the convenience due to their rank, quality, and friendship. With this promise they departed; and scarce had the sun appeared next morning, when the Spaniards found five thousand Tamenes, or carriers, at their quarters, so officious to do them service, that they disputed who should have the honour of bearing the heaviest burdens. Every thing being now in readiness, the Spaniards began their march with all the order and caution constantly observed by this little army. On every side the fields were crowded with spectators, and the air was filled with cries of joy and loud acclamations. The senate came a considerable way out of the city to meet the Spaniards, with all the pomp observed in public solemnities; and having paid their compliments, surrounded the person of the general, and conducted him to Tlascala. When they entered the city, the rejoicings became louder and more tumultuous, human voices being mixed with the harsh music of the Indian flutes, horns, and drums, and the croud so great, that the officers of the senate found the utmost difficulty in clearing a passage for the procession. Women strewed flowers in the streets, and some of greater resolution pressed through the concourse, and put garlands into the hands of the soldiers, while the priests, in their sacrificing habits, offered incense, and a variety of perfumes to their nostrils. All shewed the sincerity of their hearts in their countenances; but in general the joy of the people yielded to wonder and veneration at the appearance and valour of the strangers. The quarters assigned were extremely commodious, the whole Spanish army being lodged in adjoining spacious apartments in contiguous squares. Cortez carried with him the ambassadors of Moteczuma, and lodged them, at their desire, under his own protection, as they seemed terribly apprehensive of some violence from the Tlascalans. Every day brought fresh testimonies of the real esteem in which the Tlascalans held the Spaniards; though they ventured to complain of their going armed, as if they still entertained suspicion of the sincerity of the republic; a necessary caution, which Cortez excused, by assuring them it was the custom of his country, and arms a part of the dress and equipage of a soldier, which he never laid aside in the most peaceable times, because they inured him to fatigue, obedience, and vigilance. In a word, during the space of twenty days, which the Spaniards continued in Tlascala, not a single act of offence passed on either side, and the basis of a firm alliance was laid between the two nations, of so much consequence to the future conquest, that to this day the inhabitants of this province enjoy a variety of privileges and exemptions, in reward of their friendship and fidelity.

In those days the city of Tlascala was poor, but populous; poor, we mean, with respect to gold and silver, though the inhabitants enjoyed most of the conveniences of life without the luxuries, and were so abstemious and strongly attached to liberty, that they eat all their food without salt, rather than carry on an intercourse with Moteczuma. The town was built

- a built upon four eminences, differing in height, and at a small distance from each other, stretching in length from east to west, and being naturally fortified by rocks, precipices, and steep ascents. These hills were divided into four wards, each governed by a cazique, under the authority of the senate, the supreme legislative and executive power. They were united and joined by several streets, lined with thick walls, that served as a defence where the natural situation was not thought sufficiently strong. The houses were low, consisting only of one floor, the roofs flat, and decorated with galleries. The streets were narrow and crooked, and the whole contrived more for external security, than internal convenience. The circuit of the province was about fifty leagues, the country rugged and mountainous, but extremely fertile in the vallies, all of which were finely watered.
- b The adjacent provinces were all subject to Moteczuma; but the republic was divided from them by rough high mountains, as if nature had provided a barrier for the defence of the liberties of this warlike people. The Totonques, Otomies, and other fiercer mountaineers, who had preserved their freedom, were in strict alliance with the republic; which, besides the capital we have described, was filled with other towns and large villages. From the earliest infancy the Tlascalans were addicted to arms and superstition. Their valour was distinguished over all Mexico; and this natural courage was directed by skill in martial exploits, to which all degrees of men were exercised. Such was the abundance of Indian wheat in this province, that from thence it was called Tlascala, or the land of bread; besides which it produced great abundance of delicious fruit, game, and that valuable commodity cochineal, of the use of which the Tlascalans were ignorant, regarding it only as an useless excrescence of the plant they called Tuna, though it has since been discovered to be a female insect. With all those blessings of plenty and security, Tlascala had its inconveniences, particularly by being exposed to great tempests and dreadful hurricanes, as well as to the inundations of the river Zabul, which frequently destroyed the harvest, and even the towns of the Tlascalans, unless they happened to be situated on high eminences. To these we may add the want of salt, a commodity of which the Tlascalans were fond, tho' the country produced none; and they were too obstinate in their enmity to be supplied from Mexico.

SUCH was the character of this republic, at the time it was conquered by Cortez, and linked by ties of perpetual amity to his interest; and we have been the more particular in describing this commonwealth, because the Tlascalans were extremely instrumental in all the future conquests made in New Spain, by which name the empire of Mexico began at this time to be distinguished (A).

AFTER Cortez had resided some days at Tlascala, and by the mutual civilities which passed between his people and the republicans, convinced the Mexican ambassadors of the solidity of the peace, he thought proper to dispatch them with respectful compliments to Moteczuma, without relinquishing his pretensions to visit the court of that prince. He then made preparations for advancing towards the capital, while the Tlascalans endeavoured all in their power to put off the time of his departure, by amusing the Spaniards with festivals, public entertainments, dancing after their manner, and feats of dexterity and agility. At last the day for the march being appointed, a dispute arose, whether they should march through Cholula, a populous city attached to Moteczuma, or take a longer and less convenient rout, rather than run any hazard. Cortez himself was disposed to the former; but the Tlascalans used all their influence to dissuade him from the resolution. Mean time new ambassadors, with another present, came from Moteczuma, and by their behaviour de-

(A) It may be necessary on this occasion to take notice of the means by which the Spaniards fell upon a discovery, which afterwards proved of the utmost importance, though it was then regarded only as a matter of curiosity. From the highest eminence on which the city Tlascala was situated, might be seen the volcano of Popocatepec, which sent forth a constant smoke, at which the Indians were no way terrified, because it was usual. While Cortez resided here, the volcano began to look unusually cloudy: it vomited smoke and flame with such violence, that the superstitious Tlascalans presaged some terrible calamity to their republic. The flame and fire was a phenomenon to which they had not been accustomed, and they explained it, by alledging, that those sparks of light which did not again return to the volcano, were the souls of tyrants sent abroad to chastise the earth, and were the instruments of the divine vengeance. This notion gained credit with Maxiscatzin, and some of the greatest personages of the state; although their understanding in other respects were clear and extensive, and they were entertaining Cortez with their wild superstitions, when

Diego Ordaz came to ask his leave to ascend the top of the mountain, to examine the volcano more accurately; a request which greatly astonished the affrighted Tlascalans, who regarded him as little better than a madman, or else a being conscious of his own immortality. Cortez yielded to the pressing instances of Ordaz, who, accompanied by two soldiers, ventured to the very mouth of the gulph, at the bottom of which he discovered a great mass of liquid fire; whence he conjectured that the bowels of the mountain must abound with sulphur; and this conjecture was proved by experiment in course of the conquest of Mexico. The army being in great want of powder when Cortez entered that country a second time, he recollected the volcano in Tlascala, sent thither to look for sulphur, and found great quantities, of which he made powder, which proved so essential to the success of the expedition, that Ordaz, the discoverer, was rewarded for an action, which, at the time, was deemed rash curiosity, and had for his arms the burning mountain. De Solis, lib. iii. cap. iv.

terminated Cortez in his sentiments. They told him their monarch had now condescended to suffer himself to be visited by the Spaniards; and that he had provided quarters for them at Cholula, and every thing which could render the journey agreeable and easy. This sudden change in Moteczuma's councils and behaviour, afforded suspicion that some deep stratagem was intended; however, this only served to confirm his resolution of going by Cholula, lest his betraying any symptoms of fear might inspire the enemy with courage; and that he might likewise have an opportunity of trying his strength with Moteczuma, before he found himself inclosed in the heart of his empire. The Tlascalans were certain that treachery was at the bottom of Moteczuma's affected kindness, and therefore renewed their instances; but Cortez, who affected being superior to cunning and strength, laid before them such arguments in support of his opinion, that they acquiesced; even Magiscatzin and Xicotencal applauded his magnanimity and judgment.

Cortez prepares to march for Cholula.

BEFORE Cortez begun his march, he received new marks of suspicion that the people of Cholula were but little disposed to his service, and he took notice to the Mexican ambassadors of his surprize they had not favoured him with an embassy, if they entertained the friendly sentiments which they alledged, as even those caziques, who never expected him into their country, had shewn him this piece of respect. The apology which the ambassadors made served rather to confirm than remove suspicion; they ascribed the conduct of the Cholulans to inadvertency, and endeavoured to repair the omission by giving them notice of the opinion of the Spaniards; in consequence of which, four Indians came to Tlascala, in quality of ambassadors, but of so mean rank, that Cortez refused admitting them to an audience; telling the Mexicans, that certainly the people of Cholula were very little acquainted with the modes of civility, when they made amends for a neglect, by adding ill-manners and discourtesy. When Cortez drew out his troops to begin their march, he found an army of Tlascalans in the field, whose officers had orders from the senate to obey his orders, and attend him not only to Cholula, but as far as Mexico; where they supposed he would meet with the greatest dangers and difficulties. This body of troops was very considerable; and some writers enlarge so far, as to affirm it amounted to one hundred thousand men: certain it is, that the flower of the republic's forces was called forth on this occasion; and that, although Cortez refused the obligation, he expressed his sense of this proof of the affection of the Tlascalans by the most endearing expressions. He represented to the senate the inconvenience consequent on the march of so large an army, especially as his designs were pacific; and procured their consent that he should be attended only by a few companies of their people; which himself acknowledges, in his relation, amounted to six thousand men; though Herrera reduces them to half that number. The first day's march brought Cortez within a league of Cholula, and he encamped all night in the fields, rather than expose his troops to the danger of stratagems in the dark, in a place with which he was entirely unacquainted. Next morning, as he drew near, an embassy, of better appearance than the former, came out to meet him, bringing a present of all kinds of provision, and excusing the caziques for not waiting upon the general at Tlascala, under pretence that it was an enemy's country. They offered him quarters, and expressed the great joy which it gave the inhabitants of Cholula, to have an opportunity of entertaining strangers so amiable for their generosity, and renowned for their valour; and every appearance, as they advanced, seemed to declare the sincerity of their profession. As he drew near the city, the priests met him with a numerous attendance of unmarried people; the road was lined with a multitude, who expressed their satisfaction by their acclamations; and except that the people of Cholula objected against admitting their enemies, the Tlascalans, into their city, there was not a circumstance passed, but what tended to confirm the Spaniards in the opinion, that animosity had dictated the unfavourable description of the Cholulans, while they lived at Tlascala. This objection, indeed, was extremely reasonable; nevertheless, it would have disconcerted the general, had not those friendly Indians voluntarily removed all difficulties, by offering to take up their quarters without the gates, in a place whence they might quickly come to the defence of their friends, since they resolved, contrary to all advice and reason, to be duped by the appearances of traitors. The Spaniards made their entry amidst a prodigious concourse of the inhabitants, who rent the sky with their shouts, strewed the ground with flowers, and gave every possible demonstration of the most hearty reception; but in less than two days their treachery was discovered by a fortunate accident, which probably saved the Spaniards from utter destruction. Donna Marina, who attended Cortez in all his adventures since his arrival on the continent, had gained the friendship of an ancient Indian lady in the town, of considerable distinction. This lady bemoaned Marina's captivity and endeavoured to persuade her to forsake those abominable strangers, and take refuge in her house. This proposal created suspicion in the breast of Marina; and that she might dive to the bottom of the secret, she complained of the hard usage she met with, accepted of the friendly invitation, and perfectly gained the confidence of the old a old lady, who acquainted her that it was absolutely necessary she should escape from the Spanish quarters, for that the time appointed for the destruction of the strangers was near, and it would be a pity that so valuable a woman should perish with them. Moteczuma, she said, had prepared twenty thousand men, at a small distance; to make sure of the design, six thousand chosen men, of that body, had already been privately introduced in small parties into the city, and abundance of arms had been distributed among the inhabitants, quantities of stones carried up to the tops of the houses, and deep trenches cut across the streets, with sharp stakes fixed in the bottom, covered over at the top with earth on slight supporters, and railed in, in such a manner, that the cavalry should be directed to the traps. She said that Moteczuma had given directions, that all should be put to the sword, b except a few, which he ordered to be sent alive to Mexico, to gratify his curiosity, and sacrifice to his gods; and that he had presented the citizens with a gold drum, curiously embossed, to encourage them to the enterprize.

This intelligence was of the utmost importance, and Marina lost no time in communicating it to the general. Under pretence of carrying off her jewels and valuable effects, she went immediately to his quarters, laid the whole before him, and returned soon enough to have the old lady seized, without the smallest disturbance or suspicion that the conspiracy was detected. Upon further examination, and threats of punishment, the Indian lady not only confirmed the intelligence of Marina, but added a variety of other particulars, which would have set the truth of the fact beyond all dispute, had it not likewise been ascertained by a variety of other circumstances taken notice of by the Tlascalans and Zempoalans, who observed the inhabitants removing their families and effects in the night. Upon this Cortez resolved to take signal vengeance, but still to appear to the Mexican ambassadors in his quarters, as if he entertained no suspicion of Moteczuma. Besides, he fell upon a stratagem to render his revenge more complete, and at the same time less hazardous. Suppressing every sign of the discovery he had made, he sent for the caziques of the city, and published his march for next day, demanding the necessary provisions, Tamenes to carry his baggage and artillery, and two thousand men to accompany him, in imitation of the Tlascalans and Zempoalans. The armed men were sent with the greatest readiness, because the caziques imagined, that, by introducing those concealed enemies among the Spaniards, they d could have them to advantage when occasion offered; and Cortez accepted them, as he wanted to divide the enemy, and to have in his power a part of the traitors, whom he designed to chastise. Notice at the same time was sent to the Tlascalans, to hold themselves ready to act upon the first discharge of the fire-arms, and advance to the city, bringing with them all the people they found in arms. The ambassadors of Moteczuma were given to understand, that the conspiracy was discovered, though Cortez pretended to believe that the court had no share in it; and they were laid under a gentle constraint, to prevent their having any communication with the Cholulans, until he had completed his project of revenge. As to the two thousand Cholulans sent to attend him on his march, they were e divided into small parties, under pretence of being incorporated with the Spaniards, and then confined under a guard in different squares. Having thus made his dispositions, and issued out the proper instructions, Cortez mounted his horse, and ordering the city-caziques to be brought before him, told them, that now their base designs were discovered, and their punishment fixed. In order to justify himself, he ordered them to be confronted by Donna Marina, the old Indian lady, and certain priests, from whom he extorted a confession. He then fell upon the Indians kept in the squares, and put all to the sword, except a few, whose agility enabled them to escape by flight, and climbing over the walls. At the same time the Tlascalans entered, agreeable to the signal, and made dreadful slaughter, sacrificing all before them with fire and sword.

Nor were the Cholulans idle; perceiving they were now engaged in open hostilities, they f called in the remainder of the Mexican army, and joining in a large square, in which stood three or four large temples, they filled the towers and porches with soldiers, and threatened a resistance, which could only be surmounted by setting fire to the temples, and playing upon them with the artillery. This Cortez effected with admirable address, while the Tlascalans were attacking the rear of the enemy; by which means the Cholulans were entirely subdued, after several thousands of their people, and of the Mexican soldiers, perished. The same method was practised at the other temples, to which the people escaped as the strongest defences. Afterwards they ranged through the whole city, and drove out both inhabitants and Mexicans, until they gained entire possession, and blood ceased to flow for want of enemies. More than six thousand dead bodies were found in the streets and temples, the conspiracy was entirely defeated, the Cholulans were severely punished for their treacherous project, the valour of the Spaniards was fully established, and the Tlascalans not only pleased with the destruction of their enemies, but enriched with plunder, especially salt, to them the most inestimable booty, which they immediately sent home in great quan-

quantities. Foreign writers have accused the Spaniards of cruelty upon this occasion ; but it is sufficient only to their justification to reflect upon the provocation, and the necessity they were under of severely punishing so deep-laid a scheme of treachery. It is much to the honour of Cortez, that he no sooner surmounted danger, than he gave proofs of his clemency. The prisoners and Moteczuma's ambassadors being called before him, he represented to them the crimes of which the Cholulans had been guilty, as an apology for the rigour of the chastisement, and then assuring them that he had laid aside his resentment, he published a general pardon, released all the prisoners, and made it his request that the people should return to their former habitations and employments, as if nothing extraordinary had happened. He likewise obliged the Tlascalans to restore all the booty they had taken, excepting the salt, and gained so much confidence to his professions, that the Cholulans returned to the city with their families, opened their shops, performed their several occupations, were reunited to the Tlascalans, and again restored to the blessings of tranquillity under the protection of the Spaniards. It was one of the finest strokes of the policy of Cortez to engage the affections of the nations he had conquered, to efface their mutual animosities, and unite them all in his own alliance and interest. By his address he subdued, in a few days, the ancient enmity subsisting between the Tlascalans and Cholulans, and set on foot a treaty of alliance, which was confirmed by both parties ; the act of confederacy being celebrated in the presence of the magistrates of both cities, with the solemnities usually observed on those occasions by the Indians. This mediation was of the greatest consequence to him, as it opened the way for supplies from Tlascala, and also for a retreat, should circumstances turn out contrary to expectation.

Avoids a snare laid by the Mexicans.

HAVING thus completed his business at Cholula, he permitted several Zempoalans, who desired it, to return, sending by them letters to Juan Escalante, governor of Vera Cruz ; acquainting him with his progress, and advising him to strengthen the colony by new fortifications. He likewise sent a present to the cazique of Zempoala, recommending to his care the Spaniards left in his district ; and then, after residing in Cholula four or five days, was preparing to begin his march, when another embassy arrived from Moteczuma. That prince was desirous to efface all the suspicions which the Spaniards might entertain that he was concerned in the conspiracy of Cholula. Accordingly the ambassadors thanked Cortez for having chastised that treacherous people as they deserved ; setting forth the emperor's indignation at their perfidy, with protestations, every syllable of which the Spaniards knew to be false, though they prudently concealed their sentiments. The message was accompanied with a magnificent present, intended to lull Cortez into security, and draw him into another ambush prepared, of which he had notice in his march from the cazique of Guajozingo. The Mexicans had placed a great number of men in ambush on the further side of the mountain of Chalco, over which the Spaniards must pass, stopped up the royal road which leads to the province of that name, with great stones and trees, and opened and smoothed another road, which would lead Cortez into an impracticable pass, where his soldiers would be entangled in precipices, and put out of all condition to defend themselves against the intended attack. Cortez was incensed at the intelligence ; but he restrained his resentment, in order to be assured of the truth of the allegation. When he came to the place where the two roads divided, he asked Moteczuma's ambassadors, who were near his person, what those two roads meant ? and they answered, " that the best was levelled for the convenience of his troops, as the other stopt up was craggy and difficult." To which Cortez replied, without hesitation, " You are but little acquainted with my people : they will march in this way that you have blocked up, for no other reason than its difficulty ; for the Spaniards, whenever they have it in their option, always incline to that which is attended with most difficulty and danger ;" and saying this, he ordered the Indians to advance, and clear away all the obstacles which had been raised to his passage ; leaving the ambassadors in admiration at his sagacity, and fully persuaded that his resolution was guided by some divinity. This artful use Cortez made of his intelligence to keep up the reputation of his foresight, avoid the stratagem laid by Moteczuma, and yet seem as if he entertained no distrust of the good intentions of that monarch. As to the Mexicans, in ambuscade, they no sooner perceived the Spaniards taking the royal road, than not doubting but their design was discovered, they retreated with as much consternation, as if they had been actually defeated in battle ; by which means the Spaniards were left a free passage.

THESE accumulated disappointments broke the spirit of the haughty Moteczuma. He fluctuated between contending opinions and passions, and at length gave himself up to the most cruel devotion, sacrificing hecatomes of wretched human beings at the altars of his gods, to appease their supposed resentment. The contradictory oracles uttered by his idols entirely disheartened his imagination, some admonishing him to open his gates to the strangers, that he might thereby secure them all for a sacrifice ; while others advised to keep them

- a them at a distance, and endeavour to destroy them without endangering his person. The last disappointment drove him almost to madness, and silenced his oracles and counsellors, who now left him to be directed by the magicians and forcerers; a set of men in the highest reputation in Mexico. The society of necromancers were ordered to take the field, and by their enchantments either to destroy the Spaniards, or at least so to confound their counsels and stupify their intellects, so as they might become an easy conquest. If they succeeded in this, they were to be rewarded beyond expectation; but if they failed, they should be treated as impostors, and punished with the utmost severity. The magicians, either confident of their own powers, or afraid to discover the cheat with which they had so long deluded the public, assembled in numerous companies, and set out against the Spaniards.
- b They were in the army which fled from Chalco; and finding all their circles and arts vain, they returned to Moteczuma, with a dreadful story of the devil's having appeared to them with assurances that nothing could resist the Spaniards, for the gods had deserted the Mexicans, and taken part with the strangers. Upon hearing which Moteczuma exclaimed, "What can we do if our gods forsake us? Let the strangers come, and the heavens fall upon us. To hide our heads, or turn our backs on misfortune, would be dishonourable. I only lament the old men, women, and children, who cannot defend themselves:" a reflection which shewed the natural elevation of his soul, although power had rendered him a prey to his passions. From this time the emperor and the whole court began to make preparations for entertaining the Spaniards, believing that their prophecies were now fulfilled, and that the strangers were actually the orientalists mentioned in their traditions, who were to conquer the country with the assistance of the gods; an opinion that was corroborated by the astonishing actions of the Spaniards, and the marvellous signs and prodigies which had lately appeared in the heavens. Hence it was that another embassy, more splendid than any of the preceding, was dispatched to Cortez, headed by prince Caminatzin, nephew to Moteczuma, and lord of Tezeuco.

At this time Cortez had descended without impediment from the mountain of Chalco, and advanced through a beautiful country, filled with groves and gardens, that spoke the bounty of nature, and the force of culture, as far as Amemeca, where he halted. Here he received the compliments of the adjacent caziques, who appeared exceedingly reserved before the Mexican ambassadors, but in private declared freely their detestation of the royal tyrant, whom they taxed with cruelty and oppression; adding with tears, that they were forced to surrender their women as a tribute to his lust, and that of his ministers, who chose and rejected them at pleasure: nor were the mother's arms a security to their daughters, or the nuptial bed any protection to a wife. The army was encamped at Amemeca when the prince of Caminatzin arrived, attended by four of the first grandees of Mexico, and carried in a fine chair, covered with plumage of the most beautiful colours finely disposed, and supported by the shoulders of some officers of his family. On his alighting, troops of Indians ran before to clear and sweep the way, and Cortez went to receive him to the door of his apartment. When the proper compliments had passed, the prince took his seat with an easy majestic air, and began with welcoming Cortez, and the Spanish captains, to the Mexican dominions: he acquainted them with the amicable disposition with which Moteczuma expected their visit, and how much he desired to establish a firm and lasting friendship with the powerful eastern prince, whom they acknowledged as their master, and whose power Moteczuma was obliged to confess, for certain reasons which they should learn from his own lips. He concluded with compliments and apologies for the difficulties which Cortez must encounter in his way to Mexico, owing to the scarcity of provisions, and the late barrenness, which had left the people destitute; but in such a manner as if he would dissuade the Spaniards from the journey, at the same time that he seemed to invite them. Cortez easily penetrated into the design of this discourse, and answered it as he had always done upon similar occasions, by representing the pleasure which the Spaniards had in surmounting difficulties, the importance of his own embassy, and how much it would tend to the mutual advantage of the monarchs their sovereigns, that he should be admitted to a personal interview, which he now accepted from Moteczuma, by the report of his ambassador and kinsman, with the most profound acknowledgments.

Receives an embassy from Moteczuma,

Such an answer convinced the prince that all attempts to divert his intention would be to no purpose; he therefore waved the subject, and, after receiving some presents from Cortez, accompanied the army to Tezeuco, the capital of his dominions, and then repaired to Mexico to report the issue of his embassy. The Spaniards were highly delighted and astonished at the sight of this beautiful city, the second in Mexico for extent, and the first for antiquity. The front of all the buildings was extended on the borders of a spacious lake, in a delightful situation, where the great causeway of Mexico began: over which Cortez pursued his march, without stopping at Tezeuco, his design being to reach Iztoapalapa, from whence he could march with ease next day to Mexico. At this place the pavement was twenty feet in breadth, built with large stones cemented with lime, and adorned with some works that answered the double purpose of strength and ornament. The cazique of Quitlavaca came out with a great retinue to meet Cortez, desiring he would honour his town with a visit, which he did not care to refuse, notwithstanding he had some suspicion of treachery, and the place lay out of his way in pursuing the direct road to the capital of the empire. To Quitlavaca the Spaniards gave the name Venezuela, or Little Venice, because like that famous city it rose out of the waters; and here Cortez proposed making some stay, both that he might not disoblige the cazique, and that he might have an opportunity of observing the situation of the lake, cities, and causeways, with every thing which could either forward or obstruct his march, should the Mexicans resolve to cut down the bridges. Quitlavaca commands a prospect of the greater part of the lake of Mexico, than which nothing can be more beautifully diversified with cities, towns, paved ways, and vessels in perpetual motion. Trees and gardens seemed to float upon the water, and to grow, as in their proper element; a sight which at the same time raised the astonishment of Cortez, and roused his ambition. The army was abundantly supplied with provision, and well accommodated with quarters; the people entertained the Spaniards with cheerfulness, and every action was performed with that politeness, which shewed that they partook of the manners of a court, and improved by their vicinity to the capital. It was a peculiar encouragement to Cortez, that the caziques of the whole country through which he passed, expressed the same sentiments with respect to Moteczuma: they detested his tyranny, but they dreaded his power; and although they shewed their inclination to break their fetters, and receive the Spaniards as persons destined for their deliverance, yet so habituated were they to slavery, and so often had they bled under the scourge of his cruelty, that they could scarce elevate their souls to the pleasing prospect of liberty. Possibly they imagined, from a certain foreboding which the mind sometimes has of future calamities, that the strangers would deliver them from the yoke of Moteczuma, only to subject them to a still more rigorous bondage.

As Cortez had altered his rout to oblige the cazique of Quitlavaca, he was under the necessity of again proceeding to Iztoapalapa in his way to Mexico. Forming his army as well as the causeway would allow, eight men a-breast, he began his march at the head of four hundred and fifty Spaniards (B), and above six thousand Indian allies, and without any remarkable adventure reached Iztoapalapa before the evening. The manner of building, the elegance of architecture, richness of furniture, number of houses, and populousness of the place, surprised the Spaniards. It contained above ten thousand habitations, many of which were superb edifices; either rising out of the waters, or fronting the lake. The cazique of this and some other towns came out with numerous retinues, and presents of fruit and provisions, to meet Cortez, and accompanied him in his entry amidst such loud acclamations as evinced the sincere welcome of the inhabitants. The Spaniards were lodged in the palace, and the Indian auxiliaries in courts and squares, covered over with cotton cloths, where they could securely and commodiously pass over the night. In the palace were magnificent apartments, adorned with paintings on cotton of great ingenuity, and roofed with cedar prettily covered. The town was watered with a number of fountains, conveyed by a variety of aqueducts from the neighbouring mountains, and adorned with several pleasant, large, well cultivated gardens. The cazique's garden, in particular, into which he conducted the Spaniards, would have reflected honour upon the taste of a people who had made greater progress in the polite arts.

Mexico, the capital of the empire.

HAVING sufficiently amused himself with the beauties of Iztoapalapa, and informed himself of the strength of the place, and disposition of the inhabitants, Cortez set out early next morning for Mexico, in order that, after paying his compliments to Moteczuma, he might have leisure to reconnoitre the city, and fortify his quarters. About half way he was met by four thousand persons of distinction, sent to receive him, and conduct the strangers to the capital. On drawing near the city, they met a stone fortification secured by a tower on each side, which took up the whole breadth of the causeway, and obliged the troops to make a circuit to gates which opened in another part of the causeway, terminated by a draw-bridge, which defended the entrance of the city with a second fortification. The Mexican nobility passed over the bridge, and then falling back to each side, made a lane for the Spaniards, from whence they discovered a large street with uniform buildings, and windows and battlements crowded with spectators. Soon after appeared the first troop

(B) Herrera alleges that he had but three hundred Spaniards when he left Tlascala, and imagining some were left behind, that he dispatched Alvarado to bring them together (1); but we have adhered to the relation of De Solis, which appears to be more consistent with the original number of the troops, the garrison left at Vera Cruz, and the killed, or dead, by accident and disease.

a of the royal procession, consisting of about 200 noblemen richly dressed in the same fashion, adorned with large plumes similar in colour. They filed to each side, and discovered thro' the avenue they made a more numerous and brilliant company, in the midst of which was Moteczuma, carried on the shoulders of his favourites, in a chair of burnished gold, says De Solis, tho' Herrera omits the chair, and relates that he came under a rich canopy of green feathers and gold, disposed in the most beautiful proportions. This canopy, which formed an elegant kind of net-work, was supported by four lords of the first distinction, and preceded by three great officers with golden rods in their hands, which they waved as a signal of the emperor's approach, that all might prostrate themselves, without presuming to lift up their eyes, which was deemed a kind of sacrilege. When Moteczuma alighted from his chair, Cortez dismounted and approached him, while Indians were employed in laying carpets on the intermediate way, to prevent the royal feet from touching the ground. His form was solemn and majestic, being supported by two nephews barefooted, in token of respect and humiliation. Moteczuma's apparel was a fine cotton mantle, adorned with jewels in such abundance, that it appeared rather an incumbrance than an ornament. It was laid carelessly on his shoulders, and swept the ground behind. On his head he wore a light gold crown, resembling a mitre, and his feet were cased in shoes of beaten gold, in form not unlike the Roman sandals. His presence was majestic, his stature middling, his age about forty, his constitution rather delicate than robust, his complexion fair for the climate, his nose aquiline, his eyes lively and piercing, and his features regular and handsome. He condescended to salute Cortez with a respect which he had never before shewn, bending his body so low that he touched the ground with his hand, while the general made the most profound reverence in the manner of his country; which, however, was thought extremely impolite by the imperial attendants: Cortez threw round his neck, while they were making their compliments, a chain of cut glass, in imitation of diamonds, which he had reserved as a present for the first audience; and the princes who supported Moteczuma would have prevented him, because it was not lawful to approach so near the sovereign; but Moteczuma reprimanded them, and was so pleased with the chain, that he placed it among his jewels of inestimable value. The manner in which he returned it was sufficient proof of the price he put upon it; for he ordered a collar made of red shells to be brought, set together with the greatest art, and adorned with eight crabs of beaten gold, which exactly imitated nature. This was reckoned among the most valuable of the royal jewels; and the emperor, with his own hands, suspended it round the general's neck, to the great admiration of all the Indians, who now began really to persuade themselves that this must be some celestial being, to whom the emperor paid such veneration. This speech made by Cortez was concise and energetic; the answer returned by Moteczuma was also short, discreet, and full of dignity; after which he ordered the Spaniards to be conducted to their quarters, and returned to his chair and palace with the same ceremonies as we have described. In this manner did Cortez surmount the greatest difficulties, arriving safely in the capital of Mexico, after having defeated the Tabascans, eluded all the stratagems of Moteczuma, conquered the warlike republic of Tlascala, engaged that state in a perpetual alliance, punished the dangerous conspiracy of Cholula, escaped the snares laid for him in the mountain of Chalco, appeased the mutinies of his own people, and gained the respect of not only the tributary princes, and lords of Mexico, but of the haughty Moteczuma himself, who was forced to treat him upon a footing of equality, and with a reverence which he refused to the gods themselves.

f Containing an account of Moteczuma's pomp, wealth, government, power, and at last of his imprisonment by Cortez, with divers other particulars, which occurred in the course of his confinement.

g CORTEZ had now reached the capital, where himself and troops were treated with a respect that exceeded the most sanguine expectation; but with regard to the great object of this expedition, namely, the subjection of this vast empire to the crown of Spain, it was in appearance as remote as ever. Had Moteczuma opposed his advances by open hostilities, and been defeated, the fate of Mexico would have immediately been determined; but on the friendly footing he was admitted to the presence of that prince, and into the heart of the kingdom, it was difficult to execute his projects without the greatest perfidy and violation of the sacred rights of hospitality. Time, however, rendered easy what appeared beyond the reach of human genius; and lucky circumstances were so judiciously improved, that although we cannot altogether vindicate the conduct of the Spaniards in that point of justice and integrity, they will appear less culpable than is supposed by many writers.

A. D. 1519.

It was on the 8th day of November that Cortez made his public entry into Mexico. He was lodged with all his forces in one of the royal palaces, a superb edifice, fortified with strong walls, and flanked with high towers. The accommodations were good; some of the apartments designed for the superior officers were hung with ingenious cotton paintings, and furnished with handsome wooden chairs, carved out of one block of timber, and beds shaped like pavilions, with bottoms of palm matts, and bolsters of the same materials; and with the same simplicity lived the greatest princes of this opulent country. Cortez immediately distributed guards, placed his artillery, and took equal care to make the lodgings of his soldiers commodious, and their quarters secure. A splendid banquet had been prepared, by order of the emperor, in the principal apartments of the Spanish quarters, and great abundance of less delicate provision for the soldiers. After dinner Moteczuma honoured the general with a visit, and ordering the attendants to retire, entered upon a laboured, but seemingly familiar, harangue, in which he gave him to understand, that he was sensible the Spaniards were mortals like the Indians, and the thunder which they grasped nothing more than some secret in science. “Your ears have been abused, said he, as well as mine. You have been told that I am immortal, that my power and person are equal to those of the gods, that fortune rains down her favours upon me, that the walls and coverings of my palaces are all of gold, and that the earth bends beneath the weight of my treasures. You have also been told that I am cruel, tyrannical, oppressive, proud, unjust, and a stranger to mercy. Both the one and the other are equally false. This arm (uncovering a scar) will shew that I am mortal. My riches, indeed, are great, but they have been magnified by fame and flattery; from these instances you may judge that my bad qualities have been likewise aggravated. Suspend, therefore, your judgment until you know whether that which they call cruelty and oppression be not necessary chastisement. With respect to yourself, some report, that you are wicked, malicious, revengeful, covetous, proud, and the slave of your passions; but I see that you are of the same form and composition as the rest of mankind; though you are distinguished from us by some accidents arising from different countries. You are courteous and affable, you are brave and religious, your resentments are founded upon reason; you bear hardships like true soldiers; the liberality which I myself have experienced evinces that you are not sordid. In a word, you are men like ourselves, but with superior qualities; and as to the wild beasts you command, which report hath so magnified, they are only a kind of deer, tractable and docile, with such an imperfect degree of knowledge as may be attained by brutes. We must, therefore, forget, on both sides, all past misinformations, and thank our eyes for undeceiving our understanding. We are not ignorant that the great prince whom you obey, is descended from our ancient Quezalcoal, lord of the seven caves of the Navatlaques, and lawful king of those seven nations, which gave beginning to the Mexican empire. By ancient tradition, which we regard as infallible, we know that he departed from these countries to subdue regions in the East, leaving a promise that in time his descendants should return to model our laws, and reform our government. The marks which you carry about agree with our tradition and prophecies, and the prince of the East, who sends you, manifests in your exploits the greatness of so illustrious a progenitor: we have, therefore, determined that all things shall be done to his honour; of which I now advertise you, that you may truly declare whatever you have to propose, and ascribe to so noble a cause this excess of my goodness.”

Moteczuma's
speech to Cortez.

Cortez's answer.

CORTEZ perceived the drift of this speech, and answered it with equal address. He endeavoured to maintain Moteczuma's opinion of the extraordinary valour of the Spaniards, without departing from truth. He acknowledged that the fire-arms which the Indians mistook for lightning and thunder, were the invention of human genius; but he left Moteczuma from this very circumstance to judge of the superiority of the Spaniards in point of contrivance and understanding. He told him that the horses were not deer as he imagined, but animals of a more generous nature, martial, furious, and ambitious of emulating the glory of their masters. He made a politic use of the absurd tradition so firmly believed by the emperor, and the original which the Indians bestowed on the Catholic king, believing that this would give greater weight to his embassy; he touched upon the impious religion of the Mexicans, and gave a short sketch of the principal tenets of the Christian faith; telling Moteczuma, that to reform the abuses of the most absurd idolatry, was the main object of his commission from the king. But Moteczuma patiently heard all his arguments without the least appearance of conviction; and when the general had done, rose up from his seat, addressing himself to Cortez in the following words. “I accept, with due acknowledgment, the friendship you propose from the descendant of the great Quezalcoal; but all gods are good: yours may be so in your country; mine are so in mine. Let each enjoy their attributes undisturbed: repose yourselves now, looking towards the Spaniards in general; you are in your own house, where you shall be served a "with all the regard due to your valour, and to the great prince your master." After which he gave presents of gold, pieces of cloth, and several fine plumes, to Cortez, distributing also some jewels of lesser value among the other Spaniards, and then withdrew to his own palace.
“with

Cortez visits Motezuma in his palace.

CORTEZ desired leave to return this visit next day, and his request was readily granted. He went attended by his captains, and six or seven favourite soldiers, and among the rest Diaz del Castillo, the earliest historian of this conquest, who had already begun to collect materials for his work. The streets were crowded with people, and the Spaniards, amidst the acclamations, heard the word Teule, or divinity, frequently repeated to their great satisfaction, because it shewed in what estimation they were held by those simple Indians.
 b The appearance of the royal palace sufficiently demonstrated the great magnificence of the sovereigns of Mexico. The pile was of such extent that thirty gates opened to as many different streets; and the front, which occupied the whole side of a spacious parade, was built of finely polished jasper of different colours. Over the great gate was the imperial arms pompously blazoned. Here Cortez was received by the officers of the court with great ceremony, and after being conducted through three extensive squares, at last arrived at Motezuma's apartments, where there was equal reason to admire the grandeur of the rooms, and the richness of the furniture. The floors were covered with a variety of different mats of beautiful workmanship and texture, the walls with cotton hangings finely painted, and interwoven with the skins of rabbits, and the most interior apartment was adorned with c a kind of tapestry, made of the plumage of birds, formed into pictures with most elegant shades, and disposed in the most pleasing order of colours. As to the roofs, they were all of cedar and other sweet scented woods, with different foliages and relievos, that discovered taste and genius in the artists; besides, the manner in which the ceilings were supported with rails, or beams, was exceedingly curious, this being entirely effected by force, opposition, and the pressure of the lateral on the central parts, which displayed a mechanical invention in the architects, superior to what might have been expected from so rude and ignorant a people as the Mexicans, whose knowledge was entirely the result of genius and reflection, as they had no communication with any other nation so civilized as themselves. Every thing was new and extraordinary to the Spaniards, and every thing contributed to increase their respect for the monarch. The grandeur of the palace, the ceremonies of the crowds of attendants, their quality, and the profound silence observed by so numerous a train, all impressed the imagination with the most exalted idea of the power of Motezuma, and the potency of the Mexican empire.

THAT prince was standing in the midst of all these ensigns of his authority, when, observing Cortez, he advanced to meet him, laid his arms familiarly on his shoulders, and then addressed the rest of the Spaniards with a gracious nod and smile. The visit was long, and the conversation such as might be supposed to pass among friends upon a perfect equality. Motezuma divested himself of all the pomp of majesty, without losing sight of his dignity, and condescended to question Cortez about the nature, politics, and curiosities of e the eastern countries. All his interrogations evinced strong sense, and a manly extensive understanding. He then touched upon the obligations of the Mexicans to the descendants of their first monarch, and expressed his particular satisfaction that the prophecies concerning the reformation to be made by strangers, were completed in his time; a compliment less fraught with truth, than the politeness of a court. Cortez artfully drew on the conversation to the topic of religion: but all his arguments on this head proved fruitless; except with respect to the barbarous custom of decking the royal table with dishes made of human flesh, which Motezuma ordered henceforward to be refused. But as to the point of human sacrifices, he said he could see no impiety in offering to his gods these prisoners of war already condemned to die; nor did he at all approve of that maxim laid down in sacred f writ, to extend neighbourly affection to an enemy. Though he seemed to approve of the benevolence and humanity of the Christian religion in certain particulars; he, notwithstanding, constantly returned to his old assertion, "That his gods were good in Mexico, as well as the Christian gods in the east." The Spanish writers speak as if policy alone had prevented Motezuma from embracing the Catholic doctrines, and represent Cortez as an able orator and divine. He looked upon the basis of royal authority to be laid on the absurd superstition of the people, and their reverence for the priests, with whom it would be dangerous to have any altercation upon a topic in which their interest, influence, and characters, were so deeply concerned. He dreaded their displeasure, and the contempt of his vassals, in case he should relax in his zeal for the worship of his gods, out of complaisance to the strangers. The Spaniards corroborated this opinion by an incident which fell g out about this time.

MOTEZUMA took it into his head one day to display the magnificence of his temples to the Spaniards, and accordingly asked Cortez to attend him, with some of his principal officers, officers, and favourite soldiers. When they came to the entrance, Moteczuma ordered them to halt, and advanced himself to know of the priests if it was lawful to bring into the presence of their gods men who refused to worship them? This question was answered in the affirmative, provided they would behave with proper respect. Immediately all the gates of this superb edifice were set open, and Moteczuma took upon himself the office of explaining the uses of all the different vessels, instruments, and utensils, which he performed with such ridiculous ceremony and reverence, that the Spaniards could not refrain from laughter. Of this Moteczuma seemed to take no particular notice, only looking upon the Spaniards as desiring to restrain their mirth, until Cortez, transported with inexpressible zeal, addressed himself to him in the following terms. "Permit me, Sir, to fix the cross of Christ before these images of the devil, and you shall see whether they deserve adoration or contempt." This proposal enraged the priests, and reduced Moteczuma to great perplexity, between his reverence for religion, his dread of the priesthood, and his regard to the Spaniards, and the rights of hospitality. "You might, at least, said he, have shewed this place the respect due to my person;" a reproof which equally shewed his good sense and politeness, though the Spanish writers ascribe it to the terror with which the strangers had inspired him. It would appear however from their own confession, that Cortez regarded it in another light; for he took an immediate resolution not to converse any more on the subject of religion, and accordingly laid aside his zeal to make converts.

Description of the city of Mexico.

THAT the reader may have a stronger idea of the difficulties which Cortez had to surmount, in course of this extraordinary adventure of the conquest of Mexico, it may be proper that we should exhibit a short description of the capital of this vast empire, the splendor of the court, the immense revenues of the monarch, and other particulars, equally conducive to gratify curiosity, and render the subsequent narrative more entertaining and intelligible. This great city, anciently known by the name of Tenuch-chitlam, was situated in an extensive plain, surrounded by high rocks and mountains, from which rolled down streams into the valley, that formed themselves into different lakes, and particularly into two of a larger size, where the valley happened to be deepest. Between these two great lakes were sluices, by which the defect of water in the one was supplied from the redundancy in the other; and it is reported, that the waters had different qualities, the uppermost being clear and sweet, abounding with fish; and the lower, salt and sterile, from a nitrous quality in the soil at the bottom. It is certain that salt was made in the latter, though it could possibly have no communication with the sea, and was frequently filled with the waters let down from the former. All the lakes put together contained a space of near thirty leagues in circumference, and were adorned with about fifty different cities and towns, which afforded a most delightful and romantic prospect. In the middle of the salt water lake stood the city of Mexico, which, at the time we are speaking of, is said to have contained not less than sixty thousand families. It was joined to the land by dykes and large causeways, erected at a prodigious expence, giving an air of grandeur, and great convenience, to this capital. That over which the Spaniards marched pointed to the South, and was two leagues in length; another extended to the northward above a league; and a third led to the West, nearly of the same length. All the streets were broad, and in a direct line; but what rendered them very peculiar was, that some were entirely covered with water, so as to admit the passage of small vessels and canoes with which they were perpetually crowded. Bridges were likewise laid over, for the greater dispatch of business, and ease of carriage. In general, the streets consisted of earthen banks, faced with stones, raised with prodigious labour in the midst of the waters, and thus were composed of earth and water, with a foot-road on each side; the whole forming the most agreeable appearance that imagination can conceive. Nothing could be better contrived for all the purposes of commerce or pleasure; and Mexico resembled in miniature, what we are told of the vast empire of China, in the variety of land and water, the canals filled with boats, the multitude of inhabitants, the perpetual bustle of the people, and that constant motion in which every object was beheld.

Great fair of Mexico.

THE city was divided between the vulgar, and the court and nobility, the former possessing the district called Tlatelulco, where the buildings were lower, meaner, and crowded. The other district was larger, and occupied by the nobility, filled with the buildings of the court, and other public edifices, all faced with stone, and of good architecture. Both districts were laid out in parades, where an infinity of merchandize was daily exposed. At certain days of the year, fairs were held in Tlatelulco, to which all the merchants and traders in the empire flocked. It was held in a square of vast dimensions, one of the largest in the world, says Herrera, yet was it filled with tents pitched so close, that there was scarce room left for the buyers to pass each other; notwithstanding which, all business was carried on with the utmost regularity, and nothing like confusion appeared. Here might be seen jewellers and goldsmiths, who sold toys of the most curious workmanship. Here

- a were rows of painters, who exhibited the figures of animals, and landscapes composed of feathers, so nicely placed, as exactly to imitate nature. To this fair were brought all the different kinds of cotton manufactures made in the empire, whether plain or painted, with such abundance of other commodities, as it would be too tedious and unnecessary to enumerate; sufficient it is, that the Mexican artists here constantly exhibited the most extraordinary proofs of their ingenuity and patience. Traffic was carried on chiefly by an exchange of commodities, and goods of small price were bought chiefly with maize or cocoa. The Mexicans had no standards of weight; but they had measures for space and quantity, and a kind of number by which they adjusted the price of commodities by the taxes they paid, and the labour employed: but as we shall have occasion to treat afterwards of
- b the manners and customs of those people, we shall omit, in this place, every thing not relative to the state of the kingdom at the time it was visited by Cortez. For the greater dispatch of business, and preservation of order, a board of justice was appointed, not only to decide all disputes which might arise among the merchants who frequented this fair, but likewise to inspect that all the commodities exposed for sale, were marketable. Inferior officers were continually employed in going about to prevent frauds in contracts, suppress tumults, and preserve tranquility: and such was the dread in which these magistrates were held, that seldom any irregularity or disturbance ever happened. It was not therefore, without reason, that the Spaniards beheld with astonishment the opulence and good government of this empire, and the industry, address, and genius of the inhabitants, whom
- c they nevertheless termed barbarians.

Nothing added more to the beauty and magnificence of the city of Mexico, than the great number of stately temples with which it was adorned. The great temple, in particular, dedicated to the god Vitzliputzli, was stupendous. The part of the building that first presented itself was a square, the wall of which was of hewn stone, wrought on the outside with serpents intertwined, that gave a very horrible aspect to the portico. At a little distance from this was a place of worship still more dreadful, as it was adorned with the heads of men who had been sacrificed to the gods, an exact account of whom was regularly kept by the priests. Every side of the great square had a gate, over which were four statues of stone, which seemed to point the way back to those who came to public worship

d in an improper disposition. Round the walls were the habitations of the priests, who were extremely numerous; and yet there remained an area large enough to contain ten thousand dancers upon public festivals. In the center of this square, stood a tower, which exalted its head above all the buildings in the city, terminated in a half pyramid of such dimensions, that the flat upon the top was forty feet square, after it had risen into the air a hundred and twenty stone-steps of a beautiful staircase. The pavement was of jasper, a kind of serpentine balustrade enclosed it, and both sides were covered with a stone resembling jet, joined with red and white cement, that produced a pretty effect. Near the ending of the staircase were two marble statues, which supported two candlesticks of enormous size, and admirably well expressed the weight of the burden, by the straining of their arms.

e A little further was the stone on which was extended the wretched human victim to be sacrificed to the gods, and embowelled; and beyond this stood a chapel of excellent workmanship and materials, covered with a roof of precious wood. Here was placed the idol, behind a curtain, on the high altar. It had some resemblance to a human figure, of a terrible aspect, was seated on a kind of throne, sustained by a blue globe, representing the heavens, from the sides whereof came forth rods, headed like snakes, which the priests placed on their shoulders, when they exposed the idol to view. The idol held in the right hand a twining serpent, which answered the purpose of a staff, and in the left four arrows, which were worshipped as a celestial present. Opposite to this was another chapel of the same size and figure, the habitation of an idol called the partner and brother of the former,

f and dividing with him the spoils of war. The ornaments of both chapels were inestimable; all the walls were hung, and the altars covered with jewels and precious stones, placed in fity of the principal riches of that district to which it belonged; hence it contained two thousand idols. There was hardly a street without its tutelary deity, nor any calamity, incident to nature, without its altar, to which man had recourse for a remedy. Only one good effect resulted from the superstition of the people, namely, the beauty which all these temples, reared by ignorance, added to the city.

BESIDES the royal palaces and temples, there were other fine buildings that highly contributed to the decoration of Mexico; these were the pleasure-houses of Moteczuma. One of them, a most magnificent structure, with vast galleries, supported by pillars of jasper, was converted into an aviary. Here were assembled all the birds which New Spain produced of value, either on account of their voices or plumage. The number of these birds were so great, that above three hundred persons were constantly employed in feeding and cleaning cleaning them. From their feathers were made the most beautiful paintings in Moteczuma's collection. a

At some distance from hence, Moteczuma had another house of such extent, that it contained an apartment capable of holding his whole court. There huntsmen resided, and with them an infinity of birds of prey, kept in cages, among which were the king's hawks, no way inferior to the European in seizing on their prey, and returning to the lure. The Spanish writers have described the royal eagle of a monstrous size, and voraciousness scarce credible. In another square of the same house were kept the emperor's wild beasts, lions, tygers, bears, and among others the Mexican bull, not unlike the wild bull of Bohemia, or buffalo, called urus by Latin writers. This animal is large, strong, fierce, and majestic in his appearance, with a large hunch or excrescence on its back, and the neck cloathed with long hair like a lion. It was customary with the Mexicans, from the remotest antiquity, to estimate the grandeur of a prince by the number of wild beasts in his possession, whence we may judge of the number maintained by Moteczuma, who was absolutely the greatest prince, in all respects, that ever swayed the Mexican sceptre. b

THE most extraordinary circumstance of Moteczuma's humour appeared in the collection he made of the deformities and monsters of human nature. Here were dwarfs, giants, or men of extraordinary stature, hump-backed, crooked men, persons who had any unaccountable mark in their features, or defects in their eyes, and others whose minds were as deformed as their bodies. This institution might have been serviceable and humane, had the emperor confined his care to wretched objects incapable of labour; but a mark or blemish of any kind that was uncommon, was sufficient to entitle the person to the benefit of this foundation: and parents were frequently known to disfigure their children, that they might be maintained at the king's expence. c

Arsenal or armoury.

BUT of all the public buildings belonging to this great prince, none was more curious, or worthy of observation, than the armoury. It was divided into two departments; the one, where the arms were made; and the other, where they were arranged in the most beautiful manner, after they were entirely finished. The several artists had certain shops assigned them, agreeable to their employments. In one place they prepared the wood for the arrows, in another they shaped and formed it; in a third bows were made, and in a fourth swords or darts. All kinds of arms, whether offensive or defensive, were made by particular workmen, in distinct shops, under the direction of superintendants, who kept an exact account of the quantity and kinds of arms. From the magazine were distributed arms to the troops as occasion required, and the empty spaces were filled up by new weapons of every denomination. To all these houses were annexed extensive gardens, laid out with great taste and magnificence; and in each of these was a large piece of ground, wholly occupied by medicinal plants, and herbs, for all kinds of wounds, pains, and infirmities, in the knowledge of which consisted the whole skill of the Mexican physicians. It would be endless to describe all the public buildings of this great city, and institutions of the magnificent Moteczuma: but there is one which we must not omit, on account of its whimsical nature. This was called the house of sorrow, to which the emperor retired upon any public or private misfortune, that required external signs of grief and mourning. There was a horror in the very appearance of the building: the walls, roofs, and ornaments, were all black; and light was admitted only through narrow chinks, just sufficient to discover the gloominess of the place. Here Moteczuma used to spend his time in solitude during the period of mourning. The Mexicans alledged that he conversed with the gods; and the Spanish writers, no less credulous and superstitious, suspect that all his intercourse must have been with the devil, who delights in darkness. d

IN the country Moteczuma likewise had a great number of seats, where he sometimes partook of field diversions, and chiefly of hunting, in which he extremely delighted. He frequently went with the nobility to a large and pleasant park, fenced round with a fine canal, where they brought the game of the neighbouring mountains, among which generally came several lions and tygers, which the Mexican hunters fought with great courage and address. Moteczuma would sometimes engage himself in this diversion, and let fly a dart or a javelin; but this he always did with reserve, not for want of courage, but because he was of opinion, that only the dangers of war became the grandeur of a monarch. e

Grandeur of Moteczuma's private æconomy.

AGREEABLE to the external magnificence that appeared round the court of Moteczuma, was his private æconomy, where all was splendid, ceremonious, and great. When this prince ascended the throne, he augmented the number, quality, and brilliancy of his court, into which none were admitted but nobility of the first distinction. He excluded the common people, against the advice of his council, because it was a maxim with him, that princes ought to govern at a distance those who either had no sense of an obligation, or were unable to express their gratitude by proper returns. The nobility were even employed to protect the royal person, Moteczuma's body-guards being composed of two hundred young gentlemen of the first quality in the empire, the out-ports only round the palace being defended by the common soldiers. There was indeed a principle of policy, as well f a as pride, in this institution; for it inured the nobility to the use of arms, to fatigue, and business, and also kept them in dependence on the sovereign. With respect to the emperor's women, they were without number; though two only bore the title of queens, who were lodged in separate apartments, and attended with the utmost magnificence. Every woman of extraordinary beauty in the empire was sent to court, a sacrifice to Moteczuma's lust; many of them being forced from their parents or husbands, by the ministers and farmers of the revenue, who regarded the maintenance of the monarch as a point of importance to the grandeur of the state. When these mistresses were discarded by the favoured prince, they generally found husbands among the nobility, on account of their wealth or beauty; for they never failed to accumulate large sums while they basked in the royal favour: nor did their reputation at all suffer by the favours granted to Moteczuma; on the contrary, it was deemed an honour to have been thought worthy of his bed. While the concubines remained at court, they lived in the utmost decorum, their conduct being subject to the inspection of certain grave matrons, who made their report to the emperor: jealousy was a reigning passion in the breast of Moteczuma, which poisoned all his other enjoyments.

WHEN he gave audience, nothing could be more solemn, pompous, grave, and austere, than Moteczuma's carriage: for as to the reception given to Cortez, it was so extraordinary as to excite the astonishment of the whole court. He ate alone, and frequently in public, but always with the state and magnificence of a prince. His table was generally covered with two hundred dishes of the most exquisite in their kinds that the empire could afford. Before he sat down, he ran his eyes over the whole, selected a few the most agreeable to his palate, and ordered the rest to be distributed among the nobility in waiting. Nor was all this daily profusion any more than a small part of the expences of his household; for he kept tables sumptuously served for all the officers and servants of the court, and even for those who resorted thither, either upon business or pleasure. Every thing was sent up to the emperor's own table in gold, curious shells, or some other valuable materials, enriched with jewels; and the attendants were constantly supplying him with different sorts of liquors, some finely perfumed, some mixed with salutiferous herbs, and many impregnated with certain medicines that were regarded as restoratives or provocatives. After dinner he drank chocolate, and smoked tobacco perfumed with liquid amber. During meals a band of music attended, which no sooner ceased than the emperor suffered himself to be entertained with the jokers, or the tricks and frolics of a number of buffoons and dwarfs, kept for that purpose about his person. He was fond of these wretches, he said, only because he could discover truth under their pleasantry; whereas there was no penetrating through the mask of hypocrisy wore by thorough-paced courtiers. Amidst the instrumental music were singers, who, in a kind of recitative and musical cadence, chanted the exploits of their ancestors, and the memorable actions of their kings, which were transmitted to posterity, teaching the rising generation to prevent the achievements of the nation from sinking into oblivion, by those elucidations of the historical pictures, and the hieroglyphical Mexican annals. Dances were frequently performed before the emperor, and he sometimes condescended to join in the diversion, for the greater entertainment of the Spaniards. Among these dances the most extraordinary was a kind of masquerade, called milotes, composed of a multitude, in which all degrees mixed indiscriminately in a sort of gorgeous disguise. The emperor honoured it sometimes with his presence; and as all drank freely, the diversion ended in a general intoxication, or some more extravagant frolic. In a word, every day produced some new diversion or public exhibition, supported at the emperor's expence, probably to engage the attention of the people from too curious a scrutiny into his conduct, or to ballance their loss of liberty by a perpetual round of dissipation.

f It will readily be imagined, that the royal treasures must have been immense, to maintain so much pomp and magnificence, at the same time that prodigious armies were kept constantly in the field. In fact, they were inexhaustible. Incredible sums were drawn from the mines of gold and silver, the salt-works, and other rights established in the crown from time immemorial; but a still larger revenue arose from the contributions of the subjects, exorbitantly increased since the accession of Moteczuma. In this vast and populous empire, there was not a husbandman but was obliged to pay a third of the produce of his lands and stock to the king. Artists were taxed in the same proportion, and the poor were obliged to work certain days for the court without fee or reward. All taxes were levied with the utmost rigor; nor was it without reason that the people clamoured against the tyranny of the administration, of which Moteczuma was not ignorant, though he artfully disguised it in a speech made to Cortez. Every town in the vicinity of the capital furnished men for the king's works, provided fuel for the royal palace, or contributed otherwise towards the support of the court: whence it was that Moteczuma was enabled to complete some stupendous buildings, aqueducts, and other public and magnificent pieces of architecture, at a very slight expence to the treasury. The tribute of the nobility consisted in guarding and attending the emperor's person, or serving in his armies with a certain number of their vassals, maintained at their own expence, or the expence of the enemy: yet were they continually making him presents, which he received not as presents, but regarded as rights due to his crown, dignity, and the anxieties and troubles attending royalty.

His civil and military government.

As we shall have occasion elsewhere to treat of the civil government of Mexico, it will be sufficient to observe in this place, that Moteczuma gave the utmost attention to the due administration of justice among his subjects, notwithstanding he thought himself privileged to tyrannize over the whole empire. Murder, theft, adultery, and all crimes committed with respect to each other, where the crown had no concern, were punished with death; if they at all affected royalty, deeper infamy, and the most excruciating torments, were annexed to the capital punishment. Corruption in ministers, or persons in any public trust, was also capital; and this custom Moteczuma observed with the strictest rigour. Even the offering a bribe was thought worthy of death, and the corrupter and corrupted placed upon a level; a severity which deserves imitation in more civilized states, and under more limited monarchies. One of the most laudable articles of the policy of Moteczuma, consisted in the care taken of the education of children, for which purpose he founded public schools for the instruction of the vulgar, and colleges or seminaries, with more extensive privileges, for the children of the nobility. Here they were taught the imperfect knowledge of the Mexicans; the signs and characters, as well as the tradition in which their history was contained; the principles of the Mexican religion and morality; a general idea of the laws and constitution; and, lastly, the several professions which they were to follow in life. There were also colleges for the education of women; but as all these were not founded by Moteczuma, the subject may be reserved to its proper article. Moteczuma instituted honorary rewards for merit, whether in a civil or military capacity; and the generous ardor with which the people aspired at these honours, is the best proof of the utility of the institution. Such was the empire, such the monarch, and such the people, whom Cortez, with a handful of Spaniards, proposed conquering. We shall soon have occasion to see that this daring project was founded upon reason, since he found means to establish such an influence, that he obliged the great Moteczuma to surrender his liberty in the heart of his capital, and submit his feet to fetters, while surrounded with troops, and guarded by all the nobility in his empire. With respect to the generosity and justice of this transaction we would chuse to be silent: examine the most glorious conquests, and valiant exploits recorded in history, by the test of religion and morality, and they will be found to consist of a series of the most cruel oppressions, bloody carnages, shocking barbarities, and trespasses on the laws of God, of nature, and of nations.

His kindness to the Spaniards.

MOTEZUMA made an artful display of all his pomp and grandeur to the Spaniards; either to engage them as friends, or deter them from hostile attempts; or, perhaps, out of a principle of hospitality, and real respect for strangers, whose valour he could not but admire. He went to all public entertainments, attended by Cortez and the Spanish captains, whom he treated with the most polite familiarity. They were admitted on all occasions to his palace, without form or ceremony, while he only retained the reserve of a sovereign to his own subjects. He was daily distributing presents among the officers and soldiers, with just distinction and discernment of merit; and his example obliged the nobility to treat the strangers with a respect bordering on submission and servility; for courtiers always push to excess every imitation of the qualities of the sovereign: as for the vulgar, they beheld the Spaniards as gods, and bent their knees to the meanest of the soldiers; who would have grown insolent by their importance, but that Cortez checked every emotion of pride, and tendency to tyranny. In this happy manner did they pass away the time, when advices arrived from Vera Cruz, that wrought an entire change in the face of affairs, reduced Cortez to extreme perplexity, and suggested to him the necessity of executing the most daring enterprize that ever entered into the head of mortal. Two Tlascalcan soldiers, disguised in the habits of Mexicans, found means to reach the capital, through bye-ways, brought this intelligence, by a letter from the colony.

Intelligence from Vera Cruz alters the face of affairs.

SINCE the departure of Cortez, the settlement at Vera Cruz met with no accident to disturb their repose, until one of Moteczuma's generals arrived with an army in the country, pillaged some towns, and attacked several caziques, who were in alliance with the Spaniards, and on this occasion claimed their protection. It is true, they had relied so much upon the friendship and valour of the Spaniards, that they refused paying the usual taxes, or the submission required by Moteczuma; and had, in fact, thrown off all obedience to that monarch. The Mexican general, Qualpopoca, had come with an army to the assistance

a ance of the collectors of the tribute and taxes, and committed several violences in consequence of the obdurate refusal of the inhabitants. The country of the Totonques was wholly laid in ashes, and they were the first who laid their grievances before Juan Escalante, governor of Vera Cruz, and besought him with so much earnestness to take arms in their defence, that he sent messengers, in a friendly manner, to the Mexican general, requesting him to suspend his hostilities until he received fresh advices from the emperor; since it was not possible he should authorise injuries to the allies of a monarch, whose ambassadors he received in so friendly a manner at his court. To this message the Mexican returned an insolent answer, as the Spanish writer reports: "Saying, that he was able to comprehend and execute the orders of his prince; and that he likewise knew how to defend in the field what he had undertaken:" which Escalante interpreted into a challenge, that could not be refused, without prejudice to his reputation in the opinion of his Indian allies. Therefore assembling a body of 2000 Totonques, of the hilly country, fifty Spaniards, and two pieces of cannon, he set out with intention of falling upon the main body of the Mexican army, of the disposition of which he had intelligence. He came up with the enemy, defeated Qualpopoca, after a bloody action, in which the Totonques behaved, but received a wound, of which he died. Seven Spanish soldiers were also killed in this action, and one was carried off by the Mexicans, having engaged himself beyond the possibility of being relieved; which proved an irreparable loss to the garrison, and more than a compensation for the victory. A relation of this affair, with all its circumstances, was now transmitted by the council at Vera Cruz to Cortez; and he immediately communicated it to his officers, desiring their advice in what manner he should act in so delicate a conjuncture, and enjoining that it should be kept a profound secret, lest it might transpire among the soldiers, and produce bad consequences. From the whole of the account given by the Spanish writers, it is plain, that they are determined, at all events, to vindicate Cortez of the imputation of ingratitude, and a violation of the rights of hospitality; however, as they are the only authorities, we must adhere to their relation.

BEFORE the council of officers came to any determination, the general sent privately for some of the most sensible and faithful Indians in his army, and questioned them, "Whether they had observed any suspicious circumstances in the conduct of the Mexicans?" To which their answer was, that the vulgar were entirely immersed in the entertainments given by the emperor; but that the nobility seemed pensive and mysterious: and that they had overheard some expressions which would admit of a sinister interpretation; such as, the possibility of breaking down the bridges of the causeway, with others to the same effect. They alledged it had been likewise whispered, that the head of a Spaniard was brought privately in a present to Moteczuma, which he received with astonishment, on account of its size, and the fairness of the aspect, strength of the features, and roughness of the beard; marks which agreed with Juan d'Aguillo, the soldier who had been carried off prisoner in the battle with Qualpopoca; whence it was inferred, that every thing must have been transacted by the emperor's order. Indeed the Tlascalan nobility affirmed, that, without express commands from the court, the Indian general would never have presumed upon commencing hostilities with the Spaniards, at a time when they were so highly favoured by the monarch (A). When the officers assembled in council came to give their opinions, there was no agreement among them: some advising, that a passport from Moteczuma should be solicited; others declaring this would be a reflection upon the character of the Spaniards, and an acknowledgement of their weakness; a third party thought, that as the relief of the colony was essentially necessary, it would be best to march off privately with all the riches they had acquired; and a fourth gave it as their sentiments, that the only honourable means of safety would be to remain in Mexico, until some means of a retreat could be contrived, without seeming to have any knowledge of what was transacted at Vera Cruz. All appeared confident that Moteczuma was privy to Qualpopoca's conduct; which, however, is by no means evident from circumstances; that general being very naturally led into hostilities with the Spaniards, in consequence of their taking upon them to protect subjects of the empire, whom he considered as rebels. None of these propositions fell in with the opinion of Cortez; who, after commending the zeal and freedom of the captains, objected first to the passport as unworthy of soldiers who had opened a way, by dint of arms, to the capital of the empire. The notion of retreating privately would prove equally injurious to their honour, upon which depended their greatest secu-

(A) It is reported that Cortez, ruminating the whole night upon his situation, and endeavouring to devise some remedy, wandered about the palace lost in thought, and stumbled upon a place where Moteczuma had concealed the treasures of his father. A door plastered up excited his curiosity; he immediately got workmen to break it open, and then, after having viewed the treasure, ordered the breach to be repaired, without taking any thing away. Herrera, dec. ii. De Solis, lib. iii. cap. xviii.

rity : the moment they sunk in the esteem of the Indians, from that moment they might a date their ruin ; since it would be impossible to think of opposing, by meer force, such a multitude of people. The moment their flight would be known, it would be easy for the emperor to give notice, by scouts, to the armies on the frontiers to intercept them, while himself rushed like a torrent, from the capital, on their rear. They would find themselves beset and hemmed in upon every side, without one foot of ground on which they could tread with security. He therefore joined in opinion with those who were for remaining in their present situation, but differed with respect to the manner. Some great action, he said, must be performed ; and it would be absolutely necessary to excite the astonishment of the Mexicans, in order to recover their esteem and veneration, sunk by the late unfortunate accident. The only probable means that occurred to him was, to seize b upon the person of Moteczuma, and carry him prisoner to the Spanish quarters ; a resolution which must strike terror, and though apparently rash, by no means impossible to be executed. This point he laboured with so much zeal, that a majority went over to his opinion, all acquiesced, and the spirited resolution was immediately taken, the conduct of the whole being reserved to Cortez. Nothing could appear more desperate, than for a handful of men to attempt imprisoning a powerful monarch in the heart of his own capital, and in his own palace, surrounded by multitudes of guards. The fact would be really incredible, were it not vouched by undeniable testimonies, and confirmed by circumstances ; and the Spaniards, who speak of Cortez as the mirror of justice, would probably have suppressed this action, because it detracts as much from his gratitude, as it adds to c his valour, had they not been at a loss otherwise to account for the revolution which it wrought. Be this as it may, certain we are, that, in a military view, history cannot instance an action more bold, more seasonable, more judiciously planned, nor more successfully executed.

Cortez seizes upon Motezuma, and carries him to the Spanish quarters.

THE hour when it was usual for the Spanish captains to pay their compliments to the emperor, was chosen for the execution of this great project, that no alarm might be given by an unseasonable visit. All the Spaniards were ordered under arms in their quarters, and to hold themselves in readiness without noise or disturbance, until they received further instructions. The avenues to the palace were secured by small parties of soldiers, dropped in proper places as if by accident ; and Cortez, attended by his captains, and fol- d lowed by thirty chosen soldiers, sauntering at some distance, as if for curiosity, advanced to the palace, where they were immediately admitted, their arms giving no suspicion, it being always customary with them to come in this manner into the royal presence. Motezuma came out in his usual manner to meet them, and all took their seats, his servants always having orders to retire. Upon this Cortez began his complaint, relating, in the strongest manner, every circumstance of the conduct of general Qualepopoca, the death of several Spaniards, and the excuse made to the colony, that every thing had been transacted by orders from the emperor ; which he, nevertheless, pretended to disbelieve : concluding, that he owed too much respect for his royal person to credit any thing so unworthy of his majesty, as to be countenancing strangers at his court, while he was endeavouring to de- e stroy them in his provinces.

It is reported, that Moteczuma changed colour at this recital, which the Spaniards construed into a proof of his guilt. He was under the greatest perplexity, until Cortez relieved his confusion, by assuring him of his full conviction, that he could have no share in the cruel death of them whom he so highly honoured with his favour, notwithstanding the declaration of his general and officers, who pleaded his order as the only apology they could make. But he said that it would be necessary to give some extraordinary proof of his regard, and of the falsity of the general's charge, in order to efface the impression of such a calumny ; and that therefore he was come to entreat him to go immediately to the Spanish quarters, without noise or disturbance, as if by his own free choice, with a resolu- f tion not to stir from thence until it should be made apparent that he was no ways concerned in so perfidious an action. By this generous confidence, he would not only appease the just indignation of the great monarch, whose servants the Spaniards were, but restore the lustre of his own honour, which at present was tarnished by the baneful breath of malignity. He gave his word as a gentleman, a soldier, and the minister of the greatest monarch in the universe, that he should be treated among the Spaniards, with all the respect due to his royal dignity ; since they only desired to be sure of his good-will, to have it in their power to hear and obey him with the greater veneration. Perceiving that Moteczuma was silent, as if he remained in astonishment at the boldness of the proposal, Cortez added, by way of palliating the overture, that the quarters which his imperial g majesty had been pleased to assign to the Spaniards, was a royal palace, where he sometimes passed a few days ; and that it, therefore, could not appear strange he should change his residence, to exculpate himself in an affair that was, properly speaking, the complaint
 of

a of one monarch against another. If it should appear to be the fault of his general, it might be redressed by a proper correction, without pushing things to those violences, which generally attend the decisions of quarrels between sovereigns.

IMPATIENT at this discourse, to which his ears had been little accustomed, Moteczuma, at last, broke out with vehemence, "That princes of his rank could not submit to deliver themselves up to imprisonment; nor would his subjects permit it, should he forget his own dignity so far as to stoop to so mean a compliance;" a speech that obliged Cortez to deliver himself with more firmness. He therefore replied, that, provided his majesty went willingly, without obliging the Spaniards to forget the respect they owed to his person and dignity, he valued not the opposition of his subjects, against whom he could employ a sufficient force, without breach of their mutual amity. This led to a kind of altercation, in the course of which Moteczuma made several other proposals, which he hoped would answer the same intention, without either derogating from his dignity, or endangering his liberty. Among others, he offered to send for Qualepopoca and his officers, to be surrendered to the Spaniards, and punished as they thought proper; and to surrender two of his sons as hostages to the Spaniards, for the execution of his promise: but Cortez had now gone too far to recede with safety, and therefore rejected all those expedients. The dispute was prolonged so far, that the captains, who attended Cortez, suspecting the danger that might arise from delay, grew impatient, and Juan Velazquez cried out in a transport, "Let us leave off parlying, and either seize or kill him;" of which words Moteczuma desiring to know the meaning from the interpreter, Donna Marina, who always discharged this office, told him with admirable presence of mind, as if she desired not to be overheard by the Spaniards: "Your majesty is in great danger, by not complying with the instances of those people, who are equally resolute and powerful. I am your own loyal slave; my thoughts are always employed to do you service, and I am likewise one of their confidants, well acquainted with their most secret intentions. If you go with them, you will be treated with all the respect due to so great a prince; but if you resist longer, the consequences may be fatal." This well-timed speech, delivered with an air of sincerity and solicitude about his welfare, wrought the effect, and determined Moteczuma to comply. He presently called for his servants, and ordering his chair and equipage to be got ready, he told his ministers, that, for certain reasons of state, he had resolved to spend some days with the Spaniards. He desired they would publish to all his subjects, that he went voluntarily, and for the interest of the crown, and the advantage of the nation in general. At the same time he ordered one of the captains of his guards to bring Qualepopoca, and his principal officers, prisoners to Mexico; giving him for his authority the royal signet, which he always carried tied to his right arm: all which orders were explained by Marina to the Spaniards, to prevent their taking umbrage, or conceiving any suspicion at hearing the emperor talk to his people. Accompanied by his usual attendants, Moteczuma quitted his palace; the Spaniards marching on foot, close by his chair, for the greater security, but under pretence of doing him honour. The report instantly spread, that Moteczuma was carried off by the strangers; the streets were immediately crowded, every face appeared full of admiration and astonishment, but no attempts were made to rescue him; though some bewailed his condition with tears, others made loud outcries, and multitudes flung themselves on the ground in despair. Moteczuma appeased the tumult, by telling the people, with an air of gaiety, that he was going to divert himself, a few days, with his friends the strangers; and when he was arrived at the Spanish quarters, he gave orders to his guards to disperse the mob, and published, that every riot, tumult, or disturbance, should be punished with immediate death (B).

WHEN Moteczuma arrived in the Spanish quarters, he fixed upon his own apartments, which were immediately furnished by his own servants with the best moveables; and Cortez placed a guard of Spaniards at the different passes leading to the palace, and doubled the centinels round the quarters, to prevent being surpris'd by any attempts to rescue the monarch. Orders were issued to the soldiers, to admit all the gentlemen of Moteczuma's retinue, and also the nobility and ministers, just in the same manner as if he were under no restraint; only with this caution, that a certain number at a time should only be allowed, under pretence of keeping the monarch from being crowded. Cortez desired leave to visit him the same evening, with as much ceremony as before; and a similar respect was shewn him by all the Spanish officers and soldiers; by which means Moteczuma resumed his wonted cheerfulness, distributed presents among the Spaniards, and caressed them with the same cordiality, as if they had done him no injury: a strong instance either of his mag-

The emperor is reconciled to his confinement.

(B) Herrera relates, that, before Cortez entered upon the subject of this visit, Moteczuma had offered him his own daughter in marriage; but de Solis omits this circumstance, as it might possibly appear an additional charge of ingratitude, injustice, and violence.

nanimity, or of his hypocrisy. In a few days he became so perfectly reconciled to his situation, that he seemed to have no inclination to change his condition, and his retirement came to be considered as the effects of a whimsical disposition. Although some of the courtiers discovered that he was actually under confinement; yet they were so thunder-struck with the intrepidity of the Spaniards, and the incredible boldness of the measure, that all resolution was broke, and they contented themselves with pitying what they believed would admit of no remedy. As to the affairs of government, they went on in the usual train. Moteczuma discharged all the functions of a sovereign in his prison, as if he were actually in his palace; gave audience at the accustomed hour; heard the advice and representations of his ministers, and applied himself to all business, civil and military; in order to persuade the people, that his residence in the Spanish quarters was entirely the result of his own inclination, and a desire to enjoy more uninterruptedly the company of men whom he highly esteemed. All the hours that he was disengaged from business, he passed with the Spaniards, and used to declare, that he was not himself without them. Every one studied to please him, and this he perceived with extreme satisfaction. In the evening he used to play with Cortez at a game called Tololoque, or little gold balls, with which they endeavoured, at a certain distance, to strike down pins of the same metal. They played for jewels, and other curiosities; Moteczuma distributing his winnings among the inferior officers of the Spanish troops, and Cortez doing the same with his gains to the emperor's retinue.

He meets with new mortifica-tions.

In the midst of this scene of amity, the officer sent for Qualpopoca returned with his prisoners, who were conducted into the emperor's apartment. Moteczuma immediately sent them to Cortez, that he might inform himself of the truth, and inflict such punishments as he imagined the delinquents might deserve. In course of their examination, they confessed the whole charge of their having violated the peace, provoked the Spaniards of Vera Cruz by hostilities, and killed Aguillo, their prisoner, in cold blood, without any authority, for such proceedings, from the emperor. However, when they were afterwards urged to a more compleat discovery by menaces, they affirmed that they had the imperial orders; an allegation which Cortez treated as an evasion and falsity to apologize for themselves. They were accordingly adjudged by a court-martial of Spanish officers to deserve death, and to be publicly burned before the royal palace, as criminals, who had not only violated the sacred laws of nations, but incurred the penalty of high-treason, by presuming to involve their sovereign in their own guilt.

This was a cruel and severe sentence, dictated wholly by policy. If the Spaniards believed, as we are certainly told, that the officers acted by authority, they must confess them not culpable; nor indeed do we see the necessity of this signally barbarous punishment, all the purposes of which might have been answered by more gentle chastisement. In fact, Qualpopoca only performed what he had reason to believe was the duty of his office: but his death was a sacrifice to Spanish pride; Cortez believing, he could not more strongly confirm his influence and power, than by thus insulting, in his own capital, a monarch who had loaded him with civilities. However, before he ventured upon executing the sentence passed on the Mexican officers, he determined upon a farther exertion of his power, in order the more thoroughly to convince Moteczuma of his dependence. To this purpose another bold stroke was resolved on, in consequence, probably, of the facility with which the last was accomplished, and the resignation of the monarch under the loss of liberty. Cortez now came into the emperor's presence, attended by a soldier, who carried openly in his hand a pair of fetters, which he ordered to be clapped on the feet of Moteczuma; telling him, "that he had been accused by his officers as an accessory to their crime; and "that it was necessary he should expiate for the strong presumptions against him, by some "personal mortification;" with which words he retired, leaving the unhappy prince in a state of the most cruel despondency, despair, and anxiety, whether his life was not to be the next sacrifice. For a while Moteczuma remained in a state of silence and insensibility; but recovering from his first confusion, he resumed his usual magnanimity, and determined to meet his fate with the fortitude of a hero; while his servants bathed his feet with their tears, and thereby demonstrated, that the character of this great monarch has been misrepresented by the Spaniards, in vindication of their own conduct.

No time was lost in the farther execution of Cortez's design. His situation would now admit of no delay or hesitation; matters were come to a crisis, and nothing but the same undaunted resolution could enforce success. The criminals were carried to the place appointed, and the sentence was literally executed in presence of the whole city of Mexico, without the least noise, murmuring, or shew of disturbance. The people were impressed with terror, intermingled with respect and admiration, wondering at the authority which those strangers assumed, without daring, even in thought, to call their power in question, as it was sanctified by the approbation of their sovereign. Immediately after the execution, a tion, Cortez repaired to the royal apartment, and addressing Moteczuma with a chearful countenance, told him, "That the traitors who had presumed to soil his character, were b "now justly punished; and that his majesty had sufficiently refuted calumny, by submit"ting to this short mortification and intermission of liberty." He then fell upon his knees, and with his own hands took off the fetters, endeavouring by this excessive complaisance and respect to wipe off all memory of the injury. Moteczuma received his liberty with a tumultuous joy, which evinced how deeply the indignity of bondage had affected him. He embraced Cortez with transport, and seemed to forget in the person of his deliverer, his most dangerous enemy. When the attendants had withdrawn, Cortez gave the emperor to understand, that he was at liberty to return, when he pleased, to his own palace, the cause of his detention being now removed: but this Moteczuma declined, saying it would by no means be proper to leave the Spanish quarters before Cortez departed the country, as his reputation would suffer greatly, when it was known that he had received his liberty from the hands of another; a thought which Cortez took care to suggest, by means of Donna Marina, before he ventured to make the proposal.

EVERY thing was now contrived in such a manner as to persuade the royal prisoner and his subjects, that he was at perfect liberty, and only a visitor by inclination to the Spaniards; and he returned the obligation with such affability and liberality, as really engaged the affections of the Spaniards. Before this time the virtues of Moteczuma lay concealed from his own subjects. His generosity, sincerity, magnanimity, and warmth of friendship, were obscured by the necessary affectation of dignity, reserve, and austerity; perhaps misfortune too softened his heart, or the acquaintance with a people more civilized than his own, contributed to enlarge his understanding, and call forth the exertion of really natural qualities. Certain it is, that the Spaniards themselves allow no prince could behave in a more amiable manner, or exhibit stronger proofs of a noble mind, than Moteczuma displayed during the whole period of his confinement. After he had, by his behaviour, fully gained and merited the confidence of Cortez, he one day asked his permission to go sometimes to visit his temples, promising, upon the word of a sovereign, faithfully to return to his prison, for so he used to call his confinement jocularly, when only Spaniards were in hearing. He told Cortez, that he now desired, for his own conveniency, and for the sake of the Spaniards, to shew himself to his subjects, who began to suspect that he was detained by force, as the cause of his detention was ceased with the punishment of Quilpopoca, lest some commotion might happen, if he did not speedily prevent it by this proof of his liberty. The general answered, without hesitation, that he was at perfect liberty to go when and where he pleased, and that he ascribed his making as a request to him what he might command, to the excess of his goodness; but he accepted the promise which the emperor made of not changing his residence, as if he were extremely solicitous to preserve the honour and happiness which he had in the conversation and society of his royal guest. He likewise exacted another promise, that Moteczuma would abolish the barbarous custom of human sacrifices at the altars of his gods; a promise which that prince religiously performed, prohibiting all human victims, not only in the temples of Mexico, but in those of the whole empire.

MOTEZUMA's first excursion was to the great temple, whither he went with his usual pomp, the people celebrating the first appearance of their monarch with loud acclamations. Every one seemed now forgetful of the injuries, either real or imaginary, which they received from the tyrant, and nothing appeared to their eyes but the bright side of the royal character, the lustre of which became more conspicuous in adversity. He received their congratulations with an air of satisfaction and majesty, and was particularly profuse that day in the favours bestowed on the nobles, and the gifts distributed among the people. Having complied with the duties of his religion, he returned to his quarters, declaring to the Spaniards, "That the satisfaction he had in residing among them, made him equally f "desirous of returning, as the discharge of his promise." From this time he continued to go abroad when he pleased, and often partook of public diversions, always returning at night to his quarters; insomuch that the Mexicans began actually to regard his perseverance as the effect of his love to the Spaniards. It was now customary for the nobility to make their first application to Cortez whenever any favour was wanted from the emperor; and he was, in all respects, regarded as the chief counsellor, friend, minister, and favourite of the monarch.

BUT Cortez was not so intoxicated with prosperity, or lulled with flattery, as to neglect the immediate object of the expedition, and the concerns of the colony at Vera Cruz. He
g had already recovered all the reputation which the Spaniards lost in the late unfortunate affair, by the condign punishment of the Mexican general, and principal officers concerned in that affair; but as no governor had been appointed to succeed Juan Escalante, the settlement remained without a head, which might be productive of dispute and faction. remedy every evil which might arise from this state of affairs, Cortez nominated captain Gonzalo de Sandoval, governor of Vera Cruz; but because he could not, in the present juncture, conveniently part with so good an officer, he suffered him to appoint Alonso de Grado for his lieutenant, to administer justice, and direct the affairs of the colony in his absence. Cortez is blamed for entrusting a place of such importance, and the only retreat which he had in case of a failure in Mexico, into the hands of a person whose fidelity he had reason to suspect, on account of his attachment to Velaquez: but of this Grado had as yet given no room for suspicion. Besides, that Cortez might reasonably imagine honour and gratitude would, after such a mark of his confidence, engage him more strongly to his interest; he made use of the opportunity which these journeys to and from Vera Cruz furnished, of bringing cordage and other materials for the vessels which he designed building on the lake of Mexico, in case of any rupture with the townsmen, or any further reasons should arise for suspecting that they intended to break down the bridges. The manner in which he brought this about, without giving suspicion to the court, or the emperor, that he was not thoroughly satisfied about his security, was artful and sagacious. He first inflamed the curiosity of Moteczuma, by describing the Spanish shipping, and those floating palaces, that moved with such velocity on the water without oars; and when he found that the monarch was extremely desirous of seeing such a novelty, he gave him to understand, that nothing was wanting to his gratification, besides a few necessaries from Vera Cruz; for that he had workmen in his army capable of building these vessels. The bait took with Moteczuma, and he gave immediate orders that all his people should assist Cortez in whatever he should direct concerning the shipping. By this means, in a few days, two brigantines were got ready, full rigged, and equipped, and Moteczuma was invited on board, to make the first trial of their sailing, of which he could form no idea. Accordingly he embarked for this purpose, and gave orders for a great hunting upon the water, in order that all his people might be diverted with the novelty presented by the Spaniards. On the day appointed, the royal equipage was ready early in the morning, and the lake was covered with a multitude of boats and canoes loaded with people. The Mexicans had augmented the number of their rowers on board the royal barges, with intention to disgrace the Spanish vessels, which they regarded as clumsy, unwieldy, and heavy; but they were soon undeceived; a fresh gale started up, the brigantines hoisted sail, to the utter astonishment of all the spectators, and soon left all the canoes behind, to the great triumph and satisfaction of Moteczuma, who gloried in the victory of the Spaniards, with the true politeness of the most civilized and accomplished prince. The novelty of this spectacle produced its ordinary effects. The Indians were equally pleased and astonished. Some admired the management of the rudder, others of the sails, believing that, by their means, the Spaniards commanded the winds and the waters. Those of more understanding regarded the ships as a beautiful invention, which shewed the genius and good sense of the people; and the vulgar fully persuaded themselves that the Spaniards must be something supernatural, thus to obtain dominion over the elements. Upon the whole, we cannot sufficiently applaud the foresight and prudence of Cortez, who thus united his own security, interest, and reputation, with the entertainment of the people and the sovereign, in whose opinion he could not stand too high to succeed in his designs.

He builds two vessels on the lake of Mexico, which extremely delight the emperor.

Address of Cortez.

Nor was this the single point which his address obtained from Moteczuma that contributed to the accomplishment of his projects. He introduced the praises of the catholic king so favourably, and extolled his power, grandeur, clemency, and other qualities of the heart, and goods of fortune, in so judicious a manner, that Moteczuma and his whole court eagerly desired the proposed alliance, and an established commerce between the two nations, as what must prove mutually beneficial. By way of conversation, and gratifying his curiosity, Cortez also made some of the most important discoveries; for he had so won the affections of the emperor, that he concealed nothing from him. All suspicion touching his ambitious designs were vanished, and he was now considered as the friend and ally of Mexico. By this means he procured very circumstantial information of the strength and extent of the empire; of its divisions, frontiers, provinces, commodities, mines, rivers, and other particulars; of the distances of the south and north seas, their qualities, roads, and harbours: and Cortez seemed to have so little design in these inquiries, that Moteczuma, to indulge his laudable curiosity, ordered his painters, with the assistance of men skilled in the topography of Mexico, to draw out all his dominions on a piece of cotton, in such a manner as to give an exact representation of every particular meriting regard. He even permitted some Spaniards to take a view of the richest mines in the empire, and of all the ports and bays capable of receiving shipping; believing, with a truly generous confidence, that the same persons, whose qualities had engaged his affections, could never forfeit his esteem; and exhibiting the strongest proofs, that although his first professions of regard for the Spaniards

a Spaniards proceeded from fear, they were now the dictates of love, and the warmest emotions of friendship.

Such were the happy circumstances of Cortez and his people, when superstition and enthusiasm, for we cannot call it rational zeal, impelled them to measures which had almost blasted the fruits of all their labour, and destroyed the confidence gained with so much trouble. Nothing could be more preposterous than to attempt, at this juncture, a revolution in religion; yet this, we are told upon unquestionable authority, was the resolution of the Spaniards; for which purpose Cortez sallied out one day at the head of a party to overthrow the idols, and convert the principal temple into a church. Antonio de Solis pretends to call this fact in question; but the only reason he gives is its inconsistency with the rest of Cortez's policy, and the many other instances of his good sense and solid understanding; a method of arguing that would take from human actions their greatest peculiarity, their contradiction and inconsistency. Certain it is that the conjectures of De Solis ought not to weigh against the universal testimony of other writers^c; even those who were eye-witnesses of the very facts they relate, and who were as much concerned to vindicate the reputation of Cortez as his panegyrist. This sudden measure threw the whole city into confusion, and Moteczuma into the utmost perplexity. The priests took up arms in defence of their gods, and the populace espoused their cause. The respect they entertained for the Spaniards yielded to their devotion, and had not the idols been suffered to remain in their places, the consequence must have proved fatal to the reformers. Herrera relates, that the dispute ended by a kind of compromise, effected through the influence of Moteczuma; by which no alteration was to be made in the principal temple, but another inferior in point of veneration was given to the Spaniards, to be turned into a chapel, or church, where they were allowed to perform mats publickly. In a word, mutual toleration was the basis of the accommodation.

It was probably this, together with the circumstances of the monarch's restraint, which gave rise to a conspiracy that was at this time discovered, to drive the Spaniards out of Mexico, and set Moteczuma at liberty; or if he appeared determined to support the strangers, to bring about a revolution in the government, and place another prince upon the imperial throne. At the head of this conspiracy was Caminatzin, nephew to the emperor, an enterprising, spirited, patriotic youth, who grew quite impatient at seeing his uncle, his sovereign, and the whole empire, governed at pleasure by a stranger, unsupported by power, and whose sole influence was founded upon his own address, the credulity of the monarch, and the pusillanimity of the people. The Spanish writers call him an inconsiderate, hot-headed young man, blinded by ambition; and seem to treat as a crime what certainly merits the highest encomiums. He was not only a prince of the blood, but a sovereign of the first consideration, who held the kingdom of Tezeuco as a fief, if we may so call it, of the imperial crown. His rank, dignity, high blood, and spirit, gave him reason to aspire at the first dignity in the empire, upon a future election; and he thought he could not better recommend himself than by attempting an enterprize which must prove agreeable to the sovereign and the subjects, although fear might at present restrain the emotions of the heart. Caminatzin could not forbear observing that pusillanimity and meanness of spirit with which a whole powerful kingdom beheld their monarch in subjection to the ambassador of another prince. He painted the conduct of the Spaniards in the blackest and most odious colours, charging them with having violently confined a prince who was loading them with kindnesses, and with laying the foundation of a despotism, the most cruel and slavish of any, because it was raised upon ignorance, superstition, and hypocrisy. These subjects he seized every opportunity of introducing before the caziques and nobility; and when he found he had sufficiently prepared their minds, he held a secret council of all his friends and relations at his palace of Tezeuco, at which were present the kings of Cayocan, Ixtapalapa, Tacuba, and Maltacingo, all of them princes of the empire, and subjects of Moteczuma. These he harangued with such spirit, elocution, and fervor of patriotism, that the whole assembly applauded his resolution, and promised their utmost assistance, except the cazique of Maltacingo, who endeavoured to defeat his designs, by representing that it would be necessary and incumbent upon them to acquaint Moteczuma with their intentions, and, before they took any violent measures, to have his permission. It would be dangerous, he said, to the royal person to attack the palace where he resided, without first placing him in a place of security, or at least giving him such intimations as might enable him to look to his own safety; nor would it add to their reputation to use violence to strangers, who were under the protection of their sovereign, until they had given some just provocation, and exhibited stronger presumptions of their sinister intentions. It was obvious to the whole assembly that this cazique spoke from prejudice to Caminatzin, whose rival he was in pretensions to the crown, and in glory. His opinion was therefore unanimously rejected; and Caminatzin could not refrain from reflections injurious to his honour, which the other bore patiently, the better to pursue his intentions of making a compleat discovery both to Cortez and Moteczuma. As soon as he had furnished himself with all the information, he sent advices to the Spanish quarters, and Moteczuma was going in quest of Cortez to communicate his intelligence, when he found the general had anticipated his design, and was coming upon the same errand to the royal apartments. It was sufficient to clear Moteczuma from all suspicion of his being an accessary, that he was so ready to communicate his first advices; and indeed his future conduct fully justified the integrity of his heart. He expressed great indignation against the whole faction, and proposed chastising them with the utmost rigor; to which Cortez answered, that he was sorry to have been the occasion of any disturbance among his vassals, and for that reason found he was obliged to take upon himself the remedy. He was therefore come to ask his permission to march immediately with his Spaniards to Tezeuco, to crush in embryo a conspiracy that might be attended with bad consequences to his imperial majesty, unless suppressed in proper season. It would be necessary, he said, to seize upon Caminatzin before he should join his confederates, and thereby prevent the effusion of blood.

MOTEZUMA admired the undaunted spirit of the Spanish general; but he declined his proposal, saying, it would be a diminution of his power and authority to use foreign arms in the chastisement of his own subjects. He therefore desired that Cortez, for his sake, would dissemble his private resentment, and gave it as his final resolution, that every motion of the Spaniards would only serve to encrease the hatred of the people to them, and occasion their insisting more obstinately upon their removal from the court: that it would, therefore, be best to assist him with his counsel, and act as mediator, if circumstances should require any interposition. He likewise thought it proper, first to try the effects of gentle remedies; and whether his nephew would be brought to reason, by reminding him of the duty and obligations which he owed to his sovereign, and of the general benefit that would result from an amicable intercourse with the Spaniards. For this purpose Moteczuma sent one of his attendants to the prince, desiring to see him; and likewise acquainting him, on the part of Cortez, that he sought his friendship, and could wish to have him nearer the royal person, that he might give him proofs of his esteem: to which message, it is reported, the prince returned an insolent answer; probably imagining, that the whole had been dictated by Cortez, who laid this specious snare to deprive him of liberty, as he had done the emperor. Upon this Cortez made fresh application to Moteczuma, for leave to chastise the rebel, for such the spirited prince is called by all the Spanish writers, who treat every attempt against Cortez as an insult upon the sovereign; but the emperor persisted, that, in this case, there was more dependence on deliberation than action; and desired it might be left wholly to his management, as he was better acquainted with the temper of his own people, and the source of the present disaffection. Moteczuma then, by pretending to despise the danger, and treat his nephew's behaviour as the effect of levity and youth, rendered the conspirators careless, countermined their plot, bribed the servants round the person of Caminatzin, and by that means seized his person, and brought him prisoner to the Spanish quarters, without the least noise or disturbance. It was now that Moteczuma discovered all his dissembled resentment, treated his nephew as a criminal guilty of high treason, and committed him to the same prison destined to noblemen condemned to undergo punishment. He was afterwards deposed, out of compliment to Cortez, and a young nobleman, his brother, whom Cortez was desirous of engaging in his interest, was raised to the throne of Tezeuco. This the emperor declared in a speech made at the investiture of the young prince, acquainting him, that he owed all his good fortune to the mediation of the Spaniards; and giving the nobility to understand, that the lenity of the punishment inflicted on Caminatzin, proceeded from the same cause. All applauded the chastisement, the moderation of which seemed no way agreeable to the usual severity shewn by Moteczuma on similar occasions; the superior judgment of the Spaniards was acknowledged; and the very novelty of punishing rebellion without bloodshed produced such extraordinary effects, that all the troops in arms for Caminatzin dispersed, and the confederate caziques submitted themselves, without hesitation, to the royal clemency, and received pardon through the interposition of Cortez, who artfully seized this opportunity of rendering himself popular.

Moteczuma, by an instrument, acknowledges himself the vassal of the king of Spain.

NOTWITHSTANDING the favourable issue of this conspiracy, there was sufficient cause of uneasiness to Moteczuma, who was too well acquainted with the motives of his nephew's conduct, and the genuine patriotism which warmed the breast of that young prince, although circumstances obliged him to conceal his sentiments, and to treat an attempt to rid Mexico of servitude to the Spaniards, as rebellion to the sovereign. Upon coolly examining a mining into the behaviour of Cortez, he found something mysterious in his long residence in his dominions; and thought the continual restraint laid upon his liberty was scarce compatible with the character of ambassador assumed by the general. He began to be ashamed of the general reflections upon his want of spirit and resolution, for suffering himself to be wholly governed by the strangers. This had been one of the pretences urged by Caminatzin for taking up arms; and Moteczuma himself was sensible, there was too much occasion for murmuring. As the same reasons still subsisted, he was apprehensive of some fresh disturbances; the applause bestowed on the late sentence might be intended to cover further designs, and to lull the government into security. At any event there was danger from the sparks of a fire lately extinguished, of which even the Spaniards themselves might take advantage, to enlarge their dominion, and extend their influence over the Mexicans; which could only be effected by a diminution of the royal prerogative. Mature deliberation, therefore, upon his circumstances, determined him to alter his behaviour to the Spaniards, estrange himself gradually from them, and intimate to Cortez, that it was time to think of his departure, as he was ready to execute every particular of the purpose of his embassy. It was some time before he could prevail upon himself to make the proposal, or he could meet with a fair opportunity of introducing the subject. At last, as the general was one day visiting him, he said, that he had been thinking of making a voluntary acknowledgment of that vassalage which was due to the Spanish monarch, as successor of Quezalcoal, and proprietary lord of the Mexican empire; for which purpose he intended to assemble the caziques and nobles of the realm, and to make the acknowledgment in the presence of a full assembly, that they might, after his example, testify their obedience by some contributions and tribute to the new sovereign. He had already, he said, provided abundance of jewels and stones of inestimable value, to discharge the obligation on his own part; and he was persuaded his people would contribute on theirs such a present, as would be worthy of the king, as the first acknowledgment of the Mexican empire.

By this artful proposal, Moteczuma concealed his design from Cortez, and actually persuaded the general, that he had no farther motives for this extraordinary resolution, than a superstitious compliance with the intention of the ancient prophecies, which he now regarded as fulfilled. Cortez returned thanks, and was extremely well pleased to have obtained more than he thought was practicable at the present juncture; little imagining that this was a snare laid by the emperor, to oblige him, in the fullest manner, to declare his ultimate designs, or to quit the Mexican dominions. On the contrary, he hoped now, that this extraordinary favour would enable him, without difficulty, to secure his residence in the capital, until further orders were received from Spain, and such a reinforcement as would be sufficient for the actual conquest of the empire, should it be necessary to employ violence. If we may credit Herrera, it was by the advice of Cortez that Moteczuma dispatched his convocatory orders to the caziques; although it is probable, from the dispatch used upon this occasion, that the orders were issued immediately after the proposal was made to the general, to prevent his penetrating into the designs of the sovereign. Certain it is, that the nobility met at Moteczuma's appointment, that Cortez was admitted into the assembly, and that the whole transaction, of acknowledging the sovereignty of the Spanish monarch, was performed with the utmost solemnity; though it was by no means the intention of Moteczuma to resign his throne, but only by this stratagem to break his fetters. He opened the assembly with a speech, in which he endeavoured, by the most soothing expressions, to conciliate the minds of the nobles. He reminded them of the many proofs he had given them of his affection, and that they held their dignities from his bounty; inferring from thence the improbability of his making any proposal to them incompatible with their interest, and the honour and majesty of the empire. He said, that what he was now going to mention was the result of mature deliberation, and the advice of the gods, who had intimated their opinion to him, by manifest signs of approbation. He entered upon a short account of the origin of the Mexican empire; the expedition of the Nabatlacas; the extraordinary achievement of Quezalcoal; the prophecy he left when he departed for the conquest of the east; foretelling, by the impulse of heaven, that his descendants should return to govern the kingdoms of the west. He affirmed, as an indisputable point, that his catholic majesty was the lawful successor of Quezalcoal; whence he concluded, that they ought unanimously, in his person, to acknowledge the hereditary right of blood; although, for want of this, they had for years disposed of the crown by election. That for his own part he was such a lover of justice, and admirer of the virtues of the brave monarch Quezalcoal, that he would cheerfully lay his crown at the feet of his descendant, and was now resolved to be the first in testifying his satisfaction at the completion of the prophecy. For this purpose he had selected the most precious jewels of his treasury, to be sent to the king of Spain in token of his vassalage; and and hoped that his nobles would follow his example, not only in a similar acknowledgment, but in accompanying it with a handsome contribution of their riches. It is alleged by some Spanish writers, that, in despite of all Moteczuma's efforts to conceal his emotion at the necessity for making this concession, he found something so repugnant to his natural pride, and shocking to his dignity in the humiliating terms, that his expression was frequently interrupted with sobs and tears; which is not at all probable, if, with De Solis, we ascribe the convoking the caziques to the desire of getting clear of the Spaniards by this artifice. The whole assembly, we are told, sympathized with the prince: and Cortez found it necessary to comfort the disconsolate monarch, by assuring him, that it was not the intention of the king of Spain to dispossess him of the royal dignity, or to make the least alteration in the government; his whole desire being only, that the right of succession might be settled on his descendants. Moteczuma recovered courage upon this; but the whole assembly was confounded with the boldness and novelty of the proposal, which they regarded as the highest reflection upon the dignity of so powerful a monarch as Moteczuma. They eyed each other with amazement, observing a profound silence, until the prime minister, who was perfectly acquainted with the temper of the sovereign, ventured to reply, that the assembly would be ready to obey all his commands as their lord and natural sovereign, and to follow any example he should think proper to give; as they had no doubt but he fully weighed the consequences of his resolution, and consulted the gods upon an affair of so great moment. Upon this, a public instrument was drawn up in the manner of the country, with all the necessary solemnities usually observed in paying homage; and from that day forward, the emperor Charles V. king of Spain, was likewise regarded by those people as hereditary lord and sovereign of the Mexican empire: whence the Spanish historians deduce a variety of reasons in justification of their right, founded upon the concurring election of the people, and the voluntary submission of the sovereign; reasons rather specious than solid in a moral view; which, however, it is not our province to refute.

He orders Cortez, to quit his dominions.

MOTEZUMA had, by this acknowledgment of vassalage to his catholic majesty, prepared the way for the execution of his farther designs. He delivered to Cortez the present he had provided, which was extremely rich, consisting of gold, ornaments, pearls, precious stones, and beautiful pictures of feathers. Next he gave a faithful account of the tribute offered by the nobility to the king of Spain, which was indeed exceedingly splendid and valuable: after which he told Cortez, with a reserve and severity altogether unusual, that he should now begin to think of his journey, the motives for his farther stay being ceased, and the issue of his embassy so uncommonly successful; for the Mexicans would take umbrage at his longer delay, suspect that he entertained farther and more dangerous designs than what he avowed; and that the sovereign authority would no longer be able to protect him against their resentment, in case their suspicions were at all corroborated by presumptions. “The gods, said he, are angry with me for the favour I have shewn to their enemies, and have denied me rain. They threaten to destroy the fruits of my harvests, and to send a pestilence among my people. Ask what you will have more, and I freely grant it; because, in despite of the duties of my religion, I love you and the other Spaniards. But you must be gone; religion, and the voice of my people, require this sacrifice.” Cortez was surprised with the air of resolution with which Moteczuma delivered this unexpected intimation; and then, for the first time, discovered the meaning of the presents, and the vassalage to the catholic king. The first emotion of anger would have compelled him to a resolute defiance; but, on further reflection, he thought it more adviseable to dissemble, and seem to acquiesce in the emperor’s resolution. Accordingly he replied, “that as he had obtained the ultimate aim of his embassy, he would now prepare, with all necessary dispatch, for returning to Spain; and he had come with intention to ask the emperor’s permission, to build vessels to transport himself and people: those in which he came having been destroyed, and incapable of being repaired for so long a voyage;” with which evasive answer he gained time for further resolutions, and possibly for the arrival of instructions and reinforcements from Europe. The answer was highly pleasing to Moteczuma, who above all things avoided coming to a rupture with the Spaniards, for whom he entertained a real friendship; yet it is reported that he had provided an army of forty thousand men to support his resolution, in case it had been disputed. But now finding that every thing flowed in the very channel which he directed, he told Cortez, in the most obliging manner, “That it was not his intention to insist upon his departure, without furnishing him with the necessary means; that he should give the requisite orders for building the vessels required, according to the general’s directions; and that it was sufficient to appease the resentment of the gods, and silence the clamours of his subjects, that Cortez had, by his compliance, given proofs of his integrity, and the falsity of their suspicions.” In consequence, instructions

a tions were immediately issued respecting the ships, and dispatched to Vera Cruz; the Indians being directed to cut down the wood, and convey it to the dock. The superintendency of this affair Cortez entrusted to Martin Lopez, a Biscainer, and excellent ship-builder; charging him in private to prolong the work as much as possible, but with all the appearance of making the utmost dispatch.

In this train were the affairs of Cortez and the Spaniards, when a fresh piece of intelligence arrived, as a farther trial of their prudence and constancy. Advice came to Moteczuma, that eighteen sail of ships had been seen off Vera Cruz, and, from the painted cloths on which the figures and dress were described of the mariners, they appeared to be Spaniards. Immediately the emperor sent for Cortez, and laying the picture before him, said, b that now he apprehended the provision for his voyage would be unnecessary, since some ships of his nation were arrived on the coast, in which he might take his passage. It was not possible for Cortez to doubt that the squadron was Spanish, nor difficult to conjecture the motives of the expedition; but as this was the first intimation he had, it was a great difficulty to restrain the emotions of surprize with which he was seized. The first thought which occurred was, that it must be a squadron equipped by Velaquez, to destroy all the fruits of his labour: but this soon gave way to more pleasing sentiments, and he flattered himself that Portocarrero and Montejo, having succeeded in their embassy, had procured this reinforcement. However, as there could be no certainty with respect to the intention of the fleet, he answered Moteczuma in general, that he would no longer delay his departure, if the ships of that fleet were bound back for any of the king of Spain's dominions; adding, that he should soon have an account from the Spaniards at Zempoala of the destination of the armament, the designs of the cruizers, and whether it would be necessary to proceed in building the vessels. In a few days letters arrived from Sandoval, governor of Vera Cruz, acquainting Cortez that the fleet belonged to Velaquez, and brought eight hundred Spaniards to oppose him in his conquests. The letter he received in the presence of Moteczuma, and it required his utmost fortitude to conceal the stroke he sustained by so unexpected a turn of fortune. His situation was now truly desperate, being on every side hemmed round by enemies. Even the report of another armament to oppose his designs would destroy his reputation with the Mexicans, and give all his allegations the air of fiction, and himself the appearance of an impostor. Already the people entertained jealousies; this would occasion them either to think that an actual conquest of their country was intended, or that their opinion, with respect to the completion of the ancient prophecy, was fallacious: at any event his case was desperate, as appeared by the greatly superior force of the new armament. However, he bravely resolved not to sink under misfortune, but to exert his utmost abilities to bring to a happy crisis what appeared so dangerous. He concealed his uneasiness from Moteczuma, softened the account to the Spaniards, and deliberated within himself upon the proper remedies to be used in circumstances so desperate, as seemed almost to exclude hope of relief. But before we enter upon a relation of his measures, it will be necessary we should give some account of the nature and destination of this armament, which proved the source of so much anxiety to Cortez. c

A fresh source of anxiety to Cortez arises.

S E C T. VI.

In which are recited the Strength of the Armament fitted out by Velaquez, its Object, the Proposals of Accommodation made by Cortez, the Attempts made to reduce the Colony of Vera Cruz, the Defeat of the Spaniards under Narvaez, the Mexican Revolt, and Cortez's Return to the Capital.

f T H E new honours with which Velaquez, governor of Cuba, had been vested by the court of Spain, served only to whet his animosity to Cortez, in proportion as they enabled him to execute the dictates of resentment, and the most implacable enmity. He was not only appointed the king's lieutenant of the island of Cuba, by letters-patent, but also of all the lands on the continent, or elsewhere, that should be conquered by any force sent under his direction and authority. The applauses given to Cortez, and the extraordinary success of that officer, rendered him quite outrageous, and compelled him, without reflecting upon the consequences, to form such a fleet and army, as he thought would assuredly destroy his rival, and all who adhered to his fortune. He bought ships, enlisted soldiers, visited all the settlements on the island, to encourage the people to embark in the enterprize, and took every effectual measure for blighting all the laurels gathered by Cortez, and fruits collected for the benefit of the Spanish nation. By representing the immense profits which would arise from the just punishment of a rebel and traitor, he drew together a considerable number of volunteers, and expended the bulk of his fortune in purchasing the necessary arms and provisions for the expedition. In a word, he assembled in the space of a few days such a fleet and army, as in that part of the world might be deemed formidable. The army was composed of eight hundred Spanish foot, eighty horses, twelve pieces of cannon, and great abundance of small arms and ammunition. Pamphilo de Narvaez, a native of Valladolid, a gentleman by birth, of reputed capacity, and of great distinction in Cuba, was nominated to conduct the expedition. To this general he gave instructions, that he should try every expedient to seize Cortez, and send him under a strong guard, that he might receive from his hands the just punishment of his treachery and temerity: that his officers should be used in the same manner, in case they appeared obstinately attached to his interest; and that he should take possession, in his name, of all the new acquisitions, they being within his jurisdiction as king's lieutenant. He never suffered the possibility of disappointment from any accident to enter into his thoughts; he relied, with so much security, on the superiority of his forces and armament, that he never reflected on the courage of Cortez, and the long practice which all the soldiers had in arms, as well as the friendships and alliances they had formed.

VELAQUEZ met with some difficulties in the out-setting, which seemed to preface an unfortunate issue to the expedition; but he was not a man to be startled with omens, directed by counsel, or discouraged by difficulty. The supreme ecclesiastical tribunal at St. Domingo, presiding over the royal audience at Hispaniola, and all the other islands of the West-Indies, was informed of his preparations; and sensible of the inconveniences that must arise from a competition, dispatched one of their number, Lucas Vasquez d'Ayllon, to dissuade Velaquez from the prosecution of a measure so injurious to the public service; with orders, if he continued obstinate, to exert all the authority of the tribunal, commanding him, upon the severest penalties, to disband his army, unrig his fleet, and refrain from giving any molestation to Cortez, under any pretence whatsoever; insisting, that he would urge his complaints in a legal method before the royal audience, where he should be sure of receiving justice, and meeting with the strictest impartiality. On the arrival of this minister in Cuba, he laid his instructions before Velaquez, used arguments and persuasion; but finding himself despised, proceeded to menaces, and the full exertion of his powers. Even this was not sufficient to stop the resolution taken by Velaquez, who was too sanguine in the hope of revenge, and now too far embarked in the enterprize to relinquish it, without injuring his fortune and his reputation; whereupon the licentiate D'Ayllon resolved to accompany the fleet, in expectation that he should either prevail upon the men to obey his orders, or at least find some opportunity of accommodating differences between Velaquez and Cortez, before they should come to open hostilities. Nor did Velaquez oppose this resolution, because he was desirous the fleet should sail before the news of his obstinacy could arrive at St. Domingo. It was no less fortunate to Cortez, that his old friend Andres de Duerio, secretary to Velaquez, likewise accompanied this expedition, with the generous design of preventing the destruction of a person whom he esteemed, and of promoting the public service.

The fleet arrives on the coast of Mexico.

A. D. 1520.

In the month of April, Pamphilo de Narvaez set sail, with a favourable gale; but meeting with tempestuous weather, lost one of his ships near the mountains of St. Martin. He came to an anchor in the port of Ulva, on advice received by three Spanish soldiers, who joined him at the island of Sacrifices, left there by Pizarro, that the garrison at Vera Cruz was incapable of making any resistance. Here a party was landed, and soon had the good fortune to seize upon three straggling soldiers belonging to the colony; who, from fear of punishment, or private disgust to Cortez, gave exact information of all that had been transacted in Mexico, of the condition of the garrison of Vera Cruz, and the general dissatisfaction of the soldiers, both there and in Mexico; thus endeavouring to procure for themselves better usage, by misrepresenting facts, and flattering the hopes of Narvaez, who greedily swallowed every syllable of their false relation. As it was not probable that Sandoval, the governor of the settlement, would attempt, in the present desperate situation of affairs, to oppose so powerful an armament, Narvaez sent one Guavara, a clergyman, to receive his submission; but this person behaved with so much arrogance in the conference, that the governor ordered him, with his attendants, to be seized, and sent, under the conduct of a Zempoalan guard, prisoners to Mexico.

Cortez endeavours to effect a reconciliation.

MEAN time Cortez received constant intelligence of what passed at Vera Cruz. The news that Narvaez had landed quite perplexed him, as he foresaw difficulties in every measure that could be proposed. It appeared rash to think of meeting him in the field with a force so unequal, especially as part of his little army must be left in Mexico, to defend his treasures, and maintain the footing he had established. The most rational scheme was to make overtures of accommodation to Narvaez; but to this the pride and obstinacy of that general, as well as the express injunctions of Velaquez, appeared an insurmountable obstruction:

a tion : nor could the haughty spirit of Cortez stoop to make concessions unworthy of his honour, although they should appear necessary to the good of the common cause. But what gave him the greatest anxiety was, to find himself obliged to feign security and content in his circumstances, while his heart was oppressed, and his breast agitated, by a variety of contending passions. It was of the utmost consequence to conceal from the Mexicans, that the Spaniards were at variance ; he therefore told Moteczuma, that Narvaez was a second ambassador arrived from the king of Spain, to enforce the proposition he had already made ; that he was come with an army, according to the custom of the country ; but as every thing was already adjusted, he would endeavour to prevail upon him to return, and would himself take his passage on board his fleet, as his majesty's generosity had left him nothing b farther to desire. It was equally necessary for Cortez to conceal his chagrin and uneasiness from his own troops, lest their spirits might sink under the greatness and variety of the danger. He told them the probability that Narvaez would come to a reconciliation, and prefer his own interest, and the services of his sovereign, to the absurd revenge of a private man, blended with passion, pride, and animosity. For his own part, he said, he had reason to thank Velaquez for having sent him so seasonable a reinforcement, as he had not the least doubt but he should make fellow-soldiers and companions of those who had come against him with hostile intentions. He even concealed from his captains his own opinion of his circumstances, although he laid before them the state of affairs, and desired their advice, after he had disposed their minds to his own inclinations. It was the general c resolution of the council of war, that proposals of accommodation should immediately be dispatched to Narvaez, and that in the mean time preparations should be made, as if there was a certainty that the proposals would be rejected.

SUCH were the measures concerted and carrying into execution, when the Spanish prisoners, sent by Sandoval, arrived. Cortez went out to receive them, ordered their fetters to be knocked off, embraced them with great humanity, and told the licentiate Guavara, that he would chastise Sandoval for the little regard he shewed for his person and function. He intimated how much he esteemed the happiness of having the expedition commanded by Narvaez, who was his old friend and intimate acquaintance ; he took care that all the Spaniards should appear chearful and gay before this clergyman ; he made him a witness to d the favours he received from Moteczuma ; he gave him several valuable presents ; and, in a word, soothed, cajoled, and insinuated with so much address, that he entirely gained the licentiate to his interest. In the same manner he treated the other prisoners ; and without seeming to tamper with their integrity, released them in four days, strenuously attached to his person, and engaged by his liberality. His next step was to send father Almedo, a moderate, sensible, and eloquent friar, with proposals to Narvaez ; likewise furnishing him with letters to Vasquez D'Ayllon, and his old friend the secretary Duero, with several jewels, which he was to distribute, at his discretion, among the troops. The instructions were filled with arguments, demonstrating the importance to the common cause of a reconciliation, expressions of civility to Narvaez, and a relation of the progress which Cortez had e made in the conquest of Mexico. He represented the fatal consequences to both, of giving the Mexicans, a warlike and powerful people, reason to think, that discord prevailed among the Spaniards : and he finally desired to know the purport of his instructions ; for if they came from the king, or tended to promote the public service, he was ready to surrender his commission, and contribute his assistance in a private station ; but if they were dictated by Velaquez's resentment, they ought both to consider, with equal attention, how much they hazarded by obedience ; concluding, that he did not make use of arguments, because he wanted force ; on the contrary, he knew how to defend his propositions when slighted, as well as to relax in them whenever they appeared unreasonable.

f HAVING dispatched Almedo, he sent to his friends at Tlascalala, desiring that the republic would immediately provide six thousand men to attend him on an enterprize, in which it was possible he might want her service. An officer was likewise sent among his other allies, the caziques of Chinantecas, to desire them to levy two thousand men for the same occasion. The people of this country were the declared enemies of the Mexicans, and had made the strongest professions of friendship to Cortez. As they were brave and warlike, the general imagined he might profit by their assistance ; he even condescended to imitate some of their arms. Hearing that the Chinantecas made use of extreme long lances in their wars, he thought they might prove useful against Narvaez's cavalry ; and accordingly ordered three hundred to be made, pointed with copper for want of iron, and divided among his troops. In a word, he made every necessary preparation for taking the field ; justly imagining, from g the known temper of Narvaez, that it would be difficult to bring him to reason by the force of arguments only. This conjecture was soon verified. Narvaez was at Zempoala when Guavara returned from Mexico, with an account of the grandeur and magnificence of Moteczuma, his respect for Cortez, the great merit of that general, and the humanity and and politeness with which he had entertained him. He commended Cortez's prudence in desiring to conceal from the Mexicans that any cause of difference subsisted between the Spaniards, and run so largely in his praises, that Narvaez ordered him to quit his presence; upon which the priest and his companions sought a new auditory, distributed their presents among the soldiers, and established, what was of the greatest consequence to Cortez, a high opinion of his generosity and valour, and a general inclination for peace. Father de Almedo arrived seasonably to stamp deeper the first impressions made by Guavara. He delivered his instructions to Narvaez, accompanied with an eloquent oration, enforcing the necessity of maintaining a perfect harmony; and received an answer filled with invectives against Cortez, and with so much passion and acrimony, that the reverend father despairing he should be able to bring him to reason, proceeded to the execution of the other part of his instructions. He visited the secretary Duero and the licentiate D'Ayllon, delivered the letters from Cortez, and found them extremely disposed to bring about a reconciliation. They likewise promised to assist, with the utmost influence, the purport of his dispatches; and loudly condemned the inexorable severity and injudicious vehemence of Narvaez. Almedo, in the next place, visited the officers and soldiers of his acquaintance, distributed his presents, and prejudiced them all in favour of the valour, humanity, justice, and generosity of Cortez; insomuch, that there was great reason to hope for a strong party in his interest, or at least in favour of an accommodation. Narvaez had no sooner notice of what was practising in the camp, than he ordered Almedo to be brought before him, loaded with abuse and menaces, calling him a mutinous and a seditious traitor, and threatening to secure his person, had not the secretary Duero interposed, and represented the bad consequences that might flow from such irreverent treatment of a venerable ecclesiastic.

ALMEDO was no sooner dismissed, than Vasquez D'Ayllon, commissary from the royal audience at St. Domingo, proposed that a council of war should be held, to deliberate upon a proper answer to the embassy sent by Cortez; and he was seconded in this proposition by a majority of the army: but Narvaez, to stop all such proceedings, made solemn declaration of war, with fire and sword, against Cortez; threatening, with the severest punishment, whoever should make any farther overtures of reconciliation, and offering a great reward to any who should take or kill his inveterate enemy. At the same time the army had orders to march, and the orders of the general were proclaimed at the head of the army. D'Ayllon, out of all patience with such violent proceedings, resolved to exert his authority. He commanded the crier to desist; and signified to Narvaez, that he should not stir from Zempoala under pain of death, nor employ his forces in shedding the blood of their own friends and countrymen, without the unanimous consent of the army; which so irritated the passionate general, that he ordered him to be seized, and shipped off for Cuba; though the priest had address enough to prevail on the sailors to convey him directly to St. Domingo, where he laid before the royal audience the impetuous, headstrong temper, and violent measures of Narvaez, with such partiality to Cortez, as determined the board to support his interest more powerfully. Indeed, he profited more by the very conduct of Narvaez, than he could expect from his own most strenuous endeavours. That officer carried his resentment so far, as to incur the displeasure of those who were no friends to his enemy; and once their own general fell in their esteem, it was an easy transition to bestow their affections on the subject of his hatred. Accordingly the soldiers began to desert to Vera Cruz; a Portuguese, named Villabobas, having entered, with seven other soldiers, into the service of Sandoval, and brought with him the written agreement of several others, to follow his example, in case Narvaez continued implacable. Moteczuma too, after he came to understand the variance among the Spaniards, continued extremely attached to Cortez, offering to support him with a numerous army; nevertheless there are writers who assert, that he maintained a clandestine correspondence with Narvaez, and endeavoured to destroy both parties by professions of friendship to each: an allegation that is fully refuted by Antonio de Solis. It is true, indeed, that he sent presents to Narvaez, according to the hospitable custom of the country to all strangers; but De Solis justly regards this as no impeachment of his fidelity to Cortez, and clearly demonstrates the impossibility of a secret correspondence for want of interpreters to explain the mutual sentiments of the parties; the Zempoalans entertaining the most bitter resentment against Narvaez, on account of the tyranny and oppression exercised in their province.

On the return of Almedo it was determined by Cortez and his officers, to take the field with all the troops they could possibly assemble, to incorporate the auxiliary Indians of Tlascala and Chinantla, and afterwards to march in a body to Zempoala; first halting in some considerable town, to renew the pacific negotiation, and, if possible, to terminate the differences amicably. This resolution was immediately published among the soldiers, and

- a received with so much applause, that Cortez was forced to exert his authority before he could oblige eighty of his people to remain in Mexico, all being so desirous to attend his person and fortune. He softened the motives for his journey to Moteczuma, telling him that the Spanish captain at Zempoala had given some proofs of a disorderly passion, owing to his misinformation; for he came thither as lieutenant to the governor of a remote province, who was not acquainted with the last instructions of the court of Spain; and therefore persuaded himself, that the embassy in which himself (Cortez) was employed, was an affair properly belonging to his office. All the preparations to support so frivolous a pretension would vanish, he said, without any farther trouble, than his laying before the captain his commission, giving him full power and jurisdiction over all the Spaniards who should arrive on that coast.
- b To anticipate, therefore, the bad consequences which might ensue from the misinformation of Narvaez, he resolved to direct his march to Zempoala with part of his forces, to dispose the minds of the Spaniards to respect the Mexicans as a people now under the protection of the king of Spain; and that he would immediately execute this resolution, lest the approach of an army, so little disciplined, into the neighbourhood of the capital, might occasion some disturbances among the vassals of his imperial majesty. This was the artful turn which he gave the dispute between Narvaez and himself; and Moteczuma, who was already informed of the tyranny exercised by the Spaniards in Zempoala, greatly applauded his design, again renewing his offer of assistance, in case Narvaez continued obstinate and refractory; but when Cortez declined this proposal,
- c emperor told him, that he would shew all manner of countenance and favour, during his absence, to the part of his forces he should think proper to leave in Mexico.

- EVERY obstruction to his march being now surmounted, he appointed Alvarado, an officer high in Moteczuma's esteem, to command the party he left behind; charging him to be so assiduous in his civilities to the emperor, as to render him insensible of his confinement; and strictly enjoining the soldiers to discipline and obedience to their captain, kindness and humanity to the Mexicans, and especially the attendants of the court. Moteczuma, with a prodigious retinue of the nobility, accompanied him out of the city, and upon taking his leave, told him, that if there was no other method of deciding his dispute, but by force of arms, he would not only assist him with an army entirely at his devotion, but even take the field in person for his defence; adding, that he would continue his protection to the Spaniards under Alvarado, and remain in his present quarters until the return of Cortez; a promise to which he religiously adhered amidst all the disturbances that arose among the Mexicans. The general pursued his march to Cholula with all possible dispatch and circumspection, and was received in that city with a cheerful welcome. Thence he proceeded to Tlascala, and was met at the distance of half a league from the city by a splendid embassy from the republic. He was conducted into the town amidst the acclamations of the people, who now respected him as the conqueror of Mexico, and the subduer of the haughty spirit of Moteczuma.^c Immediately the senate deliberated upon the answer to be returned to the demand made by Cortez of six thousand auxiliaries, and
- c determined to comply with the utmost punctuality. Authors, however, differ about this circumstance; but it is certain, that Cortez had no Tlascalans in his army when he engaged Narvaez at Zempoala. It is likewise confessed on all hands, that Cortez left Tlascala extremely well satisfied with his reception; and that, although the Tlascalans failed him upon this occasion, he had no reason to question their fidelity or attachment, having found them extremely ready, brave, and useful, in all his future engagements with the Mexicans. Cortez had sent orders for Sandoval to meet him, with the Spanish garrison of Vera Cruz, at Matalequitán, leaving the settlement to the care of the confederate Indians; and thither he now directed his rout, and found Sandoval punctual to his instructions. Before his departure from Vera Cruz, Sandoval was fortunate enough to obtain exact intelligence of
- f the enemy. Two soldiers of the fort, who artfully imitated the behaviour and gesture of the Mexicans, and greatly resembled them in features and complexion, offered themselves for spies, stripped themselves naked, and entered early in the morning into Zempoala, with baskets of fruit upon their heads. Narvaez had his head-quarters at this town; and with such address did the two Spanish soldiers feign the simplicity of the native peasants and their eagerness, that they had a full survey of the whole place, without creating the least suspicion. Their success encouraged them to another enterprise. Accordingly, the same soldiers entered the town a second time, with intention to discover what kind of watch was maintained, and whether there appeared a possibility of surprising Narvaez. Every thing corresponded with their wishes; they found the enemy careless and secure, and
- g returned to the settlement in safety, after having carried off a horse belonging to one of the captains, who expressed the greatest resentment against Cortez. There was something so extremely bold and ingenious in this attempt, as extremely delighted Cortez, and gave him a happy presage of the event. He built his greatest hopes upon the inexperience of the enemy; and the activity, vigilance, courage, and attachment of his own troops. The negligence of Narvaez was occasioned, he perceived, by the confidence he had in his superiority; and this furnished him with many advantages, in case the fresh instances of peace, he proposed making, should prove abortive. To shun, if possible, the effusion of blood, he dispatched father Almedo, a second time, with as moderate proposals as he could devise; but his negotiation having no success, he appointed Juan Velaquez de Leon to wait on Narvaez; imagining, that the near relation of this officer to the governor of Cuba might give him more influence. On the approach of Velaquez, it was generally believed at Zempoala that he had relinquished the interest of Cortez; and this notion prevailed so much, that Narvaez went out, with a numerous retinue, to receive him; but Velaquez soon disappointed their expectations. He enforced his commission with such eloquence, and entered upon the praises of Cortez with so much warmth, that Narvaez broke off abruptly, declined any farther conversation upon the subject, and dismissed him without an answer.

THIS mark of disrespect, to a person of so much consequence as Velaquez, gave umbrage to the soldiers under Narvaez, who insisted upon the expediency of hearing his message candidly; since it was not probable, that a person of so much honour and sincerity would have come with unreasonable propositions. These discourses proceeded so far, that, to quiet the soldiers, the secretary Duero was nominated to wait on Cortez, to apologize for the behaviour shewn to Velaquez, and to enquire into the substance and purport of his commission. This gentleman was received with all the respect due to his character, his moderation, and the friendship which he always professed for Cortez. Several conferences were held upon the subject of his commission, and every expedient for conquering the obstinacy of Narvaez was canvassed. Cortez is reported to have gone as far, as to offer abandoning the Mexican conquests to his competitor, and going, with his followers, elsewhere, in search of fresh laurels. But this was an act of complaisance which Duero refused to accept; proposing, in its stead, an interview between the two generals, which it was hoped might terminate in contriving a medium. The proposition was readily accepted by Cortez; while, on the other hand, Narvaez proceeded so far as to pen under his hand, the place, the hour, and the circumstances of the appointment, at the same time that he was preparing an ambuscade for his rival. This treachery was discovered by Duero, and notified to Cortez; who finding that the sword must decide all differences, mustered his army, and prepared to march against the enemy. The base designs of Narvaez served only to animate his courage; for he persuaded himself that an officer, who endeavoured to purchase victory at the expence of his honour, could have no great dependence on his own abilities, or the valour and attachment of his soldiers. His progress within a league of Zempoala was rapid, his front was secured by the river of Cansas, and his rear by the territory of the settlement at Vera Cruz. He disposed his army in the most convenient manner, and placed double centinels at every accessible part, keeping, likewise, parties abroad to scour the country, and observe the enemy's motions.

He is surprised and defeated.

NOTICE of the approach of his rival was no sooner brought to Narvaez, than he drew out his troops into the field, with an eagerness and confidence of victory productive of confusion. He promised a reward of two thousand pieces of eight to whoever should bring the head of Cortez, and thereby confirmed his own dread, and the opinion of the soldiers of the formidableness of that hero. He weakly imagined that Cortez would be rash enough to attack him in the open field, with numbers so disproportioned; obstinately persevering in that opinion for the whole day, and until the tempest that came on in the night, rendered the soldiers so clamorous, that he hastened to take shelter in the town, with a disorder and precipitation greatly resembling the consequences of a defeat. Hearing that Cortez kept himself encamped on the opposite side of the river, he reasonably conjectured that he had nothing to fear that night, when the storm of rain and wind was so great as almost to disable the soldiers from handling their arms; he therefore lodged his troops in the temples, resolving, as soon as day appeared, and a calm ensued, to lead them again into the field. Cortez had advice of all these particulars from the secretary Duero, who certainly betrayed his party; although De Solis palliates his conduct, by alledging, that his sole design in sending this information, was to induce Cortez to pass the night quietly, in hopes that the next day might produce something favourable to the proposed accommodation. Be this as it may, it certainly enabled Cortez to plan that enterprise, upon the success of which depended all his future fortune. He drew out his troops without delay, and they obeyed without complaining of the severity of the weather, or the unseasonableness of the motion, from a thorough confidence in the judgment of their leader, and the necessity of the measure. They passed the river, the water reaching almost to their breasts, and

- a and on their gaining the opposite shore, were made acquainted with the design of the march, the situation of the enemy the facility with which they might be attacked, the great probability of victory, and every other circumstance which could inflame their courage, and give spur to their ardour. Fired with the concise animating speech of the general, all acknowledged the prudence of his resolution, and expressed their determination to conquer, or to die fighting by his side. Immediately he divided the little army in three corps; the first under the conduct of Sandoval, being directed to seize upon the stairs of the temple, and prevent the enemy from using their artillery; the second under Christopher de Olid, having orders to ascend the tower, and invest the quarters of Narvaez: while the third corps, led by the general in person, was reserved to support the two first, and
- b carry relief to that quarter which should appear the hardest pressed. Orders were likewise given, that the drums should beat, and the warlike instruments sound, as soon as the attack began, in order to strike the greater terror, and increase the confusion consequent on being surprised. As he proposed reaching Zempoala about midnight, the army marched slowly, to prevent their being out of breath when they began to engage; but they had not proceeded far, when they fell in with two of the enemy's centinels, one of whom was made prisoner. It was feared that the other, who had made his escape, might spread the alarm; Cortez, therefore, ordered the troops to hasten their pace, that he might arrive before Narvaez should have time to make a proper disposition. Every thing happened just as he had foreseen: the sentinel discharged his duty, gave the necessary information, and
- c was disbelieved. A few, however, armed themselves; but Cortez seasonably entered the town, and confirmed the soldier's account, before Narvaez could prevail upon himself to disturb his rest, or order the troops to their several posts. He had the good fortune to escape the body of cavalry, sent out to scour the country, and reached the temple, without being challenged by any of the out-guards. Sandoval instantly began his attack with his van, mounted the stairs, and threw the enemy into the utmost disorder, as there now remained no doubt of what the sentinel asserted. Two pieces of artillery were fired upon him, but they did no execution, and only served to augment the general confusion, and the noise made by the drums and other warlike instruments of Cortez. The enemy, however, were so numerous, that Sandoval would have found it impossible to succeed in the
- d execution of his orders, had he had not been opportunely supported by the second division, under Christopher de Olid, and by Cortez in person; who quitting the rear, plunged, sword-in-hand into the midst of the enemy, and the hottest part of the engagement. Such was the impetuosity of his troops, that the enemy were driven back, step by step, and in the end totally defeated, leaving their artillery behind, and taking shelter in the other temple, where Narvaez had his quarters, and commanded in person. He had just then put on his armour, and was animating his people by his voice and example, when a thrust in the eye with a pike brought him to the ground, and into the hands of the enemy; which so dispirited his troops, that they immediately threw down their arms, and asked quarter.
- e ANOTHER tower was still possessed by captain Sebatierra, and young Diego de Velaquez, who seemed determined to defend themselves to the last extremities. Cortez, upon this, ordered two pieces of cannon to bear upon the tower, and so terrified the soldiers, that they refused to obey their officers longer, and obliged them to submit at discretion. Immediately a general pardon was published to all who would surrender themselves; and the general passed his word, that they should have liberty, if they chose it, to return to Cuba, or to enlist in his army, and share his fortune. All to a man accepted the terms; and thus Cortez not only broke all the designs of his enemies, but acquired such an accession of strength, as enabled him to return to the conquest of Mexico with more assurance of success than before. This important victory was obtained with only the loss of four soldiers
- f killed, and two wounded; and on the part of the enemy, two officers and fifteen private men killed, with near double that number of wounded. Cortez visited Narvaez, who told him with an air of insult, "That he had reason to value himself upon having such a prisoner in his hands." To which Cortez replied contemptuously, "That without vanity he might rank this victory, and his imprisonment, among the least considerable actions performed since his arrival in that country." Notwithstanding this severity, he gave orders that Narvaez, and all the prisoners, should be humanely treated, and diligently guarded, lest the small appearance of their conquerors, in day light, might animate them to fresh attempts. At break of day he was joined by two thousand auxiliaries, sent by the Chinanticas, which rendered him more secure against the consequences of a revolt; as it
- g not only augmented his force, but shewed Narvaez that he was beloved, befriended, and respected in the country. It was then that the enemy beheld their disgrace in full view. Night had concealed the number with Cortez; and indeed Narvaez reasonably supposed, that he was supported by a great body of auxiliary Mexicans; the day-light discovered this error, and his unequal forces; the soldiers cursed the confidence of Narvaez, and redoubled their esteem for the vigilance, prudence, and undaunted courage of the conqueror. All were charmed with his generosity, the clemency shewn to the prisoners, and the humanity to the wounded. His friends among the troops of Narvaez laid aside dissimulation, entered into his service, and were followed by the rest who were less affected to his interest. Every man gave in his name, disputing for a preference in the roll; nor was there a soldier who so much as intimated his inclination to return to Cuba. When Cortez had sufficiently examined their dispositions, he returned their arms to the new troops, and by this mark of confidence entirely won their affections, and confirmed their fidelity. The officers were sent prisoners on board the fleet, and thus the defeat of Narvaez not only put Cortez in possession of a fleet of eleven ships, and seven brigantines, but placed him at the head of an army composed of a thousand Spanish infantry, and near an hundred cavalry, exclusive of the garrison left at Vera Cruz, for the defence of the settlement, and security of the prisoners.

Cortez prepares to return to Mexico.

THIS series of success did not so elevate Cortez as to render him unmindful of Alvarado, and the forces left behind in Mexico. He was sensible of the danger to which such a handful of men were exposed, in the midst of a vast empire filled with discontent and sedition. Their chief security depended on Moteczuma's keeping the promise he had made, of not removing his quarters, or attempting any change in his absence, an obligation of no great force, where interest, inclination, and policy, united to oppose it. Besides that, Moteczuma, however well affected to the Spaniards, and regardful of his promise, might not have it in his power to repress the zeal of his subjects, and prevent their embracing this opportunity of showering down vengeance on the heads of those who held their march in a kind of disgraceful voluntary bondage. Full of these thoughts, he determined to direct his march back to Mexico; and that no danger might arise to the fleet at Vera Cruz, he ordered the ships to be unrigged, and all their sails and cordage to be lodged in the settlement. It was his intention to divide his forces, to avoid giving umbrage to Moteczuma, by entering his capital with so large an army; but a letter received from Alvarado altered his resolution, and determined him to march with all his troops, with the utmost dispatch, to the relief of that brave officer. The advices brought by this letter were, that the Mexicans had taken arms, and in despite of Moteczuma, who had sacredly observed his word, made such frequent attacks, and in such multitudes, that all the Spaniards must necessarily sink under the weight of such prodigious numbers, unless they were speedily succoured. Diaz del Castillo and Herrera are of opinion, that Moteczuma fomented this disturbance privately; but De Sois gives irrefragable proofs of the monarch's integrity and honour; although we are of opinion, his conduct would require no apology, had he endeavoured to rid himself of strangers who were so great a restraint on his liberty, so disagreeable to his subjects, so dangerous to his empire, and such a clog upon his authority. The letter was brought by a Spanish soldier, accompanied by an embassy from Moteczuma, representing to Cortez, that it was entirely out of his power to repress the fury of his people; that he would never abandon Alvarado, the Spaniards, and his word, but that if relief did not soon arrive, he could not promise for the consequences. After this information there was no room for deliberation; officers and soldiers declared, that their immediate march was indispensable, and their union necessary; and, indeed, Moteczuma's embassy furnished Cortez with a handsome pretext for leading to the capital what might be deemed a potent and numerous army. To prevent oppressing the Indians in their way, and for the greater conveniency of provisions, Cortez divided his troops into small corps, who had orders to take different routs, and meet at Tlascala, the general rendezvous; nevertheless, the soldiers still suffered extreme hardships from hunger and thirst, as well as fatigue. All, however, bore their misfortunes with courage, knowing they would be of short duration; and the soldiers who came with Narvaez, emulous of equalling the veterans, endured their sufferings without murmuring, as they regarded Mexico as the land of promise, where their toils would be sufficiently rewarded. His entry into Tlascala was splendid, Magiscatzin entertained him in his own house, and the senate gave orders to the whole army of the republic to be in readiness to attend him two Mexico; but Cortez would only accept of two thousand men, that his troops might not appear formidably numerous. As he approached Mexico, he passed the lake without opposition, though there were some suspicious appearances, which rendered circumspection necessary. The two Spanish brigantines were found flayed and half burnt, the suburbs and forts at the entrance abandoned, the bridges serving for a communication between the streets were broke down, and all was wrapped in profound and dangerous silence. This suspicion continued, until the Spaniards, in Mexico, discovering the army at a distance, raised a loud shout, and dispelled the gloom of apprehension. Alvarado, with his people, came to the gate to receive Cortez, the soldiers caressed each other with the sincerest joy, and Moteczuma, with all his attendants, came to the outermost

- a outermost court, to congratulate the general on his arrival. Some writers report, that Cortez received the emperor's demonstration of joy with coldness and reserve. Castillo relates, that he turned his back upon him, without deigning to return an answer; and Herrera speaks as if the general, grown insolent with prosperity, had charged Moteczuma with the fault of his subjects: but neither Gomara, nor Cortez in his own account, touch upon this circumstance, which is, indeed, extremely improbable. There was not the least room for suspicion that Moteczuma entertained any ill-will to the Spaniards, or design to break his promise; on the contrary, it is certain, that he adhered to his word beyond what sound policy dictated, was extremely diligent in suppressing the tumults, exposed his person in defence of his guests; and had, merely by the awful shadow of his royal authority, prevented the Spaniards from being sacrificed to the rage of his subjects.

- It may appear extraordinary, that, in this state of affairs, the Mexicans should suffer Cortez to enter the city without opposition, and bring such powerful reinforcements to Alvarado; but Antonio de Solis explains this point in the following manner: They relied upon their excessive numbers, were elated with their success in having killed three or four Spaniards in the late attacks, and now allowed Cortez a free entrance only that they might with the less trouble crush the whole at one blow, after they were united. This was the occasion of their retreat into the other part of the city, and the cause of the entire suspension of hostilities, in which Cortez imagined they had treacherous designs. With respect to the motives for the insurrection, authors are greatly divided, some ascribing it to the cruelty of the Spaniards, and founding this opinion on the authority of one of their own writers of the greatest credit; we mean Bartolomeo de la Casas, afterwards bishop of Chiapa. His words are very full and explicit: "The Mexicans, says he, having appointed a public dance, which they called Mitotes, to entertain the Spaniards and Moteczuma, the general, Pedro de Alvarado, observing the jewels with which the Indians were adorned, assembled his soldiers, and fell upon them, cutting them in pieces, to gain possession of those valuable ornaments; in the acquisition of which infamous spoil, above two thousand of the Mexican nobility were put to the sword." De Solis vindicates his country from this reproach, gives a quite different account of the conspiracy, for such he terms it; but, in our opinion, does not clearly enough refute the allegation of the prelate. He rather endeavours to invalidate his evidence, by observing that la Casas was at that time soliciting the relief of the Indians; and in order to obtain his purposes, which, by this confession, were certainly pious and humane, was exaggerating every circumstance of their oppression. According to De Solis, it was obvious to Alvarado, that the nobility of the court had fallen off from their respect since the departure of the Spaniards, which obliged him to behave with great caution and circumspection. He employed spies to watch their motions, and soon received information, that something extraordinary was in agitation. On closer examination it appeared, that a dangerous conspiracy was hatching against the Spaniards; nor was it long before some of the conspirators themselves betrayed to him the whole secret. A few days after, several of the principal nobility came for leave to Alvarado, to celebrate their annual festival, called Mitotes; a compliment with which they intended to deceive him, and prevent his taking umbrage at their assembling in such numbers: and Alvarado, as his suspicions were not yet fully confirmed, granted the request, on condition the Mexicans would come unarmed, and decline offering human sacrifices. That very night he received intelligence, that arms were secretly distributing in all the houses adjoining to the temple; his doubts vanished, and he determined upon signal revenge. His plan was to attack them in the beginning of the festival, without furnishing them with time to take arms, or assemble the populace; and he found it no difficult matter to carry it into execution. The Mexicans were so intoxicated with liquor and joy that their plot remained undiscovered: that Alvarado attacked and easily defeated them, wounding and killing great numbers, who could not escape in the tumult, or leap over the galleries or windows. "His intention, says de Solis, was only to terrify and disperse them; which he indeed compassed not without confusion and disorder; for the Spaniards instantly fell to stripping the dead and wounded of their jewels and valuable ornaments." Thus de Solis, in fact, admits the whole charge brought against Alvarado by the bishop of Chiapa: he acknowledges that he began a terrible massacre, during a public festival; and that the killed and wounded were stripped and plundered by the soldiers: but this he calls the punishment of a dangerous conspiracy, though he acknowledges that it was rash, inconsiderate, and ill conducted, as Alvarado retired to his quarters with the air of a conqueror, without giving the populace the slightest information of the causes that prompted him to an action, base, insidious, and barbarous to all outward appearance. We leave it to the reader to pass judgment upon those different relations; for our own parts, we cannot help being strongly prejudiced in favour of La Casas, who is confessed to be a writer of candour, and who could have no reasonable motive for casting an indelible stain on the character of his nation. The same allegations, indeed, from a foreigner, might seem suspicious ; but from a Spanish dignified prelate, of irreproachable manners and veracity, they will outweigh all the assertions of a writer, whose business it is to magnify and extol every circumstance of this glorious conquest.

Mexicans revolt.

CORTÉZ was extremely shocked at this rash procedure, and blamed Alvarado that he had not only neglected to enform the people of the conspiracy, but to consult upon it with Moteczuma, as both must now behold the slaughter of the Mexican nobility as an act of wanton cruelty and avarice ; but it was now impossible to redress the evil, except by prosecuting the system of Alvarado, and destroying greater numbers of those innocent people, who were taking arms only in their own defence. In fact Cortez relied upon his own strength, and was probably not sorry that Alvarado had furnished him with so good a pretext for beginning the conquest, and plundering so rich a city. Observing that the same suspicious tranquillity and silence reigned as the day before, he dispatched Diego de Ordaz, with a party of four hundred Spaniards and Tlascalans, to scour the streets, and endeavour to penetrate into this mysterious stillness. Ordaz had not advanced a great way, when he discovered an armed party, sent out probably as a decoy to draw him into danger, which had the effect. The party retreated, and Ordaz pursued, in hopes of taking some prisoners, from whom he might obtain intelligence ; but he soon found himself inclosed between two vast armies, one behind, and the other before ; so that it was necessary to break thro', sword in hand, before he could either advance or retreat. Besides, the tops of the houses and windows were crowded with enemies, who poured down such showers of stones, arrows, and darts, as quite obscured the sky, and covered the Spaniards. All his valour and experience were now wanted to extricate himself from this dangerous situation. He drew up in a double front, employed his swords and pikes against the enemies below, and plied those above with his fire-arms ; but his chief advantage arose from the ardour of the Indians, who hastened on so tumultuously, as to confound each other with numbers, and leave nothing else to the Spaniards than to slay and kill without resistance. It was this circumstance alone that saved Ordaz ; for had the enemy fought with tolerable order, he must have sunk under their weight. As matters fell out, the carnage was so dreadful, that, losing courage, they retired to a distance, and used revilings and menaces instead of weapons. The fire-arms cleared the terraces, and Diego de Ordaz, who was sent to make discoveries, did not think it advisable to engage farther ; he therefore retreated to his quarters, in the same disposition as when he was charged closely by the enemy ; and after some difficulty joined Cortez, with the loss of eight men killed in the action, himself, with almost all his people, being wounded.

THIS was the first proof which Cortez had of the resentment of the Mexicans, and it served to confirm his resolution to bring them to obedience by force of arms. All endeavours to accommodate matters would only diminish his reputation, and convince the enemy that he stood in awe of their numbers. He determined to oblige them to make the first proposals, for which reason he prepared a fally from his quarters, in expectation that the vigour and effects of the blow would strike terror. It is astonishing, however, that Moteczuma was never consulted upon any of these occasions. Formerly Cortez made him acquainted with every motion, and it looks as if he now suspected that he had encouraged the insurrection, because he is treated with no confidence. All that De Solis relates is, that Moteczuma was too diffident of his own authority, and apprehensive of the disobedience of his vassals, to propose setting on foot a treaty. Probable it is, that the conduct of Alvarado greatly injured the Spaniards in his good opinion, though regard to his word, and indeed his own safety, obliged him to act in a neutral capacity while he was detained a prisoner in the Spanish quarters. The enemy anticipated the design of Cortez. After the affair of Ordaz they halted at some distance from the palace, and formed the vigorous resolution of attacking the quarters on all sides. All the adjacent streets were filled with armed men, and when every thing was formed for the assault, the drums and flutes gave the dreadful signal. The van-guard was composed of companies of archers, who were to clear the walls to facilitate the approach of the center and rear. All advanced with precipitation and fury. The discharges of the archers were incredibly quick and alert, they were pressed on with extreme impetuosity, and the Spaniards found the utmost difficulty in maintaining their ground, and repulsing so violent and well conducted an attack. The ground was so thickly strewed with arrows, that the Spaniards were forced to employ people to remove them, as they choked up the way to the ramparts ; and although the artillery and small-arms made terrible destruction, yet such was the obstinate valour of the Mexicans, that they advanced undaunted to fill up the chasms left by the slain, trampling, without fear or dread, upon the bodies of the dead and wounded, until they met the same fate, and were succeeded by others. Nothing was left untried to gain possession of the ramparts. Several attempted to scale the fortifications at the very mouths of the cannon ; others endeavoured to

- a to force open the gates, or break down the walls, with ill contrived instruments; many mounted upon the shoulders of their companions, that their weapons might do more execution, and great numbers formed their lances and pikes into ladders, by which they attempted to gain the windows and terraces. All, in general, exposed themselves, without reserve, to danger, and performed actions of the most intrepid courage, and savage ferocity. At last night seasonably interposed, and obliged them to retreat before they were conquered, out of a superstitious custom that prevailed among the Mexicans, of never fighting in the absence of the sun's influence; a custom probably founded upon the generous sentiment, that it was cowardly to attack an enemy in the dark. Even their superstition could not entirely subdue their ardour, for they continued to shoot at a distance with
- b fired arrows, which, setting the buildings of the palace in flames, obliged the Spaniards to break down some walls, to cut off the communication between the houses, and afterwards toil with indefatigable industry to repair those breaches, which would serve as an inlet to the torrent of enemies they expected to rush upon them as soon as day appeared. In this the Spaniards were disappointed. The enemy kept at a distance, endeavouring to provoke Cortez to battle, and to quit his walls, by the most injurious expressions. As he had before intended a sally, the general embraced this opportunity of animating his people, and whetting their courage by a short speech, representing the necessity they were under of giving the enemy some very signal proof of their gallantry. Agreeable to this resolution, the troops were divided into three bodies, each formed into a double front, in the manner
- c so successfully observed by Ordaz on a late occasion. They engaged at the same time, and the enemy sustained the charge with firmness, venturing to come to push of pikes with the Spaniards. The fire-arms levelled at the galleries and windows could not put a stop to the showers of stones incessantly poured down, and it was necessary to set divers houses on fire, to check an evil to which there was no other remedy. After an obstinate engagement, in which multitudes were slain, the Mexicans at last gave way before the superior valour of the Spaniards, and were pursued from street to street into a great square, where they made a last effort, and were totally defeated. Their flight was confused and disorderly; the wounded were trampled to death by the flying, and the slaughter might have been still more dreadful, had not Cortez stopped the pursuit, in hopes of reducing them to
- d terms by this act of moderation. Already the carnage was so great, that the canals were tinged with blood, and the streets filled with vast heaps of dead bodies; but the amount of the loss is not estimated on the side of the Mexicans. Of Cortez's army, twelve were killed, Spaniards and Tlascalans, and a much greater number wounded; a cheap price for victory, had it been decisive, or the conqueror in a better condition to support the loss of his soldiers. The engagement lasted for the whole forenoon; the Spaniards were frequently hard pressed; in pursuing they were obliged to fill up ditches, and sustain the charge of the enemy, who returned in swarms upon every new obstruction. The Tlascalans behaved with great gallantry, and fought with order and regularity; in a word, every individual fully discharged his duty; and Cortez, in particular, displayed all the qualities of a general and a soldier.
- e

A SUSPENSION of hostilities ensued, as if by mutual agreement, both sides taking breath, in order to resume their attacks with the greater vigour. Mean time Cortez did not neglect the opportunity of making fresh overtures of peace, by means of some of Moteczuma's attendants. He observed that the Mexicans, like the hydra's head, multiplied by their losses, and regenerated under the stroke levelled for their destruction; but the proposals met with no success. Some of the persons appointed to conduct the negotiation returned severely handled, and others remained with the enemy, to the great discontent of Moteczuma, who sincerely wished the reduction of his tumultuous subjects, lest they should entirely throw off their obedience, and lose all dread of his authority. All hope of accommodation being vanished, Cortez made preparations for resisting the prodigious numbers of his enemies, and defending his people from the showers of stones, darts, and arrows, discharged from the windows and galleries of the houses. With this view he ordered four wooden towers to be erected, which moved upon wheels, each capable of containing thirty men, covered with strong plank, and furnished in the front and sides with slits, to discharge under cover. Even the novelty of those machines would, he believed, strike terror. When they were in readiness, a second sally was made by Cortez in person, at the head of the bulk of his Spaniards, and all the Tlascalans, taking with him some pieces of cannon, the wooden towers, and a few horse, to be used wherever the ground would suffer them to act. All was in profound silence when the Spaniards quitted their quarters;

g but scarce had they passed through one street when they were assaulted upon every side, by an innumerable multitude, who began the engagement with loud shouts, and the hoarse noise of drums, shells, and other barbarous warlike instruments. Trenches had been cut in all the streets, and these the Mexicans defended with such valour and obstinacy, that they

they could only be dislodged by the artillery. They fought with more regularity than before, directed their courage to better purpose, and seemed to improve in the art of war by experience. Their conduct favoured nothing of the rashness of a popular tumult; they appeared to be under the command of judicious officers, every discharge was deliberate and well aimed, and all the posts were defended with intrepidity, and abandoned without confusion. Huge stones and pieces of rocks were tumbled down upon the wooden machines from the galleries, which broke them in pieces. When they became sensible of the damage sustained from the artillery and musquetry, they retired gradually, continuing a kind of running fight, until they came to the next entrenchment, where they again made an obstinate stand. For the greater part of the day the battle raged, the Indians disputing every inch of ground, with such well-directed valour, as convinced Cortez of the impossibility of reducing the Mexicans by force. The city received incredible damage, many houses were burnt down, and the enemy lost more blood than in the preceding action; but though repulsed, they were not defeated. On the contrary, they maintained a retreating fight, till night separated the combatants, and furnished the Spaniards with an opportunity of returning to their quarters, without resigning the victory, after they had lost fifty men, chiefly Tlascalans. Fifty Spaniards were grievously wounded, and among these the general, who received an arrow in the left hand, in the heat of the battle (A). When Cortez arrived at his quarters, he resigned himself to reflection, and, upon mature deliberation, was sensible how impracticable it was to keep possession of Mexico. Every day produced fresh losses; and though he was constantly victorious, yet his advantages served only to accelerate his ruin. A sense of shame, pride, and the fire of his own genius, impelled him to farther efforts to subdue the enemy; but when he considered that after the multitudes slain, their numbers appeared undiminished; that their resentment grew with their losses; that they fought with more skill and courage; and that they were daily improving in the art of war; he turned his thoughts towards the means of retreating with the greatest safety. Nor was Moteczuma less distracted and embarrassed with contending passions and reflections. He now began to apprehend that his people had entirely thrown off their allegiance on account of his attachment to the Spaniards, and yet he observed a reserve on the side of Cortez, as if he suspected him of sinister practices, and of tampering with the Mexicans. From the highest tower of the palace he beheld the last engagement, and could discover the princes of Tezeuco and Iztapalapa, with several others of the first lords of the empire, animating the Mexicans, and ordering the battle. Hitherto he regarded the affair as a popular tumult, but now he foresaw the ruin of his own authority, and perhaps a total revolution in the government. In the first transports of his anger, he condemned all the nobility to condign punishment, and breathed nothing but slaughter and bloody revenge, until reflecting on his own inability, he sunk into despondency. After reflecting upon various remedies to be applied to this dangerous malady, what appeared to him the least exceptionable, was to distress the Spaniards, return to his palace, and endeavour to regain the affections of his subjects, by acts of clemency and generosity. Full of this notion he sent for Cortez, and told him, that now the distracted state of his kingdom required some very effectual remedy; that his imagination could devise none more likely to be attended with happy consequences, than that the Spaniards would evacuate Mexico, and thereby deprive the seditious of all pretences. The clamours of his vassals sounded well, he said, in the ears of the vulgar, since all they demanded was the liberty of their prince; and things were now come to such a height, that no other prospect of appeasing the public commotions remained, than taking away the cause. He bitterly exclaimed against the insolence of the nobility, and repeated how much he had suffered by preserving his promise to Cortez, and continuing his affections to the Spaniards; and he concluded with touching upon the groundless jealousies entertained of his conduct by those persons upon whose account he had forfeited the esteem and affection of his subjects. Cortez, whose own sentiments coincided with the emperor's, but with different views, readily agreed to the proposition of quitting Mexico, and willing to put an act of necessity on the footing of

proposal to Cortez.

(A) Antonio de Herrera is altogether hyperbolical in his relation of this, and all the preceding and future engagements. According to him, not a day passed without a battle, each more bloody and obstinate than the former. Here the Spaniards performed prodigies of valour, and the Mexicans poured their arrows so thick, that forty cart-loads were gathered and burnt in a day by Cortez's people. They took a Spanish horseman alive, and sacrificed him in sight of all his companions. The Tlascalans feasted luxuriously on the bodies of the slaughtered Mexicans. Cortez almost singly drove three hundred noblemen, who had taken possession of a tower, over the galleries and windows into the street, after they had foiled all the attempts of a body of Spaniards to dislodge them. Two of them laid hold of the general, with intention to dash themselves and him in pieces, by a fall from the top of the temple; but he extricated himself by strength and agility; and to conclude the wonder, a saint, mounted on a white horse, fought for the Spaniards, and, by the image of the Virgin Mary, threw dust in the eyes of the Mexicans. But we must observe, that most of these circumstances are said to have happened in an action subsequent to the death of Moteczuma. Dec. ii. lib. viii. cap. 2.

a respect and obedience to the royal mandate, replied, that it was both his inclination and duty to pay an entire resignation to the will of his imperial majesty; without entering into the motives of his resolution, or losing time in representing the inconveniencies that might enue; that it would give him great uneasiness to part from his royal person, until he was fully assured of the obedience of his subjects, especially as the declaration of the nobility, in favour of the populace, required the utmost circumspection; but that since his departure was regarded as a necessary step towards a happy reconciliation, he had fixed his resolution immediately to march with his army to Zempoala, only requesting of his majesty that he would, before his departure, oblige his vassals to lay down their arms. This he required, he said, more out of concern for his majesty's person, than from any concern their obstinacy gave to himself, as he carried upon the point of his sword, and in the valour of his troops, all that was necessary to his own security. This concession highly delighted Moteczuma, because it was unexpected. He returned his acknowledgments, and sufficiently testified his satisfaction by his emotion, and the joy which spread itself upon his countenance. He resolved to oblige the general in the article of ordering his people to lay down their arms, at the same time that he entertained doubts whether they would obey his commands, and dreaded the thoughts of so mortifying a stroke to his royal dignity.

Cortez promises to evacuate Mexico.

In the midst of this conference, advice was brought to Cortez that the enemy were preparing to renew the assault, and that the garrison was under arms. He broke off immediately; but before he could join the troops, the Mexicans had pushed him with such impetuosity, that they gained the foot of the ramparts, in despite of the utmost endeavours of the Spaniards, and the briskest fire from the artillery and musquetry. Their bows and slings were plied by the troops in the rear, to beat off the Spaniards from the ramparts, and make way for the vanguard to scale the works, and push the assault. In some places they got footing within the walls; but were driven back by Cortez, who came up with a reserve body of soldiers. Moteczuma thought this a seasonable opportunity of acquitting himself of the promise made to Cortez. He called for his royal robes and crown, and with a numerous attendance ascended the terrace fronting the great avenue, after a herald had notified with a loud voice to the Mexican army, that the great Moteczuma had condescended to shew himself to his people, to inquire into their grievances, and to redress them if they were reasonable. On repeating his name the tumult immediately subsided, every arm fell, and every tongue was silent: all were motionless and still, as if they were afraid to breathe in the presence of their sovereign; and no sooner did Moteczuma appear, than many bent the knee, and great numbers prostrated themselves on the ground, from the habit of paying him the adoration due to the Divinity. He cast his eyes over the whole multitude, and then fixing them upon some of the nobility, he called them by their names to draw nearer, and honoured them with the title of friends and kinsmen. His speech began with acknowledgment for the affection they expressed by this endeavour to procure his liberty. He was far, he declared, from considering their zeal as a crime, although it was injudiciously conducted. They were wrong in believing that any violence or constraint was offered to his will; his residence among the Spaniards was altogether voluntary; but on any event their proceedings ought to have been directed by his orders. He told them, however, that he would not recriminate, because he was sensible of their good intentions; but as the cause was now removed, and he had given orders for the Spaniards to depart from his court immediately, and entirely evacuate his country, he hoped they would set the example of obedience to the strangers, lay down their arms, cease all tumults, come to his court, and receive ample testimony of his gratitude, clemency, and pardon. When he finished his harangue, no one had the courage to reply. All were astonished to find the emperor overflowing with kindness, where they expected the chastisement of his indignation; others wept to see the same prince, who used to command like a god, suing with the servility of the most abject of his slaves. But this suspension was in a few minutes succeeded by violent commotions, and the storm seemed to redouble by the short remission. Fear was suddenly converted into fury, and profound respect into the most insolent contempt. Some of them called aloud that he ought to resign the sceptre and diadem for the distaff and spindle; and their injurious language, and opprobrious expressions, were succeeded by loud shouts, and then by a general discharge of arrows. Two Spanish soldiers, who stood near the emperor, endeavoured to protect him with their shields, but all their care could not prevent his being hit by a stone in the temple, which fractured his skull, and laid him speechless on the ground; upon which event the whole army fled in the utmost confusion, as if they imagined the vengeance of heaven must pursue them for the terrible sacrilege of laying violent hands on their sovereign. Cortez, greatly chagrined at the unfortunate accident, ordered the emperor to be immediately carried to his apartment, and his wounds to be dressed; but Moteczuma no sooner recovered his speech and senses, than he refused all assistance, and grew so impatient with resentment, that it was found necessary to confine his arms, for he tore away with fury every application made to his wounds, and died of grief and indignation rather than the consequences of his wound, about three days after.

It is affirmed that Cortez used his utmost endeavours to prevail upon Moteczuma to embrace christianity, as he lay on his death-bed; he joined intreaties to persuasion, but without effect; the emperor would hearken only to the dictates of revenge, and he yielded up his last breath with impious imprecations upon his own subjects. Thus ended Moteczuma, a prince of great penetration, subtilty, and valour, who wanted nothing but favourable circumstances and opportunity to display all the qualities of a monarch. His genius was martial, his understanding solid, his parts quick, and his intellects clear, refined, and manly, for an untutored barbarian. In person he had won nine glorious battles in the open plain, and by dint of cunning and valour he raised himself to the first dignity in the empire. He was naturally liberal, just, and temperate; but intoxicated with his elevation, and poisoned with the luxury of despotism, he became haughty, cruel, severe, lascivious, and oppressive. Every beauty in his dominions were sacrificed to his lust, his justice degenerated into rigour, his liberality to oppression, and his magnificence into profusion. His gifts of generosity were supported by tyranny, his favourites were regarded as the scourges of the people; in a word, his virtues were chiefly exerted in a private, his vices in a public capacity. Had he never ascended the throne, he might have died beloved, respected, and judged worthy of the royal diadem.

THE Spaniards in general lamented the unfortunate death of this prince, whose liberality and munificence they had so frequently experienced; but Cortez was chiefly affected, both on account of his personal regard, and because he foresaw all the consequences, with respect to his present situation. The greater part of his designs were founded on the voluntary subjection of Moteczuma; this prospect now vanished, and he found it necessary to form an intire new plan, the issue of which appeared extremely precarious, as it was wholly built on the suspicion that he should be able to subdue the Mexicans, on the arrival of succours from Spain; and yet the success of his application to the court was yet doubtful. Immediately he ordered the royal corpse to be carried into the city by several persons of the greatest distinction, among whom were included the priests who had been taken prisoners, all of them witnesses that Moteczuma fell by the hands of his own people. They had orders to acquaint the princes at the head of the faction, in his name, that he had sent the body of their late sovereign, murdered by their rebellious practices, which enormous crime gave fresh right to the justice of his vengeance; that, before his death, Moteczuma had requested him, with the most pressing instances, to revenge his death, and to chastise their wicked rebellion; but that as he regarded their insurrection as the effect of popular fury and ignorance, uncoun tenanced by the nobility, he once more offered peace, that the innocent might not be involved in the punishment of the guilty: that he was ready to come to any reasonable agreement; but if they rejected his proposal, and hesitated about the repentance of their enormous crime, they must expect to be treated with the utmost rigour of his arms. He would lay waste and destroy their city, and teach them the difference between hostilities merely defensive, and a declaration of war in defence of justice, and for the chastisement of cruelty, and the sacrilegious murder of their lawful monarch.

THE body of Moteczuma was no sooner observed by the Mexicans, than they approached it with all the appearance of horror, mingled with reverence, as was observed from the walls. They threw down their arms, quitted their posts, and began a lamentable yell, which soon diffused over the whole city, and made it one scene of weeping and lamentation. For the whole night these expressions of grief continued; but they yielded in the morning to the tumultuous joy of seeing the throne occupied by a new emperor, whom they had elected; yet still they paid the due respect to the remains of their late sovereign. De Solis takes pains to vindicate the humanity of the Indians from the aspersions of some Spanish writers, who alledge, that after the first transports of grief and surprize were subsided, they dragged the body round the streets, mangled it in the most barbarous manner, and even extended their fury to his wives and children. On the contrary, one author affirms, that they bewailed the death of their prince as an unfortunate accident, in which their intention had no share; that they conveyed the corpse with great solemnity, and funeral pomp, to the mountain of Cbapuiltapaque, where it was usual to pay the last duties, and preserve the ashes of their kings; and that they renewed their lamentations with such appearance of sincerity, as left no doubts of their veneration for the memory of their sovereign.

It was a strong presumption of the deep impression which Moteczuma's accident made on the minds of his people, that, for the three days of his illness, they had suspended all hostilities, in which inactive state they continued till his last obsequies were performed. Herrera, indeed,

- a indeed, speaks as if they never ceased their attacks upon the Spanish quarters, until Cortez began his retreat; but we prefer the authority of De Solis, who is much more accurate, distinct, and probable, in his relation. According to this writer, all that space of time was employed in lamentations, the election of a new sovereign (who proved to be Quilavaca, prince of Iztapalapa) the funeral of the deceased prince, and in making preparations for renewing their assaults upon the Spanish quarters. Early in the morning succeeding the burial of Motexuma, the streets round the Spanish quarters were filled with soldiers, and the towers of a great temple adjacent strongly garrisoned, as from this situation they could annoy the Spaniards in the palace. The stair leading to this temple consisted of a hundred steps, by the sides of which some large towers were erected. Here five hundred Mexican noblemen placed themselves, with a resolution to maintain their ground against all the power of Cortez; for which purpose they had laid in provisions for a siege, knowing it was of the utmost importance to the Spaniards to dislodge them. In this they discovered their penetration and military knowledge. It was the first attempt of Cortez, who committed the attack upon the temple to Escobar, at the head of near two hundred Spaniards. This officer began the assault with great fury, and maintained it with obstinacy; but he was repeatedly repulsed by the Mexicans, who tumbled down large stones, and large beams, from the top of the temple, upon the heads of the Spaniards, at the same time that they covered them with showers of darts and arrows. Escobar was retreating in confusion, when he was reinforced by some Spaniards and Tlascalans, sent from the reserve corps by Cortez, who consulting only the impulses of an ardent courage, ordered a shield to be tied to his wounded arm, and advanced, sword-in-hand, amongst the thickest of the enemy, upon the stairs of the temple, was followed and well supported by his soldiers, animated by his example, and so fortunate that he gained the last stair, the rails of the upper court, and at last the temple, after having cut the bulk of the garrison in pieces. Upon this occasion it was that the attempt was made by two Mexicans to throw themselves with Cortez, from the highest part of the temple upon the pavement; an act of gallantry, and patriot spirit, not to be surpassed in history. The most important consequence flowing from the reduction of this body of obstinate troops, was the seasonable acquisition of provision it brought to the Spaniards. The garrison had provided for a long siege, and Cortez now ordered all necessaries of life to be transported to the palace, as he could not divide his little army by garrisoning the temple. This business he committed to the Tlascalans, and with his Spanish soldiers hastened to the street of Tacuba, where he perceived the rest of the army was hotly engaged. The cavalry broke through the multitude, crippling, wounding, slaying, trampling down every thing, never losing a stroke, or forgetting their own defence; and Escobar's infantry found it no difficult matter to complete the defeat; but Cortez, in the heat of action, engaged himself so far, that it being impossible to retreat, he directed his way to another street, where he hoped he should meet with less resistance, and seasonably fell in with a confused body of Indians, who were dragging along his friend the secretary Duero. Cortez immediately charged this troop with such impetuosity, that he gave his friend an opportunity of disengaging himself, and making use of a poignard, which the Indians had overlooked in disarming him, with which he made way with terrible slaughter, to his horse and lance, and then joining Cortez, the two friends passed the street on a full gallop, through multitudes of the enemy, until they joined their own forces; an action which Cortez always mentioned, as one of the most fortunate and desperate of his life. By this time the enemy were flying before the Spaniards in every street, but it was impossible to pursue the victory without deserting their quarters. Cortez ordered a retreat to be sounded, and hoped he had by this instance of superior ability and courage, at least intimidated the Mexicans from renewing the attack suddenly, especially as the slaughter was prodigious; their houses, temples, and other edifices were burnt to the ground, and the loss on the side of the Spaniards wholly consisting of a few bruised and wounded, in a manner no way dangerous. It is affirmed, that so much were the Mexicans themselves astonished at the gallant assault in the temple, that all the particulars of the action were recorded in a painting, that afterwards came into the hands of the Spaniards.

The Mexicans elect a new sovereign.

They renew their attacks.

They make offers of peace.

- g NEXT day, after this engagement, the Mexicans made overtures of peace in the name of the new emperor, upon condition that the Spaniards would immediately repair to their great canoes on the coast of Zempoala, and quit the imperial dominions, threatening, in case of refusal, the utmost vengeance of an incensed people; and saying, that as they had now fully discovered that the Spaniards were not immortal, they were obstinately determined to effect their destruction, though the death of every Spaniard should cost them the lives of thousands, after which there would still remain a sufficient number to celebrate the victory. These proposals gave satisfaction; but Cortez resolving to shew that he was not to be intimidated into concession, replied, that he was so well acquainted with the superior valour of his troops, as to make no doubts about his being able to destroy not only the city of Mexico, but the whole empire, with his present force; yet moved with the calamities calamities the Mexicans had already suffered, through their obstinacy, he was determined to depart, his business there being ended with the death of Moteczuma, where friendship and liberality had detained him beyond either expectation or inclination; and that he would execute this design, as soon as the necessary preliminary articles were settled, and the proper disposition made for his march, and accommodation on the road. However, as the Mexicans made their proposals with an insidious view, they soon came to nothing. Cortez discovered, that their intention was to block him up in his quarters, and starve him into submission; a new method of carrying on war in Mexico, but the best contrived to answer the purpose, as the Spaniards were, at this time, but ill supplied with provision, and no way prepared to stand a siege or blockade. The out-guards discovered, that the enemy kept at a greater distance than ordinary, were ever diligent and circumspect, and eagerly employed in digging trenches, and erecting works for the defence of the passes over the canals. It was likewise observed, they were cutting down the bridges on the great causeway, and all communication with the road leading to Tlascala; a proceeding which fully discovered their designs, the necessity, and, at the same time, the danger of a retreat.

CORTÉZ now assembled a council of war, in which it was maturely deliberated, whether an immediate departure from Mexico was not expedient in the present situation of affairs, and what were the most probable means of accomplishing this measure with success? The first point debated was, whether they should march out of Mexico by night, or at mid-day, and in the face of the enemy. They were divided in opinion, and probable arguments were offered in defence of both sides of the question; but a majority of votes appeared in favour of the first of these measures: it was accordingly resolved the retreat should begin that very same night, before the enemy should have finished all the works intended to obstruct their passage. Cortez, whose mind was provident as his heart was intrepid, had ordered a bridge of beams and planks to be made, which was now finished, and might be carried on the shoulders of forty men. This was intended to be laid over the pass of the causeway, and was constructed in a manner capable of supporting the weight of all the horse and artillery. He would have made two more bridges for the other openings; but as the men insisted upon their immediate departure, influenced by the prediction of one Botello, a supposed astrologer among the troops, there was no leisure to execute the business; it was, therefore, proposed, that the same bridge should be removed from one opening to another, without reflecting on the opposition which might be made by the enemy, and the difficulty which must necessarily attend the attempt. To cover his design, Cortez thought it convenient to keep up the appearance of renewing the negotiation; for which purpose he sent another messenger to the city, to demand an answer to his last proposals, with power of making certain alterations, if required; and the intermediate time he employed in disposing every thing for his journey. Their instructions were given to the officers, and great circumspection used to provide against all contingencies. The van was composed of two hundred Spaniards, supported by a choice body of Tlascalans, and twenty horse, under the conduct of Sandoval, and some of the best officers. The rear-guard, consisting also of a just mixture of horse and foot, was entrusted to Alvarado, and Juan Velazquez. In the centre were placed the three sons of Moteczuma, the Mexican nobility taken prisoners, the artillery, baggage, and the rest of the army, except a choice corps reserved under Cortez, in person, to relieve those who were pressed, and act agreeable to circumstances. He then caused all the gold and jewels to be brought into his apartment, and after separating a fifth for the king out of the most portable and convenient, he determined to leave the remainder, amounting to seven hundred thousand pieces of eight, a prey to the enemy, saying, that it would be shameful to employ those hands in the gratification of avarice, which ought to be left free for the defence of life and reputation. Finding the soldiers were discouraged with the thoughts of abandoning so much treasure, he said, that they were not to look upon it as lost, since his intention was speedily to renew the enterprise, in such a manner, as would infallibly secure success, and redeem their treasures with double interest; giving them, at the same time, to understand, that he would not be offended if they carried off as much gold as they could, without inconvenience; a permission of the most fatal consequence, many loading themselves with booty, in such a manner, that they were unfit for service.

At midnight the Spaniards marched silently out of their quarters, laid the bridge over the first canal, and passed over without molestation; but the intention of removing the bridge to the other canals was frustrated. The weight of the artillery and the horses forced it so deeply in the sand and stones, that it was found impossible to move it. Nor, indeed, was there leisure to execute the design. The alarm came, that the enemy were in their rear, and all immediately took to arms, and stood on their defence. The Mexicans had, with the utmost address, disposed every thing for the destruction of the Spaniards. With disssembled security they narrowly watched every motion, distributed their troops in the most convenient posts, and now began the attack, contrary to the prevailing superstition

a of the country, in the middle of the night, when they were least expected. Every side of the causeway was covered with the canoes; and Cortez, with all his men, must, in despite of their valour, have fallen a sacrifice to the resentment of those barbarians, had they continued the engagement with the same regularity and order observed in the first attack; but the discipline soon yielding to fury and impetuosity, they pressed in tumultuously. The canoes crowded upon each other, and were dashed in pieces against the causeway; and little else remained for the Spaniards, than to kill and slay this naked, disorderly multitude. Even this exhausted their strength and spirits, when a fresh attack, in front, required a farther exertion of their valour. Great numbers of Indians, impatient of delay, had flung themselves in the water, and scrambled up the causeway at some distance, where the Spaniards were to pass, formed themselves into tolerable order, and obliged Cortez to present b a double front, and renew the engagement. Actuated by despair, the Spaniards now fought with such irresistible impetuosity, that, unable to sustain the shock of the swords and fire-arms, the Indians gave way, were pursued with incredible slaughter, and forced to plunge in crowds into the water, by which several thousands perished. Herrera says, the carnage was so great, that the canal was choked up with dead bodies, where they served for a bridge on which the army passed over; but, besides the improbability of this circumstance, it is observable that the Spaniards had already passed over the first chasm in the causeway; it was, therefore, the second pass which they were now disputing; and here De Solis observes, they found a beam of sufficient breadth, which the enemy had c neglected cutting away, and upon this the soldiers passed over in files, guiding their horses through the water by the bridles.

In this manner the vanguard got over the second breach, while the rear was hard pressed by the enemy; to relieve which, Cortez returned with several officers. Immediately he ordered the artillery to be thrown in the water, and employed all his people in repulsing the assault. It was dreadful to hear the piteous lamentations of the Spaniards, breathing their last, mingled with the shouts of the Indians, and especially as the excessive darkness of the night prevented all possibility of giving succour. Many were slain, others fell into the hands of the Mexicans, and all was confusion, dread, and anguish. However, the valour of Cortez saved many lives; he pierced, with five horse, into the midst of the d enemy, and opened a path for his own men, who were in the greatest distress. Alvarado, who was on the opposite side of the breach, in the causeway, owed his life to his own agility, having, with an astonishing leap, assisted by his lance, cleared the pass, which, to this day, is distinguished by the name of Alvarado's Leap; others, who endeavoured to follow his example, plunged into the water and perished, while some of less resolution suffered themselves to be made prisoners. Extremely fortunate it was, that the remaining Spaniards, fatigued, exhausted, and dispirited with the misfortunes of their companions, met with no opposition at the last breach, over which the soldiers waded on account of the shallowness of the waters. Upon this, Cortez halted in the neighbourhood of Tacuba, to give time for those who could escape from the battle to join the army, and likewise to e refresh his people; nor was the precaution unnecessary, as several Spaniards and Tlascalans were by that means saved. Yet still the loss was very considerable. Upon mustering the troops, it appeared, that above two hundred Spaniards, a thousand Tlascalans, and forty-six horses, had either been killed or taken by the enemy; and it was afterwards known that all the prisoners were sacrificed. Besides, all the artillery, baggage, and treasure, was either lost or fallen into the hands of the Mexicans. Cortez wept with anguish, especially at the unfortunate end of some of his bravest officers, among whom was Diego Velazquez, his faithful friend, who had deserted the interest of his relation the governor, to follow the fortune of a man, whose valour he esteemed and imitated. Never did he stand so much in need of his magnanimity and resolution to temper his grief, which he no f sooner vented by a flood of tears, than, summoning up all his constancy, he animated his men, and disposed them to prosecute their march to Tacuba, where the troops were well entertained, greatly contrary to expectation.

As it may appear extraordinary, that the Mexicans should now have dropped the pursuit, and suffered the Spaniards to cross the last breach in the causeway unmolested, it may be proper to account for their conduct; although Herrera relates, that they kept up a perpetual attack quite to Tacuba^b. We find in De Solis, that among the slain were the sons of Moteczuma, detained by the Spaniards, whose bodies the Indians discovered in the morning, as they were stripping the killed and wounded. They stood amazed and confounded at the shocking spectacle of three princes of the blood, murdered by the same g hands that brought on the death of their sovereign. They beheld them with the same reverence shewn them in the life-time of their royal father. Those who first saw the a mangled bodies drew back, that others might approach, and all were silent with surprize.

When the sad news spread among the troops, they were seized with terror, not doubting but the vengeance of the gods would succeed this repetition of their sacrilege. A panic diffused through the whole, and action immediately ceased. Their resentment for the Spaniards was absorbed in grief for their own guilt, and pity for the unhappy fate of the innocent princes. An account of this melancholy event was sent by the chiefs to the new emperor; and he, forced to affect a share in the general despondency, ordered the army to halt, that the last duties might be paid to the deceased. Instead, therefore, of pursuing the Spaniards, a funeral procession was begun, by which means Cortez was allowed b time to draw off in the manner we have described, and to reach Tacuba. In this respect the circumstance proved fortunate to him, though he greatly lamented the loss of the princes out of personal regard, and because he founded part of his future hopes on their claim to the imperial diadem, and the strong faction their influence might form among the Mexicans.

Difficulty of retreat.

WHEN Cortez had refreshed his men by a short halt, he proceeded on his march before the Indians should renew their attacks. He had not marched far when several small corps of Indians were seen at a distance, as harbingers to the main army. Their numbers continually increased in proportion as they gained ground on the Spaniards; and in a little time they amounted to a considerable army, that began a sharp engagement, which obliged c Cortez to order the fire-arms and cross-bows to form a front in the rear, and keep a continual discharge to cover the rest of the forces. The horse too, sallied out, and made great slaughter; but as the enemy were continually multiplying, and there was no place of retreat, the danger appeared as great as ever, and the Spaniards grew tired of repulsing without conquering. Their strength was almost exhausted, and their spirits quite sunk, when Cortez observed a tower upon an eminence, at some distance, of which he resolved to gain possession as a convenient place of rest; but there were almost insurmountable difficulties in the execution of this scheme. He was obliged to keep a front to the enemy, and continue fighting while he ascended a steep hill. At length he overcame all obstruction, gained the tower, and here found the advantages which he expected of a defensible d retreat: a few provisions left behind by the fugitive priests, proved a high regale to the hungry Spaniards and Tlascalans, though a very small portion fell to the share of each. The Mexicans did not venture to ascend the eminence; but they surrounded it, as if with intention to blockade the tower, of which Cortez was greatly afraid, until he saw them take the road of Mexico, at the approach of night. Immediately he placed centinels to guard against surprize, ordered fires to be lighted, sent the soldiers to rest, dressed the wounded, and frequently relieved the watches, that all might enjoy an equal share of refreshment, while himself deliberated with his principal officers concerning their future proceedings.
A variety of propositions were made; but, what in the end gained universal approbation, was the general's own opinion, that they should march the same night, the space of two or three leagues, in order to gain ground upon the enemy. This resolution was put in e practice after the troops were somewhat refreshed by a short sleep of two hours. The march was continued for the whole night, amidst perpetual alarms from the surrounding peasants, who had assembled in small parties, but gave little interruption; and, by the morning, the Spaniards reached a village advantageously situated, where they met with refreshments of provision sufficient to stay the craving of appetite for that day. Here they fixed their quarters for the night, and next day pursued their journey thro' a barren, rough, and rocky country, keeping at a distance from the great road, and persevering in their march under the united calamities of fatigue, thirst, and hunger, feeding upon herbs, roots, and the flesh of one of the horses that perished. The soldiers animated each other, necessity whetted their valour, and the hope of ending all their miseries at Tlascala cheered f their spirits under the severest trials. The second day's laborious march ended at a village, where the Spaniards were received with a suspicious civility, the inhabitants not only freely giving them all the provision of which they were possessed, but also borrowing large quantities from the adjacent villages, insomuch that the half-famished soldiers began to forget all their past sufferings in the present enjoyment, without the least reflection upon the consequences of their security. In fact, this was a stratagem of the Mexicans to blind the vigilance of Cortez, which, however, they disclosed by their own eagerness and simplicity. Donna Marina heard them frequently repeat, "Go on, tyrants, to that place "where you will quickly perish;" words which some applied to the Tlascalans, imagining that some change might have happened in the affections of the republic, while Cortez g inferred that an ambuscade was laid on the way by which they must pass.

HAVING

The whole Mexican army defeated in the valley of Otumba.

a HAVING sufficiently recreated themselves, and recruited their exhausted strength by rest and sustenance, the Spaniards proceeded on their journey, climbing up the high mountain by which they were to descend to the valley of Otumba. Scarce had the van reached the summit, when some soldiers were dispatched to the rear, with advice to Cortez, that the enemy occupied the whole valley, and blocked up all the passes with an incredible multitude of people. This was the same army that had pursued them to the temple, reinforced by fresh troops and other commanders, and composed, as appeared, of the strength of the whole Mexican empire. It was the last effort to destroy the Spaniards, and it was determined to make sure of victory, as far as depended upon numbers. The front took up the whole breadth of the valley, and the depth reached beyond the horizon, although b beheld from an eminence. The ensigns of a great variety of nations waved in the air, and in the centre of the multitude was distinguished the captain general, supported upon the shoulders of Indians, in a rich chair, in which was erected the royal standard of Mexico, which could only be entrusted into the hands of the commander in chief. Nothing could exceed in magnificence this standard, composed of a net work of massy gold, fixed upon a solid staff of the same precious metal, and adorned with beautiful plumes of various colours. It was always surrounded by a choice body of the nobility, as upon the fortune of the standard depended victory or defeat; the loss of it essentially proving decisive, and the Mexicans never believing themselves thoroughly defeated, while they retained in their hands this emblem of their honour and valour. Such a spectacle could not fail of appearing c formidable to a handful of men already upon the brink of sinking under misfortune; but, instead of intimidating, it served only to inflame the courage of the Spaniards, who were fully persuaded that now the enemy made their last push, and that upon the issue of this affair depended their fate. Cortez examined the countenance of his soldiers, and finding them eager to engage, cried aloud, "Our case is now come to that pass, that we must "conquer or die: the cause of our God fights for us." After which he extended his front, and united the cavalry on the wings to the centre of the army, giving charge to the former to be careful of the rear and flanks. In this order he rushed upon the enemy, after a general and fortunate discharge of the fire-arms and cross-bows, which made the Mexican battalions in front reel back on the second line. The consequent disorder was happily d improved by the cavalry, who penetrated into the midst of the enemy, and bore down all before them, clearing a path for the infantry to follow. The Tlascalans imitated the Spaniards, fought with desperate fury, and with insatiable thirst after Mexican blood. The slaughter was dreadful; but, as fresh crowds supplied the place of the slain and wounded, the Spaniards must have sunk under the fatigue of unremitting fighting, had not the valour and presence of mind of the general decided the victory, and put an end to all resistance. At the head of the cavalry, he pushed his way, on a gallop, towards the royal standard, upon which he knew the issue of the battle depended, trampling under foot whole battalions; and arriving at length at the corps of nobility round the person of the captain-general, who made a furious resistance, Cortez left his companions to keep e them in employment, while he made a desperate effort, and broke quite through to the standard, closed with the Mexican general, and at one stroke of his lance tumbled him mortally wounded out of his litter. Juan de Salamanca, a private soldier, but a gentleman by birth, had bravely followed Cortez to the side of the litter, knocked down the royal standard, which he gave into the general's hands, and put the finishing stroke to the life of the Mexican commander. The consequences were just what they expected. The enemy seeing the imperial standard taken, and not doubting but their general was either slain or made prisoner, lost all courage, threw away their arms, fled for protection to the neighbouring mountains, and were pursued with all the rigour of war by the conquerors, who made terrible destruction. It is affirmed by almost all the Spanish writers, that not less than f twenty thousand Mexicans perished in the field of battle; a circumstance not more extraordinary than that an army of two hundred thousand men, inflamed by resentment and revenge, and fighting for their liberty, property, and religion, should be defeated by a body of Spaniards, not exceeding six hundred and fifty, assisted by about a thousand Tlascalans. Both would, indeed, exceed belief, were not writers unanimous in their relations, with respect to these particulars (B). Most certainly the victory obtained in the valley of Otumba was the most celebrated recorded in the conquest of Mexico, and equal to any we meet with in the annals of mankind. The booty was very great, as the Mexicans had come

(B) To render these facts more credible, the Spanish writers, Herrera and de Solis, have recourse to miracles, which easily removed the difficulty that Cortez should defeat such a numerous army, and make such dreadful carnage. They insinuate, as if St. James the apostle had likewise, on this occasion, fought on horseback for the Spaniards; but de Solis seems ashamed to lay much stress upon a vulgar notion, raised by superstition, and received by credulity.

dressed in their richest ornaments and apparel, as to a certain victory; Cortez gave it all to the soldiers, in reward of their valour, as a recompence for their sufferings, and compensation for the gold they lost in the retreat, and left at Mexico.

HAVING now gained complete possession of the field of battle, and driven the enemy to the mountains, Cortez assembled his men, who were busy in pillaging; and pursued his march, lest the enemy might have time to recover their confusion, and give him farther annoyance. He knew they would not venture again upon a pitched battle, but even their skirmishing might prove very troublesome to them, who were almost spent with fatigue. He made all possible dispatch; yet it was impossible, that day, to gain the Mexican frontier, before he passed which he could not expect perfect security. It was necessary to make allowance for the wounded, and to give them time for rest, after being exhausted with loss of blood, and continual motion and agitation for the space of six hours. The general, therefore, possessed himself of nine houses, at some distance from the field of battle, where he passed the night, not without apprehensions, and next day found the roads quite abandoned by the enemy. This day he reached the frontier of Tlascal, and finished a retreat no less memorable than that of Xenophon, with his ten thousand Greeks, had it been recorded by an eye-witness, equal in abilities to that elegant historian, and renowned general. The whole army expressed their joy and triumph by loud acclamations, and the Tlascalans threw themselves upon their faces, kissing the ground, to express the pleasure they felt in returning victorious to their native country. Here they found the first opportunity of quenching their thirst, after the toils of the battle, and succeeding march; whence they proceeded to Gualipa, a considerable town belonging to the republic. They were met on the road by the inhabitants, who received them with open arms, accommodated them in their houses, and furnished them with abundance of the best provision which the country afforded. Cortez accepted the invitation; but as he could not be certain that the republic still entertained the same friendly sentiments, he quartered the soldiers with great caution, and kept strict watch, as if in the country of an enemy.

Cortez is honourably received by the Tlascalans.

July, 1520.

FROM Gualipa the general dispatched an account to the senate of Tlascal of his retreat and success; but fame had already carried the news of his victory, without diminution of his glory. The messengers were met in the road by Magiscatzin, the blind Xicotencal, his son, and other nobility, dispatched by the senate to compliment Cortez on his return to their dominions, and extraordinary conquests. All embraced him with the most cordial friendship, except the young Xicotencal, who appeared cold and reserved in his salutations; a circumstance which at that time made no impression, though it came afterwards to be recollected. They acquainted Cortez, that the republic had assembled an army of thirty thousand men for his defence; and they offered, should this prove insufficient, to collect the whole strength of Tlascal, and her allies, to punish the traitorous Mexicans. It was extremely pleasing to Cortez to find that the republic had retained the same friendly disposition, and he expressed his acknowledgments in the warmest terms that real gratitude could dictate. He perceived, that although the Tlascalans were now sensible the Spaniards were not immortal; yet their victory at Otumba had raised them in their esteem, as the most gallant and valiant people in the universe. They invited him to take up his quarters in their city; but they willingly admitted his apology for not immediately accepting the offer, as they had determined to make vast preparations for his reception, and to celebrate his entry with the same solemnities used in the triumphal processions of their own generals. When the day arrived, which was appointed by the senate, the caziques and principal members of the republic, in their senatorial robes, accompanied by a numerous attendance, went out to meet the Spanish army. The road was covered with a multitude of people, who expressed their congratulations by loud shouts and acclamations, mingled with reproaches of the Mexicans, and the highest encomiums on the valour of the strangers. Herrera affirms, that the number of spectators amounted to two hundred thousand people; certain it is, that the concourse was very great, the whole city of Tlascal, as well as the adjacent towns and country, having poured forth their inhabitants to behold the conquerors of the whole power of Mexico. Magiscatzin insisted upon having Cortez for his guest; while the old blind Xicotencal paid the same compliment to Alvarado, whose valour, strength, and activity, had been reported to him by the auxiliary Tlascalans. The whole evening was spent in festivity and mirth, concluding in a dance, the diversion of the multitude, whose disorderly tumultuous joy finished the demonstrations of their applause. It greatly increased the esteem conceived for the Spaniards, that Cortez and his soldiers generously divided the spoils taken at the battle of Otumba among the Tlascalans; which proved the more acceptable, that they were the trophies taken from their inveterate enemies. In the midst of this intercourse of civilities, both the Spaniards and Tlascalans were plunged into despondency. Cortez was seized with an ardent fever, in consequence a of a contusion on the forehead, received in the late engagement, the perpetual fatigue he had undergone, and the unremitting vigilance with which he watched over the security of his people. The Spaniards dreaded the issue of his malady, as upon him they reposed their future fortune; and the Indians bewailed him as a hero worthy of immortality, and inferior to the gods only in that circumstance. The senate assembled all the physicians most celebrated for their knowledge in medicinal plants in Tlascala, and promised them the highest rewards if they succeeded in restoring the general's health; which they undertook with a confidence that appeared well founded; for by means of their cooling applications, and the strength of his natural constitution, a favourable crisis was produced, and Cortez was again able to appear in public, to the inexpressible joy of his own people and the b republic.

NOR was this the only accident which happened to disturb the peaceable repose of the Spaniards in Tlascala. Advice about this time arrived from Vera Cruz, that a corporal and eight Spanish soldiers sent some time since to Tlascala from the settlement, were not yet returned; and that it was reported among the Indians, they were massacred in the province of Tepeaca. It was likewise supposed, that the same misfortune had befallen forty-two wounded soldiers of Narvaez's army, who on their recovery set out in small parties to join Cortez in Mexico, which they considered as the centre of all their wishes. The general had relied upon this reinforcement, and such a piece of intelligence was of the utmost consequence, when the life of every Spaniard was invaluable. It was afterwards proved,
c that the eight soldiers had left Tlascala with the treasure, and were actually murdered in Tepeaca, which province had thrown off the allegiance promised to Cortez, about the time of their departure, either for the sake of the gold, or at the instigation of the Mexicans. There appeared a necessity for punishing this act of infidelity, and reducing the province, because it obstructed all intercourse between Vera Cruz and Mexico; and it fortunately happened, that the republic had equal cause of complaint against the Tepeacans as Cortez himself, for they had lately made an irruption into the frontiers of Tlascala. The senate, therefore, came to a resolution to chastise them, in which they desired the assistance of the Spaniards at the instant when Cortez was deliberating how he should engage the republic in his revenge. Accordingly preparations were making on both sides for an expedition
b against this province, when ambassadors from the new emperor of Mexico to the republic arrived on the frontiers, where they waited for permission to advance. This was matter of astonishment at Tlascala, which had never before been honoured with so formal an embassy. The senate was not ignorant that the purport of it was to engage the republic against the Spaniards; it was therefore debated whether the Mexicans should be received, and carried in the affirmative, with the approbation, as is reported, of the Spanish general. They entered the city with great solemnity, and were introduced into the senate with the usual formalities, where, in the name of the emperor, they made an offer of perpetual peace and friendship between the two nations, a perfect freedom of commerce and community of interests, on condition the republic would join the Mexicans against the Spaniards;
e a proposition no sooner made, than a confused murmur of disapprobation was heard over the whole assembly. Many of the members were on the point of breaking out into indecent expressions of resentment against the ambassadors, when one of the old senators stood up, and told him, that their request was contrary to justice, reason, and the constant practice of the republic. No interest could seduce the Tlascalans to violate the laws of hospitality, or perfidiously betray the voluntary friendship conceived for the Spaniards, confirmed by an exchange of obligations, and sealed by the most sacred engagements. This answer was sufficient to convince the Mexicans, that the purpose of their embassy would not answer; and, as they feared some popular commotion, they withdrew privately, and posted with all expedition to the frontiers.

The Mexicans endeavour to gain the Tlascalans from the interest of Cortez.

f THIS disappointment of the Mexicans was subject of triumph to the Spaniards, as it shewed the good disposition of the republic. Nevertheless it was soon discovered, that all the members of the senate were not equally sincere in their professions of friendship. The young Xicotencal could never forget that he had been foiled by Cortez in the military art, upon his skill in which he founded his highest reputation. He considered the superiority of the Spanish general as a real injury to himself, and watched an opportunity to gratify his revenge, which he thought offered at this juncture. In the senate he concealed his sentiments; but he represented privately to the people, that the peace offered by the Mexicans was mutually advantageous, as the emperor required no other condition than what the senate, for their own interest, ought to grant. "Should we forgive the Spaniards,"
g "said he, their evil inclinations against our religion, yet we have reason to resent their endeavours to subvert our constitution and government, by converting into a despotic monarchy this venerable republic, and reducing us under the odious domination
Mod. Hist. Vol. XIV. 3 S "nion

“ nion of an emperor ; a yoke which we have broke at the expence of our blood, and “ which it grieves us to see even on the necks of our bitterest enemies.” These sentiments he enforced with abundance of eloquence, insomuch that he gained so strong a party, as encouraged him to become more public in his declarations. The senate no sooner had intelligence of his designs, than they ordered him to be taken into custody, and immediately deliberated on his punishment. Many gave it as their opinion he deserved death, of which number was the blind Xicotencal, his venerable parent, who treated his crime as per-fidious to his friends, ungenerous to strangers, and highly dangerous to his country. All agreed that he was seditious, envious, and guilty of practices which disgraced the resolutions of the senate, and stained with dishonour the national character : however, out of respect for the father, they mitigated the punishment, by decreeing, that the criminal should be brought prisoner to the senate, reprimanded for his treachery and insolence, and deprived of his truncheon, and other employments, by the ceremony of throwing him down the stair of the tribunal. Immediately he fell into disgrace with all degrees of people, especially those who either entertained an unfeigned friendship for the Spaniards, or were attached only to the good fortune of Xicotencal. He found himself desolate and abandoned in the midst of society, and without hopes of recovering the esteem of his country, except through the intercession of the person against whom all his practices were leveled. To Cortez, however, he ventured to apply, and, by means of his influence, was again restored to his employments ; which he soon after forfeited, with his life, for a repetition of his perfidy.

WE must not omit another circumstance that occurred as a farther trial of the perseverance and courage of Cortez, just as he had surmounted the dangers planned by Xicotencal.
 The republic was making preparations to punish the hostilities committed by the Tepea- cans, and assist Cortez in his meditated revenge ; but the Spanish soldiers, especially the troops of Narvaez, very strenuously opposed a fresh expedition. Neither the arguments used to move their compassion, nor rouse their indignation against the barbarous Tepe- acans, produced any effect : the remembrance of past fatigues rendered them averse to new exploits. They sighed after repose, and their possessions in Cuba ; and strenuously insisted they should immediately be led back to Vera Cruz, in order to equip the fleet for their voyage. Cortez assembled them, and perceiving they were to be influenced only by considerations of interest or of fame, he told them, that the enemy had secured the passes in such a manner, as rendered the march to Vera Cruz impossible, except by wading through blood, and encountering the greatest difficulties and dangers ; that they must rely upon their own strength, as it was improbable the Tlascalans would lend any assistance to a retreat undertaken against their inclinations, and indeed equally contrary to the honour and interest of the Spaniards and the republic. In this situation, therefore, he advised that they would preserve the friendship of the Tlascalans, by entering cheerfully upon the expedition, as the only secure means by which their design of re-entering Vera Cruz could be accomplished ; and promised, in the strongest terms, that as soon as they had reduced the Tepeacans, all who were not willing to follow his fortune should have liberty to depart :
 but it was his duty, as their general, to keep them from running into such imminent danger, as was unavoidable, if they begun their march in the present circumstances of affairs.
 By this means he engaged them in his designs, after remonstrating to them, that it was not possible to pursue their own intentions with any degree of security ; and indeed Cortez, upon this, and divers other occasions, afforded strong instances of his perfect skill in the operations of the human mind, and the motives which generally impelled to action.

WHEN the Spanish soldiers gave their assent to his proposal, Cortez drew out eight thousand select Tlascalans, commanded by officers whose valour and fidelity he had experienced in divers engagements in Mexico ; leaving the care of assembling the main body of the republican army to Xicotencal, whose friendship he imagined he had secured by his late conduct. With this force, and four hundred and twenty Spaniards, he began his march, and halted that day at a village within the enemies frontiers, at the distance of five leagues from Tepeaca, the capital of their province. Here he took some of the peasants prisoners, and by kindness and presents prevailed upon them to carry a message to the caziques, and the principal men at Tepeaca, acquainting them, that he was now at the head of an army to revenge the death of the Spaniards, whom they had so barbarously and treacherously murdered ; but that if they would take up arms against the Mexicans, and join in alliance with the Spaniards and Tlascalans, he would pardon their heinous transgression, and receive them into his friendship ; otherwise they must expect the utmost rigours of war. The answer returned by the Tepeacans was an insolent defiance, and a menace, that they would carry all the Spaniards in chains to be sacrificed at the altars of their gods. He repeated his propositions, and received answers still more bold ; upon which he led his army into the

a the capital, fully resolved to destroy it with fire and sword. The Tepeacans, reinforced by a body of Mexicans, lay in ambush in the way; but their impatience discovering them, they were attacked with such fury as soon put them to flight, in the greatest disorder, and with great slaughter: but recovering themselves, and rallying in a manner very unusual among barbarians, they made a stand, renewed the battle with great obstinacy, and were a second time so completely defeated, that both Mexicans and Tepeacans abandoned the country, and left the whole province at the mercy of the conquerors. The inhabitants of Tepeaca were so terrified with the misfortune and retreat of the army, that they sent deputies with their submission to Cortez, requesting, that he would not wreak his vengeance upon an innocent people, misguided and forced, contrary to their own inclinations, into hostilities against the Spaniards by their leaders, who were entirely in the interest, and at the disposal of the emperor of Mexico. Upon this Cortez marched to the capital, received the homage of the people in the name of his Catholic majesty, whom he ordered to be proclaimed, pardoned their transgression, took the people under his protection, and, by his well-timed lenity, gained their affection and esteem. As his principal design, in this expedition, was to preserve a free communication between Vera Cruz and Mexico, he ordered a trench to be drawn round the city, fortified with palisadoes; and not only raised works for the defence of several passes, but erected a kind of citadel, which would be sufficient security against any sudden assault from the Mexicans. Here Cortez left a garrison of Spaniards, calling the place Segura de la Frontera, which was the second establishment in the Mexican empire. It reflects but little honour upon his humanity, that, after pardoning the townsmen, he ordered all the prisoners to be sent to Tlascala, and sold for slaves; a practice that continued until the Catholic king interposed his authority some years afterwards, and put an entire stop to a custom favouring strongly of barbarity.

Segura de la Frontera founded.

A FEW days after the victory came up Xicotencal with the main body of the Tlascalan army. The appearance of such a croud of enemies, amounting to fifty thousand men, greatly alarmed the Tepeacans, which determined Cortez to employ the troops in useful expeditions. Accordingly he divided the Tlascalans in several bodies, which he detached against certain strong towns in the province, that were held by the Mexicans. Each corps was attended with about thirty Spaniards; who had directions to use force, if persuasion would not answer the purpose, of bringing the enemy to submission. The orders were punctually executed; and though the enemy made a shew of resistance, all the towns were subdued, with very considerable loss, several thousand prisoners were brought back, and the captains enriched by the sale of the captives, and other booty.

It was about this time that the new emperor Quatlavaca resigned his last breath; upon which the people conferred the imperial diadem on the young prince Guatimozin, nephew and son-in-law to Moteczuma, as knowing him to be of an active warlike genius, and in all respects capable of supporting the regal dignity with honour. This change was, by no means, favourable to the Spaniards; as the young emperor had a capacity far beyond any of his predecessors, and great virtues, untinged with any of the vices frequent in despotic monarchs, if not inseparable from their absolute power. Guatimozin, aware of the danger arising from too unlimited an authority, and determined to guard against pride, and whatever could alienate the minds of his subjects, began with resigning into their hands a variety of privileges, of which they had been deprived in the two preceding reigns. He employed his whole time in the service of the public, encouraged the soldiers with rewards and honours, moderated the excess of veneration paid to the throne, exempted the nobility from all servile attendance, admitted them into his intimacy, and eased the people from excessive taxes and tributes. To the caziques on the frontiers he made large presents, to indemnify their extraordinary losses and expences in the war; and then detached an army of thirty thousand men to support them against the Spaniards. Cortez had notice of these changes in Mexico; but instead of discouraging him from his enterprise of again attempting the conquest of this vast empire, it only animated him to a double exertion of his abilities. A messenger had been sent by the cazique of Guacachula, a populous city, considered by the emperor as one of the bulwarks of his dominions, acquainting him, that an army of Mexicans was arrived there, committing such violences, as obliged the people to have recourse to the protection of the Spaniards. The cazique mentioned, as a kind of claim to the assistance of Cortez, that he was one of the nobility who promised obedience to the king of Spain in the assembly held by Moteczuma; and that he had ever since favoured the cause of the Spaniards, for which he was now punished with the utmost rigour. The messenger said, that in the city were twenty thousand Mexican troops, and about ten thousand more quartered in the surrounding district; but he gave such demonstrations of the facility with which they might be attacked and defeated, and such proofs of the cazique's sincerity, that Cortez determined upon the enterprise. That very day he drew together three hundred

Guacachula.

Spanish foot, thirteen horse, and about thirty thousand Tlascalans, whom he dispatched under Christopher d'Olid to Guacachula. D'Olid marched with great expedition to within six leagues of the city, where the mutinous spirit of some of the Spanish soldiers obliged him to halt. It had been reported, that the emperor of Mexico was in full march, at the head of his whole army, to Guacachula; and this produced such an effect upon the minds of the soldiers, who were tired with fruitless victories, that they refused to proceed. This, with some other concurring circumstances, obliged Cortez to join the army, and take upon himself the command. Every thing put on a new face at his appearance, all discontents and jealousies were banished, and the soldiers, to a man, declared they would die by the side of their general; but that they could not pay the same regard to Christopher d'Olid, who abused his authority, and treated them with rigour. Immediately he began his march, and gave notice to the cazique of Guacachula of his approach with a numerous army. The Mexicans were posted on the further side of the city; but on the first advice of the Spaniards, they drew out in order of battle, and advanced beyond the city, to dispute a pass. The battle began and raged with great obstinacy, and doubtful success, when the cazique of Guacachula seized this opportunity of proving the sincerity of his professions, fell upon the rear of the Mexican army, and at the same time shot his darts and arrows from the walls with such alacrity, as soon determined the victory in favour of Cortez. In less than half an hour the Mexican army was entirely defeated, upwards of half the number being slain in the field of battle, or taken prisoners; while the loss on the side of the confederates was trifling.

This, and his preceding victories, gave such reputation to Cortez, that a multitude of Indians submitted, and several caziques joined him with forces; insomuch, that his whole army now exceeded a hundred thousand men, besides the Tamenes, or persons appointed to carry the provisions and baggage. With this force he laid siege to the strong city of Guacachula, the cazique, and chief inhabitants of which served in his army, while the place was held by ten thousand desperate Mexicans, who drove forth all the suspected citizens, with intention to defend the place to the last drop of their blood. The situation was strong by nature, and fortified with all that the limited knowledge of the Indians, in the art of war, could bestow. Before it flowed a deep river, which Cortez had to pass, and here the Mexicans made a stand; but those obstructions appeared nothing to troops who were accustomed to conquer difficulties. Christopher d'Olid, with the van, threw himself into the river, gained the opposite shore, under showers of darts and arrows, and soon drove the enemy from their posts to the city, after he had received a wound in the thigh, and had his horse killed under him. It was expected the enemy would have vigorously defended the city, and the height of the walls made d'Olid apprehensive that the assault would be bloody; but such was the panic infused in the Mexican garrison, upon the flight of the party appointed to dispute the passage of the river, that they immediately gave all up for lost, and left Guacachula as the reward of the conquerors, without striking a blow. By this time Cortez came up with the main body, and suspecting a stratagem, detached a body of Tlascalans to examine the town, and pursue the enemy; when finding that the place was entirely forsaken, he took possession, and published a general pardon to all who had taken arms for the Mexicans, if they would return to their habitations. The same conduct he observed in a variety of other expeditions, by which means he reduced a great number of towns and provinces under the obedience of his Catholic majesty (A).

The small-pox appears in Mexico.

It was about this time that the small-pox committed dreadful ravages among the Indians, and raged with extraordinary fury in Tlascala, where it carried off the good Magiscatzin, the firm and faithful ally of the Spaniards. The Indians regarding it as a scrophulous disorder, thought to cure it by bathing; they opened the pustules, plunged into the water, and generally perished a few hours after, until the Spaniards taught them the European practice, from which time the disease became less fatal. All their care could not, however, save the valuable life of Magiscatzin, who is reported to have died a sincere convert to Christianity, the first proselyte of distinction made since the arrival of Cortez in Mexico. The death of a nobleman, who had contributed so powerfully to establish him in the friendship of the republic, was a severe blow to Cortez; but it was in some measure compensated by a fortunate accident which occurred extremely seasonably to moderate his affliction. At this juncture Pedro de Barba arrived at St. Juan de Ulva, with a small ship, thirteen soldiers, two horses, with provision and ammunition to reinforce the army under Narvaez; who was supposed, by this time, to be in possession of the bulk of the conquests made by dents.

(A) Antonio de Solis demonstrates, from the journal of del Castillo, who served in the army, affirms the contrary; but it is to be observed, that Castille was at this time at Seguro de la Frontera (1).

- a Cortez. This was the same person who had been of service to Cortez at the Havannah, in enabling him to escape the snares laid by Velazquez. The ship was no sooner discovered by Cavallero, who commanded on the coast, than he sent out a boat to welcome the strangers, and found their intentions, drawing them on shore by an artifice, excusable enough in the circumstances of Cortez's affairs. Perceiving that Barba's design was to reinforce Narvaez, he told him, that this general was not only in health, but in high prosperity, Cortez having taken refuge in the mountains. By this means he got Barba and all his men in his power, and sent them to Segura de la Frontera; where they were so kindly treated by Cortez, that, after being undeceived, the commander and soldiers entered cheerfully into his service. A few days after Cavallero made another acquisition of eight Spanish soldiers, sent to reinforce
- b Narvaez, by a singular stratagem, all of whom followed the example of the former party. These succours, of men and ammunition, were of the utmost importance at this juncture; but still there were great difficulties attending the prosecution of the design formed of invading Mexico a second time. The almost total want of powder rendered the fire-arms useless, and there appeared no remedy, until it was recollected, that Diego d'Ordaz had discovered abundance of fine sulphur in the volcano, which he had the curiosity to examine in the burning mountain of Popocatepec. What was then deemed a rash and foolish inquisitiveness, turned out now highly to the advantage of the expedition. A party was dispatched for a sufficient quantity of sulphur; of which, and other ingredients, a powder was composed, which well enough answered the purpose, without the assistance, as we are
- c told, of nitre or saltpetre. To this fortunate discovery was added another circumstance of peculiar advantage, especially as the soldiers of Narvaez insisted upon the general's promise of leave to return to Cuba, as soon as the expedition against Tepeaca should be finished; a promise which he now executed punctiliously, providing shipping for the malcontents, among whom was the secretary Andres de Duero, who had always professed the strongest friendship for Cortez. As his little army of Spaniards was now diminished by the loss of forty able bodied soldiers, it was a peculiar providence, that captain Camargo should arrive so opportunely upon the coast to repair the loss deemed irreparable. The reader may remember, that Francisco de Guray, governor of Jamaica, had, soon after the arrival of Cortez on the coast of Zempoala, fitted out a small armament, to establish a colony in
- d the province of Panuca; a design that was frustrated by the diligence of the Spanish general. The same enterprise was resumed with a stronger force; but it proved equally unfortunate. Camargo had scarce debarked his forces in the river Panuca, when he was vigorously attacked by the natives, defeated, and forced to embark with all expedition, being pushed down the river by a multitude of canoes, filled with armed Indians. At sea the ships were separated, and after encountering many difficulties, they all arrived, much about the same time, without knowing each others intentions, at Vera Cruz, where they resolved to enlist with Cortez, as the surest prospect of making their fortunes. The vessel commanded by Camargo in person, had on board sixty soldiers; another, under the conduct of Miguel Diaz de Auz carried fifty men and seven horses; and the third had
- e forty soldiers and ten horses on board, with large store of arms and provisions. All immediately repaired to Tlascala, and thus brought Cortez a seasonable and unexpected reinforcement, just as he was greatly embarrassed with the loss sustained by the departure of Duero and the soldiers of Narvaez. Such were the extraordinary and peculiar events that supported Cortez in the prosecution of his arduous undertaking.

In which Cortez invades Mexico a second time, is defeated by the Mexicans, lays siege to Mexico, and reduces that capital, and the rest of the empire.

Cortez resumes the conquest of Mexico.

THE reinforcements mentioned in the preceding section now enabled Cortez to resume his enterprize of conquering Mexico with some prospect of success. Besides a considerable body of Spaniards, he was at the head of a numerous army of Tlascalans, and other nations, all declared enemies to the monarchical government of the Mexicans, and strenuous in procuring or defending their liberty. The passage of the lake, indeed, presented a formidable obstruction; which, however, yielded to the good fortune inseparable from Cortez. There was no depending upon portable bridges after the late fatal experiment; the general, therefore, proposed building a number of small vessels, which should not only be able to resist all the efforts of the Mexican canoes, but also to transport his troops over the lake, without trusting to the causeway. These he proposed building at Tlascala, and transporting in pieces, on the shoulders of Indians, for fourteen leagues over the mountains of Tlascala, to a river that discharged itself into the lake of Mexico. The task was arduous; he communicated the design to his ship-builder Martin Lopez; and that ingenious mechanic agreed to the possibility of the enterprize, and undertook to carry it into execution. Immediately a body of Indians was set to work to cut down wood, while another party was dispatched to Vera Cruz, for the iron work, rigging, and materials belonging to Narvaez's squadron.

He transmits an account of all his transactions to the court.

IN the mean time he thought it necessary to transmit to court an account of his actions, and to enforce the solicitations made the preceding year by the captains Portocarrero and Montejo, of whose success he had yet received no information. Here he gave, in a letter to the emperor Charles V. king of Spain, a faithful recital of all his adventures, prosperous and adverse, from the time he first quitted Zempoala, until he was forced to evacuate the capital of the empire. He informed his imperial majesty of his present condition and designs, and craved succours for the expedition, as well as speedy justice against the unfair proceedings of Velazquez, governor of Cuba. He told his majesty, that several Indians of consideration had submitted to be baptized, represented the necessity of sending some ecclesiastics to assist father Almedo in the pious task of converting the Indians, as the surest method of attaching them to the interest of Spain, and enforcing their obedience. Alonzo Mendoza, and according to de Solis, Diego de Ordaz, were dispatched with this letter, with strict injunctions, that before they revealed their commission, or made any declarations that they came from him, to find out his father, and the agents sent the year before; and jointly to push their applications, as circumstances should require. With this letter was also remitted a present of gold and jewels, to which the soldiers voluntarily contributed their share of the treasure left at Tlascala, when they first marched to Mexico, and of the booty acquired at Tepeaca and Guacachula. A ship was equipped with all dispatch at Vera Cruz, to carry the commissioners to Europe; and Cortez, that he might omit nothing which could promote his designs, applied to the royal audience of St. Domingo for succours, because this tribunal had always favoured his expedition, and used the utmost endeavours to defeat the practices of Velazquez. Here, however, he was disappointed; the audience expressed all possible respect for his person, promised to support his applications to the emperor, but excused themselves with respect to the succours required, under pretence of inability.

Fruit of his negotiation in Spain.

To prevent interrupting the chain of our narrative, it may be proper to take a view of the issue of the solicitations made to the court of Spain, although the relation be somewhat premature. Portocarrero and Montejo, seconded by Martin Cortez, father to the general, had paid long and fruitless attendance upon the Spanish ministry. The intricate and unsettled state of the kingdom at that period employed the whole attention of the court upon matters more immediately interesting, and, indeed, the strong faction formed by the friends of Velazquez, at the head of which was the bishop of Burgos, threw almost insurmountable obstructions in their way. At length, by dint of perseverance, the commissioners obtained the honour of an audience of the emperor, who informed himself exactly of the transactions in New Spain, and from thence conceived a high opinion of the merit of Cortez, and the utility of his project. However, the variety of business in which his imperial majesty was engaged, prevented his entering deeply into the dispute between Cortez and Velazquez; so that on his departure for the Netherlands, he was obliged to recommend the affair to the cardinal Adriano, governor of Spain, in his absence. The cardinal entertained the same favourable sentiments with the king his master, of the merit of Cortez; but a but as all the informations relative to the affair must pass through the council of the Indies, of which the bishop of Burgos was president, he found himself embarrassed how to proceed. He could easily perceive that the strongest prejudice against Cortez reigned in the council; but to come to a decisive resolution, it was necessary to be acquainted with the naked facts, divested of disguise and partiality. Other affairs, in the mean while, occurred, to divert the attention of the minister; so that Martin Cortez and the commissioners, tired out with attendance, withdrew, disappointed, from court, with a resolution to wait the emperor's return. In this situation were the affairs of Cortez when the new commissioners, Ordaz and Mendoza, arrived at Seville. The instructions given them by the general appeared now to be necessary; for they no sooner touched land, than they were

b informed of an order, issued out by the bishop of Burgos and the council of the Indies, to imprison all persons coming from New Spain, and to seize upon all the gold and presents they should bring, whether on the account of Cortez, or by way of commission. Immediately they retired privately to Medellin, where they learnt that Martin Cortez and the other commissioners resided, saving only their letters and dispatches, and leaving their treasure in the hands of the officers under the direction of the council of the Indies. Here it was resolved among them to continue in the most private retirement, until the affairs of the kingdom should assume a more favourable aspect, and the emperor either return, or the cardinal-minister be more at leisure to examine their dispatches. The first of these wished-for events soon happened. The emperor returned, and his presence instantly restored the c public tranquility. Martin Cortez, therefore, judging that now was the season for application, set out for court with the four commissioners; where, after some delay, they had a long audience of the cardinal regent. They gave the minister a succinct relation of the progress made in the conquest of Mexico, referring to the letters of Cortez for particulars: they acquainted him with the orders for seizing them issued by the bishop of Burgos, and the fate of the presents they had brought for the emperor. They set forth the reasons they had to distrust the president and council of the Indies; desiring liberty to except against the bishop of Burgos as a judge in an affair in which he had made himself a party, and offered to support their exception with sufficient arguments, or to suffer the penalty of their irreverence for so high a personage. The cardinal's answer was favourable. He told d Martin Cortez, and the commissioners, that they might take their remedy against the bishop at law, and that he would protect them against all violence in the course of the process. With this encouragement they entered their exception against the president of the council in his own court; and supported it with such irrefragable arguments, that the council did not presume to alter the course of justice. After a full hearing, the bishop was absolutely prohibited from interfering in the dispute between Hernan Cortez and Velaquez, his orders were revoked, the embargo at Seville was taken off, and the importance of the expedition to Mexico was set in its true light; that of being honourable and beneficial to the nation. This decree received the approbation of the cardinal regent and council of state; and so zealous was the former in the cause of Cortez, that, upon his exaltation to the papal dig-e nity, he laboured to remove all impediments to a conquest, which was to open a free passage for the lights of Christianity to shine in countries hitherto involved in the obscurity and darkness of superstition and the grossest idolatry.

THE accusation of the bishop of Burgos was finally confirmed by the emperor in person, after he had given audience to the agents of Cortez and Velaquez; and commissaries were also appointed to decide the point in controversy. Their judgment was, after closely examining the facts alledged on both sides, "That Velaquez had no right to claim to himself
" the honour or advantages resulting from the conquest of New Spain, without a better
" title than that of having expended some money in the preparations for that enterprise, " and nominating Cortez for commander. That he could only have an action at law for " the money expended out of his own estate to equip the armament sent upon this expedif tion, and not for any of the effects belonging to the king in his government. That the " nomination of Cortez afforded him no pretence, either to the glory or profit of the ex" pedition, as he not only granted that commission without the authority of the ministers " of the royal audience, whose orders he should have received, but likewise revoked it,
" and thereby left Cortez at liberty to act as he should think most advantageous to the pub" lic interest, with the troops, which, for the most part, he had raised at his own ex" pence." The commissaries very prudently winked at the irregularities in the beginning of this enterprise, from a just consideration of its importance, and regard for the extraordinary merit of the general, who had prosecuted it with unparalleled vigour and alacrity.
g They even censured Velaquez as a person who had shewn an ungovernable ambition, and expressed a rancour and malignity extremely prejudicial to the public service. This sentence was laid before the emperor, and confirmed. Cortez was, besides, declared to be a faithful

ful minister and good subject ; his officers and soldiers were honoured with similar applauses ; perpetual silence on the subject of any pretensions to the conquest of Mexico was imposed on Velaquez ; and thus the affair terminated, and dispatches to that purpose were immediately sent away to the Indies, with orders to the royal audience at St. Domingo to assist Cortez with all their power. A letter from the emperor was sent to Cortez, not only approving his past conduct, but likewise his present design and dispositions for the reduction of Mexico ; and the letter concluded with the strongest assurances, not only of the imperial favour, but of the most substantial proofs of acknowledgment for such important and eminent services.

Cortez receives a supply.

He reviews his army, and issues orders to be observed in the march.

WHILE this affair was terminating in Spain, Cortez was preparing to march, with his whole army, into the heart of Mexico. Just as he was on the point of setting out, he had the good fortune to receive a supply of arms and ammunition from Vera Cruz ; a merchant vessel from the Canaries having arrived there, freighted with implements of war, which were designed to be sold to the troops engaged in this conquest. He could not wait for the finishing of the brigantines, as the troops of the country flocked in to him in such crowds, that he feared some bad consequences from their inaction. In a council of war, it was resolved to march directly to Tezeuco, and at all events to gain possession of that city, which, from its situation, would afford a good retreat, and likewise facilitate the means of procuring reinforcements. Next day succeeding this resolution, Cortez mustered his Spanish troops, and found they amounted to five hundred foot and forty horse, with nine pieces of artillery, brought on shore from the vessels last arrived on the coast. Xicotencal, general of the Tlascalans, followed his example, and passed his troops in review before the Spaniards. It is reported they amounted to sixty thousand men. Besides these, Cortez had a great number of other auxiliary troops, brought in by the neighbouring caziques ; inso-much, that, at the siege of Mexico, his army amounted to two hundred thousand fighting men. He began with publishing certain regulations to be observed, under pain of death, by all the soldiers. Among these were the following : That no man should presume to draw his sword against another, either upon his march, or in quarters. That no Spaniard should abuse a confederate Indian, either in word or action. That no indecencies or violence should be offered to a woman, even though she should happen to be a captive. That no soldier should straggle from the army, or go without leave, and a sufficient party, in quest of plunder : and, lastly, it was enjoined, under pain of death, that the soldiers should not game away their arms and horses, in which particular their discipline had hitherto been too remiss. The interpreters, Donna Marina and Aguilar, repeated the same orders to the Indian chiefs, in the presence of Cortez, and desired they might be frequently published at the head of the Indian army. To these regulations the general added a short exhortation, which was received with the acclamations of the soldiers, both Spaniards and Indians ; the latter echoing the shouts of the former. In course of his march, Cortez encountered some difficulties, arising from the nature of the country, the prodigious number of his troops, and the wiles and stratagems of the Mexicans ; but he happily surmounted them, without any considerable loss. He ascended a steep mountain, all the passes of which the enemy had blocked up by trees cut down, and laid across, and sharp stakes fixed in the ground, to wound and incommode the cavalry. Cortez ordered two thousand Tlascalans to the van, to clear away all impediments ; and they executed their orders with so much alacrity, that the army soon gained the summit of the mountain, from whence they could discover the lake of Mexico. Having advanced a few leagues, the Mexican army was seen drawn up in order of battle, in a large plain, where they seemed determined to make a stand, although they had taken the necessary precautions for a retreat. All rejoiced at the opportunity of coming so early to action ; but the transport of the Tlascalans rose to a kind of fury, which Cortez, and his captains, could hardly restrain within the bounds of order and discipline ; but the enemy seeing the Spaniards attended by so numerous an army, dropt their intentions of disputing the passage of the valley, and began a precipitate retreat. Cortez regarded this as a fortunate incident ; for on his approach to the place, where the enemy had taken post, he found a deep trench, made by a brook running from the mountain, which it was difficult to pass, even without resistance from the Mexicans. Pursuing his way to Tezeuco, he was met about three leagues from the city, by messengers from the cazique, or king of that city, with proposals of peace and alliance, that appeared very suspicious ; the ambassadors were, however, dismissed with a civil answer, the confederates marched quite up to the walls, and took up their quarters for that night in the fields, keeping strict watch for fear of being surprized. Next morning it appeared that the city was deserted by the cazique and principal nobility ; but the latter soon returned to their habitations, entered into an alliance with Cortez, complained of their cazique as a monster of treachery, tyranny, and cruelty, and desired the protection of the Spaniards. Cortez was now

He advances to Tezeuco.

- a now informed that the proposals made to him were treacherous, as he suspected, and with design to lull him into security; but that the cazique finding his troops numerous, beyond expectation, yielded to his fears, and relinquished his project. He was also informed that the same Caminatzin, who had before conspired against him, and was for that reason deposed by Moteczuma, had now recovered the throne, and was countenanced by the reigning emperor, as an inveterate enemy to the Spaniards. The nobles also informed him that Caminatzin had no original right to the throne of Texcoco, to which he had made his way, before Moteczuma arrived at the imperial dignity, by killing, with his own hands, his eldest brother Nezahual, and seizing the crown, in prejudice to the right of his own nephew, son of the deceased prince. To this they added, that the lawful prince was now at their head, and requested the general's countenance. It immediately struck Cortez that this circumstance might be turned to his advantage. He went up to the prince, and after paying him the compliments due to his quality, he assembled the nobles, and recommended the lawful heir to the crown, in such strong terms, and with such assurances of protection, that they immediately deposed Caminatzin, and raised his nephew to the throne of Texcoco. Next day was appointed for the coronation of the prince; Cortez assisted at the solemnity; he placed the regal sceptre in the hands of the young monarch, and by this means acquired not only a firm ally, but the reputation of paying the strictest regard to equity. The people in a manner adored Cortez, and the king himself appeared in his presence as if he was his subject, and held his crown of his bounty; carrying his gratitude and respect for his benefactor so far, that he embraced the Christian religion, and received baptism.

Makes some alterations in the government of that city.

- EVERY thing being adjusted at Texcoco to the general's entire satisfaction, he left a body of troops in the city, and began his march for Iztapalapa, that he might deprive the Mexicans of a place which afforded shelter for their canoes, and disturbed his workmen employed in widening the canals so as to allow a passage for the vessels building at Tlascala. This city, as already observed, was situated in such a manner, that the greater part of the building was on the lake. Cortez charged himself with this expedition, taking with him three hundred Spaniards, and ten thousand Tlascalans. The young monarch of Texcoco offered to accompany him; but this Cortez refused, saying, that his presence would be useful in the city, where his authority was not yet sufficiently established. On his approach to Iztapalapa, a body of citizens, amounting to eight thousand men, advanced with great resolution beyond their walls, and began an engagement, which they supported with equal courage, though inferior in number; retreating gradually towards the city, and at last flying with a feigned appearance of confusion and disorder. Cortez suspected a stratagem, by seeing the gates left open; he therefore pursued with all imaginable caution, entered the town, found it deserted, drew up his troops in the principal square, and made dispositions, as if he expected to be attacked. It appeared, however, that the enemy had formed a different design. It was scarce dark, when the Spaniards perceived that the canals began suddenly to overflow their banks, the water rushing impetuously into the lower grounds, whence they immediately conjectured that the enemy had opened their sluices, with intention to drown that part of the city. The danger was imminent, and Cortez gave orders for retreating with all expedition, not without censuring himself for having been outwitted by a people whom he considered as barbarous. He pursued his march all night to Texcoco, and next morning perceived that he was in a manner hemmed in by a numerous army of Mexicans. Finding his people eager to engage, he led them on, and soon obliged the enemy to retire in some confusion; however, they rallied, and made three several attacks, in all which they were repulsed, with the loss of six thousand men, which determined them to drop the pursuit. By this means Cortez arrived safe at Texcoco, reserving any farther attempts on Iztapalapa to a more seasonable opportunity.

He is in great danger.

- THIS retreat was deemed inglorious by the Spaniards, who had now been accustomed to carry before them all obstructions; it did not, however, diminish their reputation among the Indians, who were daily offering their submissions. The provinces of Chalco and Otumba dispatched messengers at this time to Cortez, offering him obedience, and requesting his assistance against the Mexicans, who had just invaded the frontiers of their provinces with a numerous army, for having refused to take up arms against the Spaniards. They expressed their resolution to stand in their defence, if they were sure of protection; and Cortez thinking it advisable to raise as many enemies as possible to the imperial power, and to secure provinces which must contribute to keep open communication with Tlascala, instantly dispatched Gonzalo de Sandoval, and Francisco de Liego, with two hundred Spanish foot, fifteen horse, and a sufficient body of Tlascalans, to the assistance of his new allies. The Mexicans lay in ambush for this reinforcement, but they were defeated by the vigour and resolution of Sandoval and the Spaniards. As Sandoval approached the frontiers of the allied provinces, he found that a numerous Mexican army had occupied all the posts on the road, which it was necessary he should take; he thereupon advanced in order of battle, sustained the attack of the enemy with calm intrepidity, and then made a furious discharge of fire-arms, cross-bows, and arrows, closing immediately with the Mexicans, and breaking their ranks, obtained a complete victory with inconsiderable loss on his side, and dreadful slaughter of the enemy. It augmented the carnage, that the people of Otumba and Chalco were no sooner alarmed with the noise of fire arms, than conjecturing that the Spaniards were engaged, they sallied out upon the rear of the Mexicans, continued the pursuit with great obstinacy, slew several thousands, and took a great number of prisoners, eight of the principal of whom were brought to Sandoval, to be examined about the farther designs of the enemy. From their account it appeared, that the Mexicans, discouraged by their defeat, had entirely abandoned their project of revenge, and returned to the capital; after which Sandoval left the defence of the provinces to the inhabitants, and returned with his army to Tezeuco, after reconciling the Tlascalans and Otumbans, who had always been declared enemies. As to the Mexican nobles taken prisoners in the late action, they were presented to Cortez, who ordered them to be unbound, and embraced this opportunity to justify to his allies the war he had undertaken, by making farther advances to an accommodation. He told the prisoners, that although by the laws of war, and the example of their country, he might treat them with the utmost rigour, he nevertheless gave them life and liberty, on no other condition than that they would acquaint the emperor with his intention to demand satisfaction for the death of Moteczuma, and the unjust war made upon the Spaniards when last in Mexico. "Tell him, said Cortez, that I have an army reinforced not only by a number of invincible Spaniards, but by a variety of nations who abhor the Mexican tyranny. Tell him, that in a little time I intend to seize him in the midst of his palace, surrounded by his court, bringing in my train all the horrors of war, and resolved never to lay aside my just indignation, until I have reduced all the cities in his dominions to ashes, and washed away the memory of his name by the blood of his subjects: nevertheless, if, to avoid the impending ruin, he is desirous of listening to reasonable terms of pacification, I am ready to grant them; for the arms of my king, like the lightning of heaven, fall only where they find resistance, and are always more ready to obey the dictates of humanity, than the impulses of revenge." With this message he dismissed the prisoners, under an escort; they promised to bring back an answer, but they never returned: possibly the message was of such a nature as they durst not deliver to a prince full of vigour and courage.

Message to Guatimozin.

Vessels built at Tlascala, and transported to Mexico.

Nothing was now wanting to begin the siege of Mexico, besides the brigantines building at Tlascala, of which Cortez received advice from Martin Lopez, that gave great satisfaction to the whole army. The vessels were now ready to be transported over the mountains, and the republic had provided ten thousand men for that business, under an escort of an equal number of soldiers commanded by Chichemecal, a young nobleman of spirit and courage, who had already in his twenty-fourth year, acquired the reputation of one of the best generals in Tlascala. Lopez acquainted the general of the day he intended beginning his march, and desired he might be met by a Spanish convoy at Gualipar, not thinking it advisable to attempt a passage through the Mexican territories with Tlascalans only. On his arrival at this place he halted for the reinforcement of Spaniards, a delay which extremely displeased Chichemecal, who thought himself a match for the whole power of the Mexican empire. However, he resolved to obey the orders of Cortez, and imagined he had performed no inconsiderable exploit by this proof of his obedience. Much about the same time Cortez detached Gonzalo de Sandoval with a strong body of Spaniards and Tlascalans, this officer stopping a day at the little town of Zalepeque, to revenge the murder of some Spaniards who were going from Vera Cruz to Mexico, which he effectually performed, by obliging the inhabitants to the most abject submission. He then joined Chichemecal at Gualipar, and both arrived with the materials for the shipping, without any memorable accident at Tezeuco; only that the Tlascalan general had almost bred a mutiny in his troops, by resenting, in such high terms, his not having the van and post of honour. Immediately Lopez and his workmen set about constructing the brigantines from the materials which they had already prepared; but Cortez understanding that they could not be finished in less than twenty days, resolved not to lie unactive. It was his intention to examine all the posts which might prove useful to the projected siege of Mexico, and he entered upon this design with an expedition to Yaltocon, in which he was accompanied by Chichemecal.

The reasons which induced Cortez to chastize the inhabitants of this place were, that they had lately returned an insolent answer to the proposals which were made to them of peace, and wounded the messenger, without regard to the privileges shewn to ambassadors, even among barbarous nations. He took with him the captains Alvarado and Olid,

- a Old, two hundred Spanish infantry, twenty horse, a numerous body of Tezeucan nobility, and Chichimecal with fifteen thousand Tlascalans, to whom were joined five thousand of the republican forces, commanded by Xicotencal, who was left at Tezeuco, with the remainder of the Spanish and Tlascalan army. After marching five leagues, Cortez discovered a numerous army of the enemy, drawn up in order of battle, in the open field, at some distance from the city. Orders were given to attack them; and this was executed with such alacrity, that the enemy retreated precipitately, leaving a great number of dead and wounded on the field of battle. The confederates advanced full of confidence to carry the place at the first assault, on account of the panic which the defeat of the army must infuse into the garrison; but they soon found that the Mexicans had broke the cause-
- b ways, and rendered it impossible to pass the breach without either bridge or boats. Cortez was contriving how to fill up the chasm with earth and fascines, when an Indian of Tezeuco offered to guide the army to a ford at a little distance; a proposal that was readily embraced. Cortez, attended by the Indian guide, marched directly to the place, and ordered a party of sixty Spaniards, and a body of Tlascalans, to make the experiment, which succeeded, after an obstinate conflict with the enemy, who defended the passage with more courage than they had shewn upon the late occasion. The confederate party entered the town with the flying Mexicans, took possession, pillaged the place, set fire to several houses, and then rejoined the main army, the whole advancing to Calbatitlan, a large town, which was found deserted by the inhabitants. The large towns of Tenayuco and Izcapuzalco,
- c both upon the lake, were also forsaken by the natives; Cortez lodged a night in each, and took an exact view of their respective distances and situations. From the last of these towns the city of Tacuba, the rival of Tezeuco, was distant about half a league. It was situated upon the extremity of the causeway, was considered as the key to Mexico, and was therefore of the utmost importance in forming the siege of that capital. It was for this reason that Cortez resolved to view it accurately, without any design of possessing a city that could not be held conveniently, on account of its distance from the head-quarters of Tezeuco. With this purpose he marched in good order towards the city, and was encountered on the way by a numerous army of the Tacubans, who were desirous of trying their fortune in the open field with the Spaniards, the city being incapable of containing all the troops.
- d They advanced and charged with great fury, but were driven back by the fire-arms and cross-bows in the van. Afterwards they rallied, the rest of the Spaniards and Tlascalans came up, Cortez penetrated into the very center of the multitude; notwithstanding which, the Tacubans yielded the field reluctantly, after several thousand of their forces had been slain and wounded. That night the confederates remained on the field of battle, endeavouring to secure several advantageous posts in the night. Early next morning, the enemy were seen advancing, as if with intention to redeem the honour of the preceding day; but they were defeated with a facility which gave room for suspicion that some stratagem was intended. For five days Cortez remained without the walls of Tacuba, skirmishing every day with the enemy, with intention to waste the garrison by sallies, in which they
- e were constantly repulsed. The ardour of his troops determined him to attack the town contrary to his first design; and he was accordingly taking his measures, when a party was observed advancing upon the causeway. Their intention was to draw Cortez gradually upon the causeway, where it was impossible he could form his men, and then to charge him on every side from their canoes. The project succeeded beyond expectation; and all the Spaniards must have been cut off, had they not exerted an extraordinary portion of valour. Cortez no sooner pursued the enemy upon the causeway, than he saw himself attacked in front, by a numerous army, and on both sides by a multitude of canoes. Courage alone could now extricate him; he fought desperately, effected a retreat with no great loss, and repaired the consequences of his oversight, by such a degree of personal bravery,
- f as equally astonished the Spaniards and Indians. It was in this action, that Juan Volante fell, with the colours in his hand, over the causeway, was taken prisoner by the enemy, and put into a canoe, with design of being presented with his trophy to the emperor. Volante suffered himself to be carried away, pretending the utmost submission, until he found himself at a sufficient distance from the rest of the canoes, when he plunged with his colours into the water, swam ashore, and joined the rest of the Spaniards.

A variety of measures previous to the siege of Mexico.

- g WHEN Cortez returned to Tezeuco, he found himself reinforced by several Spanish soldiers, sent to his assistance by the royal audience of St. Domingo. None of the Spanish writers ascertain the number, but from the rejoicings in the confederate army it was probably considerable. About the same time messengers arrived from Chalco and Themanalco, that the Mexicans had resumed their operations against the frontier provinces. The new emperor Guatimozin was perpetually contriving means to cut off the communication of the the Spaniards with Tlascala, and prevent succours from joining them from Tina Cruz. This was a point of such consequence to Cortez, that he found himself, at all events, under the necessity of supporting these allies, to whose fidelity he owed the preservation of this essential opening. Accordingly Sandoval was dispatched with a sufficient number of Spaniards and Tlascalans, to the succour of the Chalqueses, whom, on his arrival, he found assembled in a considerable army, to oppose the Mexicans. The enemy, who were still superior in number of forces to the confederates, possessed themselves of some hollow-ways, in order to bring on an engagement, in a place where the Spanish cavalry could not act. It was necessary to drive them from this situation; and Sandoval entered upon the attack with such resolution, that he accomplished his design, though not without bloodshed, several Spaniards having been dangerously wounded, a few killed, and a great number of the confederate Indians slaughtered, but with still greater loss on the side of the Mexicans, though they had sufficient courage to rally and renew the engagement. Sandoval having overcome the difficulty of the valley, and fighting now upon equal terms, obtained a complete victory, after a conflict in which the enemy behaved with great gallantry, and a fury bordering upon desperation. The same night he advanced to Guajapeque, where he hoped his fatigued troops might be able to rest securely; but scarce had they laid aside their arms, when the scouts brought advice, that a fresh army of Mexicans, amounting to fifteen thousand men, was advancing to attack the confederates before they should be able to draw breath. Resolution was the only remedy. Sandoval animated his people, and then led them against the enemy, whose front was soon put in disorder by the fire-arms and cross-bows. By this means an opening was made for the cavalry to charge without danger. Their onset was irresistible; the Tlascalans, at the same time, fell upon the flanks, and the Mexicans finding themselves assaulted on both sides, fled precipitately to Guajapeque, where they hoped to meet with protection; but the confederates returning to the town with them, divided themselves into several bodies, scoured all the streets, and again drove the enemy into the open fields, pursuing them with great slaughter.

This victory was followed by the reduction of Capistan, a strong town, situated on the summit of a rocky eminence, and secured on the back-side by a deep, rapid, river. It was distant about two leagues from Guajapeque, and thither the routed Mexicans crowded as to an impregnable fortress; nothing, however, could withstand the confederate army flushed with conquest. Sandoval resolved to drive the enemy from this post, that he might deprive the Mexicans of so convenient a rendezvous for troops destined for the invasion of the frontier provinces. Perceiving there were only three ways by which he could make the attack, all of them difficult, he ordered the Tlascalans, and Chalquese, to advance in the front, as more accustomed to those steep and rugged passes. They obeyed, but so reluctantly, that Sandoval, impatient of delay, rushed with his Spaniards into the thickest of the danger, which so animated the Indians, that they forgot the difficulty of the attempt, and seemed emulous who should first gain the summit of the eminence. In many places the path was so steep, that they were altogether employed in conquering the ascent, it being impossible to use their hands, either in defence, or attack, without fear of tumbling down to the bottom; while the Mexicans were all the while rolling down great stones, and showering darts and arrows upon them. At last, they gained the top by the assistance of the fire-arms, which drove the enemy from the brow of the hill, and left a clear passage for the confederates. Now they attacked with incredible valour, as if determined to revenge the difficulties and dangers they had just escaped; they forced their way through all opposition, beat the Mexicans back to the town, pursued them so closely, that, entering with them, they gained possession, and forced the enemy to the brink of the precipice, where all those were put to the sword who did not throw themselves over. On this occasion, the slaughter is reported to have been so prodigious, that the Spaniards, who had run to the river to quench their thirst, were obliged to refrain from drinking, on perceiving its streams tinged with blood. In a word, the victory was decisive, but it was obtained with very considerable loss on the side of the confederates. Sandoval had his armour broke in different places; several Spaniards were dangerously wounded, and above six hundred Indians slain in climbing up the ascent. Imagining he had now sufficiently deterred the Mexicans from any farther attempts, Sandoval returned to Tezcuco, where he was scarce arrived, before advice arrived from Chalco, that the province had been again invaded, but that the enemy were defeated by the natives: a piece of intelligence that gave great satisfaction, as from hence it appeared the frontier provinces were in a condition to undertake their own defence.

a As the shipping destined for the siege of Mexico was not yet completed, Cortez resolved to examine the situation of Sachimillo, a place situated on the Mexican lake, and communicating with Mexico by a broad causeway, of which he hoped to make his advantage in his enterprizes against the capital. On the fifth day of April he set out from Tezeuco, with three hundred Spaniards, several thousand confederate Indians, and the captains de Olid, Alvarado, and others, the command of the rest of the army in Tezeuco being left with Sandoval. He marched with such diligence that he arrived the same night at Chalco, just as the inhabitants were arming to oppose a new army of Mexicans, sent to invade their province. This seasonable assistance was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy by the Chalquefe, who entertained no doubt about victory, when they were commanded b by the Spanish general. They desired to be led immediately against the enemy, ambitious of signaling their valour before so perfect a judge of military merit; but the Mexicans, upon advice of the arrival of the Spaniards, had separated into small parties, and thrown themselves into certain fortresses, situated on different mountains round the frontier, whence Cortez resolved to dislodge them, that no time might be lost in marching to Sachimillo. Having assembled all his forces, he began his march by break of day towards the mountains, and ascended a steep eminence, at the top of which was a fort, defended by so numerous an army as must have appeared formidable in a less advantageous situation. The Mexicans sent forth parties to provoke the confederates to an engagement in the midst of those precipices, where the difficulty of the way was alone sufficient c obstruction; and these succeeded so well in their reproaches, that Cortez, giving way to his passion, ordered two companies of musqueteers and cross-bows to advance to the attack. This detachment was headed by Pedro de Barba, accompanied by several volunteers of distinction. As the Spaniards ascended the hill the Mexicans retired, feigning confusion, in order to draw Barba on with the more security; and when they found him embarrassed in the most difficult precipices, they returned to the charge with loud shouts, tumbling down from the top such a torrent of great stones as swept all before it, and wounded several Spaniards, among whom was the commanding officer. Sensible of his error, Cortez immediately ordered the party to retreat, which was effected with great difficulty, and with some of his captains he reconnoitred the ground, and sought a less b dangerous path by which he might wreck his revenge. His enquiries proved fruitless, and he was equally unfortunate in all his endeavours to draw the enemy from their retreat. Three days had now been consumed in the midst of barren mountains, and the troops began to sink under the pressure of thirst, famine, and fatigue, insomuch, that without accomplishing his design, he was forced to proceed to Guastapeque to refresh his army. Here he was sumptuously lodged, together with his whole army, in the cazique's palace, which yielded but little in extent and magnificence to the imperial residence.

CORTÉZ staid but one night at Guastapeque, when advice came, that the enemy had abandoned the fortresses on the mountains, and assembled at Quatlavaca, where their e army was numerous, and determined to make an obstinate resistance to all the power of the confederates. He set out immediately for that town, and advanced to the moat which was eight foot deep, extremely wide, and filled with water that tumbled rapidly down from the adjacent mountains. The Mexicans had cut down the bridges, and covered the opposite bank with such a multitude of soldiers, that the passage seemed altogether impracticable to the bulk of the confederates, although Cortez did not despair. He drew up his army at a little distance, ordered the musqueteers to keep up a perpetual fire to cover his approach, and went in person to view the ditch. Having discovered a part much narrower than the rest, he ordered two or three bridges to be constructed, which he threw f over; and by this means enabled the infantry to pass over with difficulty, while the fire-arms, and cross-bows, kept the enemy at a distance. The van-guard, composed chiefly of Spaniards, no sooner reached the opposite side, than they formed into a battalion; and the Mexicans, sensible that they ought to have disputed the passage more vigorously, now poured down in such multitudes, that the confederates could hardly maintain their ground, though they were constantly receiving supplies by the troops who were filing over the bridges with all possible expedition. The event would have been very doubtful, had not Cortez fortunately found a passage for the cavalry, with whom he charged the enemy in the rear, assisted with a body of infantry, seasonably brought up by the historian of this expedition, Bernal Diaz del Castillo. The Mexicans, now distracted by this g double attack, gave themselves up for lost, fled with great precipitation, and made their escape to the mountains, leaving Quatlavaca to be pillaged by the conquerors. The submission, however, of the cazique, and principal inhabitants, saved the place from the fury of the soldiers. They desired leave to return to their habitations, to prepare quarters a for the confederate army, which was granted, after Cortez had fully assured himself of their sincerity.

CORTEZ staid but one night at Quatlavaca, setting out next morning for Sackimillo, a place of the greatest importance, on account of its vicinity to Mexico. The march was difficult and fatiguing, the soldiers having almost perished with thirst, in a long, barren, sandy defile, where they were exposed to the reflected beams of the sun at mid-day. The night brought relief, and great abundance of good provision, in a village, which the enemy had just abandoned. As the general expected a vigorous resistance, he drew up his army, at break of day, in order of battle, imagining the enemy would have taken every possible precaution to fortify a post of so much consequence as Sackimillo, a conjecture that was verified by the view which he had of an incredibly numerous army drawn up in battalia, on a plain at some distance from the city, having a rapid river in front that discharged itself in the Mexican lake. They had doubled their lines on the banks of this river, and disposed their main body for the defence of a wooden bridge which they left standing, after barricadoing it with planks and fascines; believing, that if this fortification should be forced, they would be able to cut off the confederates in the narrowness of the pass, with little difficulty. Cortez extended his front along the opposite bank of the river, and ordered the Spaniards to advance and attack the bridge, which they performed with great gallantry, though they were vigorously opposed. Three times they renewed the charge, and at last gained the pass; with which the Mexicans were so much disheartened, that they began every where to give way, their commanders ordering a retreat, that they might have an opportunity of rallying. They drew up a second time under the walls of the town, and were again attacked so impetuously by the confederates, whose van consisted of Spaniards, that they were driven for shelter into the city, losing great numbers of men as they crowded in at the gates. Cortez pursued, and ordered the works they had erected for the defence of the streets to be forced. Here the general, transported by his courage, engaged himself so deeply with the enemy, that, after he was tired fighting, his horse killed under him, and all his endeavours to regain his troops were foiled, he was made prisoner by the enemy, and rescued by the extraordinary valour of a Spanish soldier, Christoval de Olla, who at a distance beheld the accident. Herrera, without any proofs, d ascribes the general's delivery to a Tlascalan, who was neither known before nor after, and works it up into a kind of miracle; but we had rather credit de Solis, who transcribes from Diaz del Castillo, an eye-witness of the engagement. All agree that the danger was imminent, that Cortez lost his horse, and received two slight wounds, and that Olla, his deliverer, came off with three cuts of a sword, of which he wore the scars all his life after. When he rejoined his forces, he pushed the enemy with so much vigour, that they fled to that part of the city which stood in the water, leaving the Spaniards masters of all the streets upon the firm land.

MEAN-WHILE, that part of the army left without the walls, under the conduct of de Olid, Alvarado, and Tapia, was deeply engaged with a body of Mexican nobility, who endeavoured to force themselves into the city. They were supported by two thousand select men sent from Mexico in canoes, who landed at some distance, and intended to fall upon the rear of the confederates. Astonished to find an army without the walls, where they expected no resistance, they determined, however, to cut their way through: they fought with great fury, but were in the end obliged to retreat to their canoes, leaving a great number of dead on the field. The three Spanish captains, and a great number of Spanish and Tlascalan soldiers, were wounded, but few were slain on the side of the confederates. Cortez, being now master of the principal streets, took possession of a temple, which, from its height, commanded a view of the whole city and lake. Here he placed a garrison, with orders to keep continual watch, and observe the motions of the enemy; a precaution that soon appeared necessary. At the close of the evening two thousand canoes were seen advancing with all the speed they could make. The guards were immediately doubled, and every measure was taken to give the Mexicans a warm reception. They landed in the morning at a considerable distance. Cortez advanced against them with the bulk of the confederate army; and the enemy, who were fifteen thousand men strong, did not decline the combat; but the resistance they made was so faint, and their flight so sudden, that the advantage gained by Cortez scarce merited the name of a victory. Four days after this the confederates continued in Sackimillo for the recovery of their wounded; half the forces always continuing under arms, upon account of the facility with which they might be attacked on the side of Mexico. Having now made sufficient observations, and the wounded being in a condition to travel, he began his retreat for Tezcuco, and completed it ^a it without much difficulty, though the enemy did not fail to throw obstructions in his way.

By the time the expedition to Sackinillo was finished, the brigantines were in readiness, and the canals to the lake sufficiently widened to receive vessels of much greater bulk. Every preparation for the siege went on with alacrity; and the caziques, in the confederacy, were required to attend, with all their forces, on a day appointed, at the head-quarters. While his whole thoughts were occupied with this important enterprize, an accident happened that gave much trouble, and required the exertion of all his conduct and valour. A soldier, who had been long in his service, came to him, full of concern, and desiring to speak with him in private, revealed the whole secret of a conspiracy formed to

A conspiracy discovered.

^b take away the general's life, and also to murder, or confine, the principal Spanish captains. In this plot the Indians had no share; it was first projected by Antonio de Villafarra, a Spanish soldier, whose intention was originally no more than to escape from an enterprize, the difficulties of which appeared to him insuperable. He soon communicated his sentiments to his companions, who readily embraced them, formed themselves into a faction, and immediately proceeded to dangerous resolutions. They blamed the general for his obstinate pursuit of a conquest that must terminate in his destruction; declaring, they would not sacrifice their lives in complaisance to a man who was intoxicated with ambition. Hitherto their design was only to withdraw themselves from the army; but the impossibility of procuring ships at Vera Cruz, to transport them to Cuba, without a passport from the

^c general, occurring, they resolved to conquer this difficulty by shedding his blood. Afterwards they extended their plan, and thought it necessary to kill the chief captains, and then to elect a general, who would be less sanguine upon the ideal conquest of Mexico. An instrument was drawn up, whereby they obliged themselves to stand by each other, and follow Villafarra in this execrable undertaking. They drew great numbers of the soldiers to sign the writing; and had not the discovery been seasonably made, the contagion would have spread beyond the power of any remedy. The persons marked out for destruction were the general, De Olid, Sandoval, Alvarado, Tapia, the historian Castillo, and a few others. They were to forge a packet from Vera Cruz, which was to be given to the general while he was at dinner with his officers, all the conspirators going in together, under pretence of hearing the news; they were then to stab the destined victims with their poignards, and to proclaim liberty in the streets, which they imagined would be sufficient to engage the rest of the army in their cause. Francisco Verdugo was thought to be the person pitched upon to succeed Cortez in the command; but as they knew him to be strongly attached to the general, and punctilious in points of honour, they would not acquaint him with their design, before it was fully executed. This was the relation of the soldier, who was drawn in to sign the instrument, had been present at some of the meetings of the conspirators, and now demanded his life and pardon as the reward of his fidelity. Cortez, attended by the two alcades, went immediately to seize Villafarra, whom he found in his quarters, in deep consultation with three or four of his accomplices. His

^e fears sufficiently proved his guilt. Cortez ordered him to be put in irons, and his accomplices to be confined in another apartment. Then he examined him in private, and extorted the instrument from him, together with a full discovery of the ultimate intention of the conspiracy. The seizing of the paper left no room for doubt. Villafarra was condemned the same night, and next morning he was seen hanging over the window of his own quarters. It was matter of grief and astonishment to the general, to see so long a list of soldiers who were engaged in this plot; but this was not a time to satisfy justice, at the expence of so many lives, which were invaluable in the present conjuncture. He could not punish such a number of Spaniards without relinquishing his designs upon

^f Mexico; a stratagem therefore was contrived to satisfy justice, and to avoid punishing the guilty, without seeming to connive at the crime, or to be afraid of executing his authority. It was reported that Villafarra had swallowed the paper containing the engagement and names of the conspirators; Cortez assembled his army, related the horrid design and execution of Villafarra, and declared that he thought himself extremely happy in not knowing whether he had any accomplices; adding, that he only desired to be informed of any complaints which his soldiers might have against his proceedings, since he was as ready to satisfy them, and correct his faults, as he was able to execute the dictates of rigorous justice, where the lenity of his punishments made them lose their influence. This declaration,

^g filled with several kind expressions and soothing professions, gave universal satisfaction; the conspirators rejoicing that they had not been discovered, and endeavouring to efface all suspicion of their crime, by their future conduct. The soldiers, who had been taken into custody with Villafarra, were released, under pretence that no evidence appeared against them;

them; and thus Cortez, by his spirited and sensible measures, suppressed a dangerous faction, and reconciled the minds of his soldiers, only by sacrificing the first projector and chief instrument of the conspiracy. He likewise made use of this opportunity to strengthen his authority, by appointing a body-guard of twelve faithful soldiers, commanded by an officer; a step which might, at any other time, have given umbrage, though it was now regarded as necessary.

SCARCE was this dangerous faction suppressed, when another accident fell out, that reduced Cortez to great perplexity. Xicotencal, general of the Tlascalan forces, either upon some fresh disgust, or that he had not yet laid aside his ancient animosity, withdrew privately from the army, with a body of men, whom he had engaged in his interest. The general was informed of his retreat by the Tlascalans themselves, few of whom approved of his conduct. This behaviour of a commander, so considerable among the Indians, was of the most dangerous consequence, at a juncture when Cortez was entering upon an enterprize that required the utmost unanimity. He was in great difficulties how to proceed, and first resolved to send some of the principal Tlascalan nobility to endeavour to persuade him to return. This expedient proved fruitless. Xicotencal not only refused listening to their admonition, but he dismissed them with a contemptuous answer; which so enraged Cortez, than he immediately sent a party to take him prisoner, and to kill him if he resisted. The latter was put in execution. Xicotencal fought obstinately, and was slain, his companions making but a feeble resistance. Herrera alledges, that he was brought back prisoner to Tezeuco, and publicly hanged, by virtue of a power from the republic of Tlascala, to try, condemn, and execute him, if found guilty. We have followed the relation of de Solis, as the most probable; it being unlikely that Cortez would venture to execute an Indian of so high quality among such a number of his countrymen, who could not but resent the indignity of so shameful a punishment.

Siege of Mexico,
May 22.

THESE impediments being happily removed, Cortez ordered the brigantines to be launched, and then reviewed his Spanish army, which consisted of eight hundred and seventy-six foot, of whom near two hundred were musketeers and cross bows, eighty-six horse, together with eighteen pieces of cannon, the three largest of iron, and the rest small field-pieces of brass. He had now likewise sufficient store of powder and ammunition, and every thing else which he judged necessary to the success of the enterprize. He laboured diligently to get all things in readiness. On board each of the thirteen vessels he put twenty-five Spaniards, and twelve Indian rowers, with one piece of cannon. Then he resolved to possess himself of the causeways of Tacuba, Iztapalapa, and Cayoacan; for which purpose he divided his army into three bodies, each under the conduct of Alvarado, de Olid, and Sandoval, assisted by proper officers. It is reported, that the Indians, who assisted the Spaniards in those three attacks, amounted to an hundred thousand men; although Castillo reduces the number to twenty-four thousand, without at all accounting for the great number who rendezvoused at the head quarters when the brigantines were launched. The attack on Tacuba was intrusted to Alvarado, with the title of commander in chief in that district. Sandoval had charge of the expedition against Iztapalapa, with a similar title; and the attack against Cayoacan was headed by de Olid, who had honours conferred on him equal to those of the two other commanders. As for Cortez himself, he took charge of the fleet, determined to make himself master of the lake, and to assist at that quarter which should appear to be the hardest pressed.

ALVARADO and de Olid marched in company to Tacuba, which city they found deserted by the inhabitants; the greater number of whom were gone to defend Mexico, and the rest retired to the mountains, where they were forming a considerable army, to protect the aqueducts which came from the mountains of Chapulteque. As the city was entirely supplied with fresh water by these and other conveyances, the emperor had destined an army for the defence of each aqueduct, as soon as he was informed that Cortez was resolved upon the siege. The two Spanish captains led their troops against the enemy, defeated them after a warm engagement, and then destroyed all the pipes, suffering the fresh water to take its free course, and discharge itself in the lake. This was the first step to the siege of the capital, and it was important; because the conveyances of water being cut off, the Mexicans were forced to seek it at a distance in the brooks that ran from the mountains, which put them to great inconvenience, and employed a number of hands, that might otherwise assist in the defence of the city. When this business was finished, Olid marched with his detachment, and took post at Cayoacan, as he had been directed by the general. His attempt on the causeway would have been attended with difficulty, had he not been assisted by Cortez, who had, by this time, measured his strength with a vast fleet of Mexican canoes. The general was preparing to assist at the several attacks, when a

- a fleet of five hundred canoes, filled with the principal nobility, was discovered, advancing towards him, from Mexico, followed by another fleet, so numerous, that the whole might amount to above four thousand vessels of different sizes. Cortez did not think it advisable to leave this formidable power behind, nor to decline a combat that was expected by the whole city of Mexico, as appeared by the crowds of people which filled the windows and balconies. His officers concurring with his opinion, he drew up his squadron in form of a crescent, that he might extend his front, and engage with freedom; and then advanced slowly towards the enemy, that his rowers might break in with greater force upon the canoe fleet, when they were within a proper distance. It was perfectly calm at this time, so that his whole dependence in sinking the enemy was upon the vigour of his rowers; but a breeze springing a-stern, Cortez hoisted sail, and bore down with such irresistible force, that the ships overturned every thing in their course; while the artillery, fire-arms, and cross-bows, played with great fury, and extraordinary success. The nobles of Mexico, who led the van, made some resistance; but the rest was all disorder and confusion, the canoes running foul, and shattering each other, to avoid being run down by the brigantines, or sunk by the artillery. In a word, the Mexicans suffered a complete defeat, some hundreds of canoes were destroyed, and several thousands of their people slain by the arms, or drowned by the vessels of the Spaniards, who now gained the reputation of being invincible on the watery element, and rode triumphant on the lake, insulting the city of Mexico with impunity.
- c AFTER this victory, Cortez resolved to proceed to Iztapalapa, to assist Sandoval; but a fleet of canoes having been discovered, making all possible dispatch to Coyoacan, he thought de Olid might stand in more immediate need of succour. In vain he exerted his utmost endeavours to come up with the canoes, as a calm obliged him to trust wholly to his oars; however, he arrived very seasonably to give de Olid relief. That officer was engaged on the causeway, and was obliged to make a front to the enemy that defended it, and to the canoes, who attacked him on each side. He was on the point of retreating, and yielding up the ground he had gained, when the Spanish squadron arrived. The Mexicans had drawn up the bridges, towards the city, over those chasms by which the waters of the higher lake discharged themselves into the lower. Behind the bridges they had fixed planks, in such a manner, that they could annoy the Spaniards over the tops; and, in case they should be forced to retreat, they had raised farther obstructions, by trenches filled with water, which they dug behind, over which were laid loose planks, that could easily be removed after they had retired. In this manner were the three causeways fortified, and such were the difficulties Olid was endeavouring to surmount. He had already made himself master of the first trench, from which he drove the enemy by his fire-arms; then filled it up with fascines, over which the troops marched to attack the second trench. The Mexican canoes now obliged him to act defensively; but they were soon put in confusion by the brigantines, who likewise played their artillery so briskly upon those who defended the trenches, that they fled in disorder to the last rampart between them and the city. Night now came on, and prevented the confederates from pursuing their advantage, by falling upon the Mexicans, who defended the last bridge, before they had time to recover from their panic. However, they maintained the ground which they had purchased so dearly, and next morning advanced to the attack. They found the bridge fortified with such variety of strong works, and defended by such a multitude, that the enterprize seemed hazardous, if not impracticable. Yet the greatest difficulties appeared after they were engaged, and where a retreat would be disgraceful. The artillery from the ditch, and destroying the fortifications on the causeway. When he had completed this business, he began his attack, and was seconded by Cortez, who landed with thirty Spaniards, and infused such spirit into the troops, that they drove the enemy before them into the city, gained the principal street, and forced a strong temple filled with troops, without a single repulse. Immediately that whole quarter of the city was deserted by the enemy, and Cortez had thoughts of maintaining the ground he gained, and removing his headquarters thither from Tezeuco, when he dropped his project by the advice of his officers, who represented the danger to which his troops would be exposed, from the perpetual attacks of the Mexicans, and the difficulty of bringing provision. It was the general sense of the council of war, that they ought to make their advances equally at each of the attacks, in order to divide the enemies forces, until all had carried their approaches into the city, and drawn so near, that they could be mutually assisting to each other. Cortez felt the conviction of the arguments used by the officers, and immediately relinquished his own design.

AFTER the troops were refreshed, by resting a whole evening in the post they had gained in the principal street of Mexico, Cortez proceeded in the morning to Iztapalapa, where he found Sandoval reduced to great extremity. He was pinched within narrow quarters, and in a manner besieged by the Mexican canoes, although he had defeated repeated reinforcements sent from the city. In this situation he was when Cortez arrived, and played the artillery of his brigantines so successfully upon the canoes which beset Sandoval, that they retired in the utmost confusion into the canals leading through the city into the lake, and were overturned by the pressing in of people from the banks. There was scarce any attempt made to resist the Spanish squadron; yet the numbers that were drowned greatly diminished the Mexican forces.

CORTEZ now perceived, that it would be impossible to use the causeway to advantage, until he had destroyed that part of the city Iztapalapa, which afforded a retreat for the Mexican canoes. This would occasion such delay as might prove fatal to the other attacks; he therefore determined to evacuate this post entirely, and send the body of forces under Sandoval, to seize upon Tapeaquilla, where there was a causeway, less commodious for attacking, but more advantageous to the design he now had of starving the Mexicans into submission. Sandoval marched, as he was ordered; and, on his arrival at Tapeaquilla, found the place evacuated. Cortez, who had escorted him with the brigantines, set sail for Tacuba, where he found Alvarado in possession of the city, but skirmishing continually with the enemy, that his loss of men more than overbalanced the advantage of the post. It was this which made Cortez issue orders, that all attacks should cease, and apply himself to assembling a fleet of canoes sufficient to obstruct all convoys to the city. When he had collected the number he thought necessary, he manned them with Indians, and distributed this reinforcement among the brigantines, which he now divided into three squadrons. From this time an entire stop was put to the insults of the Mexicans; and the besieged found themselves greatly straitened for water and provision. To remove these obstructions the Mexicans employed all their address and ingenuity; and, indeed, the variety of contrivances upon which they fell, sufficiently evince, that the Spaniards had to do with a subtle enemy, fruitful in stratagem and invention. Perceiving that all their endeavours to fortify the causeways were abortive, they sent by secret and different passages several canoes of pioneers, to clear the ditches which the Spaniards had filled up, that they might fall upon them with their whole force, when they should be obliged to retire. This stratagem not succeeding to their expectation, they made perpetual sallies in the night, and kept the confederates in continual alarm, with intention to attack them with all their strength when they were spent with fatigue. But the scheme which most discovered their ingenuity, was that formed against the brigantines, whose superior force they aimed to destroy by separating them, and engaging them single. They built thirty of their large canoes, which the natives called piraguas, of a larger size, and strengthened them with great planks, to receive the shot, and engage under shelter. With this fleet they sallied out in the night, and took their station behind the reeds in the lake, which grew so high and thick, that they formed several groves impenetrable to the sight. To draw the brigantines into the ambuscade, they had provided some canoes, laden with provision, as a bait, and had also fixed stakes in the water, so that the points were covered, in hopes either to founder the brigantines, or entangle them in such a manner, that they might be engaged to advantage. Two of the brigantines being soon after observed cruising near this station, the Mexicans put out their canoes, in order that the Spaniards might give chase. The stratagem succeeded. The Spaniards, who had no suspicion, pursued the flying canoes with all the force of their oars, fell in amongst the hidden stakes, and were so embarrassed, that they could neither retreat nor advance, when they saw the piraguas coming with desperate fury to fall upon them. A sharp engagement now began; the Spaniards plied their muskets and artillery with all possible diligence, while the chief endeavour of the Mexicans was to board them, in which they were always foiled. However, all the valour of the Spanish mariners must have sunk under the weight of numbers, had not the shock of the cannon somewhat disengaged their vessels, which were afterwards quite cleared off by the endeavours of some expert swimmers; who, by dint of strength, and the assistance of hatchets, removed the stakes. Being now at full liberty, they made dreadful destruction among the enemy, sunk and destroyed most of the piraguas, and pursued the rest as far as their own security would admit. The victory was compleat, but it was dearly purchased, at the expence of the lives of Barba and Pertillo, whose valour contributed chiefly to the success.

It was not long before Cortez had an opportunity of revenging the death of those brave officers. Having received notice that the enemy had repaired their vessels, and stationed them a them behind the reeds, in order to draw the Spaniards to an engagement, under the same disadvantages as before, he resolved to countermine their plot. Six brigantines were concealed among some reeds, not far from where the piraguas lay. One of those was ordered to cruize about, as if in search of canoes with provision, and afterwards to draw as near the concealed piraguas as was necessary to let them see they were discovered; and when they gave chase, she was to make all the dispatch possible to the place of the counter ambuscade. Every thing succeeded to their most sanguine expectations. The Mexicans gave chase to the brigantine as to a sure prize, and were suddenly saluted with the artillery of the rest of the squadron. Their attempt to retreat was now in vain; the Spaniards poured in their shot with so much fury, that not a single piragua escaped being b sunk or taken.

THOSE successes, though no ways decisive, served to animate the confederates, and dishearten the enemy; who, according to the advices received from the city, were now reduced to great want of provision. It was also reported, that the necessities of the common people had rendered them clamorous, which Cortez thought a fit opportunity for renewing his pacific overtures; for though he had the utmost reason to believe he should succeed in the reduction of Mexico, yet, he was sensible, it must cost blood, and it befides grieved him to destroy so beautiful a city; without which, he found, he should hardly be able to gain possession. Some noble Mexican prisoners were sent with the proposals, which were received, with more temper than was expected, by the emperor. It was afterwards affirmed by the prisoners, that he called a council of his principal officers and ministers, and laid before them the wretched condition of the city, the prodigious diminution of the number of inhabitants, the murmurs of the people on their being reduced to scanty allowance of provision, the destruction of so many houses and temples; in a word, all the consequences of the war were recited; after which, he asked their opinion touching the proposals made by the Spaniards, and expressed his own inclination for peace, as far as was consistent with the character of a prince of martial genius and invincible courage. It was the universal sense of the members of this council, that the overtures for peace ought to be admitted; but when the proposition was referred to the priests, they opposed it with the utmost violence, foreseeing the overthrow of their temples, and of consequence the ruin of their influence over the minds of the people. They pretended to have received certain answers from their idols, which gave them fresh assurances of victory; which so animated the council, that all, except the emperor, changed their sentiments, and declared for the continuance of the war. Guatimozin, or Quautimoc, as Herrera calls this emperor, then declared, that although his own sentiments were pacific, he would nevertheless give up his opinion to the clergy and council; withal prohibiting any one from ever again presuming to mention peace, from whatever consideration, on pain of capital punishment. By this declaration he thought to animate the Mexicans to desperate efforts, and by that means bring the war to a happy conclusion, since he could not effect this by the way of negotiation.

c WHEN the emperor's resolution was brought to Cortez, he determined to resume his attacks by the three causeways, and to carry fire and sword into the very heart of the city; sending orders to his officers to begin their operations at Tacuba and Tapesquilla, while he charged himself with the necessary approaches by the way of Cayoacan, assisted by Christopher de Olid. During the cessation of operations by land ordered by Cortez, the Mexicans had cleared the breaches in the causeways, and erected some works, which were now soon destroyed by the artillery of the shipping. They had, however, dug one ditch of such depth and breadth, that it cost the confederates a great deal of trouble. The Mexicans had broke down about sixty feet of the causeway, to enlarge the ditch, which they filled with the waters of several canals. The opposite bank was covered with fortifications. There a strong work was raised of timbers, covered with planks, with several rows of loop holes, through a trap, to ply their darts and arrows under cover. This work was garrisoned with a multitude of select troops; but it soon gave way to the artillery. The only difficulty was to bring the cannon to bear; for whenever that was effected, every shot broke the fortification to pieces. No sooner had the Spaniards gained this breach and strong post, than more obstructions appeared; but with such fury did they ply the artillery, that the Mexicans were driven from all their trenches, and a sudden faintness, seemingly the effect of some new order, appeared in their operations. It was then supposed that the Mexicans were commanded by the emperor to prepare their whole strength to attack the enemy in their retreat. Cortez suspected his intentions; but he had then scarce time to return to his quarters before night, and yet found it impossible to maintain the posts he had gained without the most imminent danger. After setting fire to several houses,

houses, to prevent their obstructing his next assault, he began to retire, and was soon ^a alarmed with the shouts of an infinite multitude, and the sound of the sacred trumpet, which being permitted only to the priests, intimated that something extraordinary was transacting. The noise was dismal and unharmonious; but adapted to inspire those barbarians with a kind of savage rage, that made them despise life, through motives of religion. Their van was composed of select warriors, who fell upon the rear of the confederates with inexpressible fury, and were received with proportionable courage by the fire-arms and cross-bows, with Cortez at the head of the cavalry. The great ditch now stopt the retreat, and Cortez exerted his utmost endeavours to give a check to the enemy, until bridges could be laid over, on which the troops might pass in safety; but he found it impossible to preserve order among the confederate Indians, who precipitated themselves ^b into the canal, in the greatest confusion, leaving the general and the Spaniards to maintain the engagement against the whole force of Mexico. The slaughter he made was terrible; but the enemy pressed on undaunted, took forty Spaniards alive, wounded the greater number, and must have inevitably destroyed the whole, had not the brigantines come seasonably to their relief, and carried off Cortez wounded, disappointed, defeated, and chagrined. It is affirmed, that some thousands of Tlascalans perished in this retreat, that a piece of cannon fell into the enemies hands, and that the Mexicans celebrated the victory the same night, with great rejoicings, and the sacrifice of the Spanish prisoners, the blood of whose leaping hearts was sprinkled upon the altars of their horrible idols.

WHILE the attack on the side of Cayoacan terminated in this unfortunate manner, the operations of a similar nature, carried on by Sandoval and Alvarado, by the causeways of Tacuba and Tapeaquilla, were not more prosperous, although the loss was not so considerable. They gained bridges, filled up ditches, drove the enemy from their posts, but were so vigorously attacked in their retreat, that twenty Spaniards were killed or taken, some thousands of Indians slain or drowned, and the two corps absolutely defeated. This circumstance extremely dispirited the troops, especially as the Mexicans in this instance appeared to be victorious, without the concurrence of any accident in their favour; whereas Cortez sustained his defeat in consequence of Julian de Aldarate the treasurer's neglect of orders. As soon as the great ditch was carried, the general had given him ^d directions immediately to fill it up to secure a retreat; but Aldarate's ardor and sanguine expectations, that Mexico would certainly be carried at this assault, looked upon the employment destined him as neither necessary nor honourable, at a time when the rest of the army was engaged. He, therefore, advanced to the battle, and his neglect was not discovered before the retreat, when it was too late to repair his error. Sensible of his fault, he now hastened to the general, and offered his head as an atonement for his crime; but Cortez satisfied himself with a severe reprimand, not chusing to dishearten the troops, or deprive himself of a good officer, upon account of an oversight arising from excess of courage.

Artifice of Guatimozin.

THE Mexicans were highly elated with their advantage, and Guatimozin used every arti- ^e fice to improve it, by weakening the enemy, and inspiring his own people with confidence. He spread a report that Cortez was killed in the late action, he sent the heads of the sacrificed Spaniards to all the neighbouring towns, that these proofs of his victory might bring back those who had deserted him; and he asserted with the assurance of self-conviction, that the gods being now appeased with the blood of their enemies, had informed him they would put a speedy issue to the war, and in the space of eight days destroy all who neglected these warnings. At the same time he employed a number of emissaries in the Indian camp, which spread these menaces of the gods among the confederates, by which contrivance he succeeded so happily in his designs, that in the space of three ^f nights Cortez found himself almost entirely deserted, scarce any remaining besides the officers and nobility. Even the Tlascalans were terrified with the dreadful denunciation of the gods, and disbanded, in order to avoid the consequence of their wrath. At first Cortez was alarmed by so extraordinary an accident, and despaired of the success of his enterprise; but when he was made acquainted with the occasion, he sent their commanders after them to temporize with their fears until the time of the prediction should be expired, and the Indians thoroughly convinced of the fallibility of the oracle; a contrivance which produced the effect. When the eight days were expired, this ignorant people yielded to persuasion, laid aside their fears, and returned with fresh vigour and resolution to their quarters; by ^g which means the army was greatly augmented, the spirits of the people took a sudden turn, and they flocked in such crowds to the camp, that Cortez, in a few days, found himself at the head of two hundred thousand fighting men.

The Indians
desert from Cortez.

HOWEVER,

- a HOWEVER, the Mexicans reaped some advantage from their stratagem. They reduced the Spaniards to the necessity of suspending all hostilities, during which time they made frequent sallies, which extremely harraßed the enemy, but without being able to regain the posts of which Cortez had taken possession. Hence the famine was daily gaining ground, and Cortez was informed by the prisoners he had lately taken, that the army was dissatisfied, and the people reduced to extreme necessity for want of bread and water. They were forced to drink the brackish water drawn from pits, which produced a variety of diseases, of which great numbers died. The inconsiderable supplies of provisions brought by the canoes were equally distributed among the nobles, which became an additional subject of discontent. In a word, they reported that the vulgar, in general, became so clamorous, as to give suspicion of their fidelity. Such intelligence was of the utmost importance, and that it might not be lost, Cortez assembled his officers to deliberate upon the measures necessary to be pursued in the present situation of affairs. In this council it was unanimously resolved to continue their attacks, and push both the siege and blockade. For this purpose strong garrisons were to be left at the head-quarters and posts, while the rest of the forces made an assault by the three causeways, endeavouring to unite in the great square of Mexico, where it was proposed to establish a footing, and thereby prevent the necessity of always retreating to quarters. Water, provision, and whatever was necessary for the subsistence of his troops, where a scarcity prevailed, being in readiness, the army marched out of quarters in three divisions, under the same officers who led the former attacks, repaired to their respective posts on the causeways as before, and were each supported by a number of canoes and brigantines. They now had to dispute all the breaches again, as the enemy had drawn up the bridges, and erected new fortifications. The brigantines plied their cannon, and the soldiers kept up so furious a discharge of fire arms and cross-bows, that all these impediments were soon removed, the three divisions arriving about the same time in the city. Here they easily gained several ruined streets, as they were but faintly defended by the enemy, who relied chiefly upon those streets where the tops of the houses were strongly garrisoned, or rather crowded with soldiers. It was wonderful to observe how the three several corps of the confederate forces observed the same regulations, as if they had been animated by one soul. Although they had as yet no communication, all contented themselves for that day, with having got a footing in the city, and used their endeavours to fortify quarters, in which they might rest with tolerable security for that night, fully determined next morning to proceed in their attempt to reach the great square of Tlatelcuco, which was the center of their several expectations, to which they tended by different lines.
- b It was matter of surprize and disappointment to the Mexicans, that the confederates had made good their quarters in the city. They had directed all their measures to harraß them in their retreat, and those were now entirely broken and defeated. The rumour immediately spread through the city, and every mind was employed in contriving some new resource. The nobles flocked in consternation to the imperial palace, in order to prevail on Guatimozin to retire to a place of more security; but he positively declared that he would share in the fate of his people. Several expedients were proposed, and among others, that the confederates should be attacked early in the morning with all the power of Mexico, and, if possible, dislodged; a proposal that met with the emperor's approbation. Accordingly preparations were made, and, as soon as dawn appeared, the whole forces of Mexico, in three bodies, began their attacks upon the three different lodgments. This was a definitive effort, and every Mexican determined to succeed or to perish in the attempt; but they no sooner came within reach of the artillery planted in all the passes before the Spanish quarters, than their resolution vanished. The cannon made such dreadful slaughter in the van, that it fell back upon the center, and threw the whole army in confusion. Divers efforts were made to rally the troops; but the confederates kept up so incessant a fire of artillery and musquetry, that it was impossible for the Mexicans to advance near enough to employ their weapons. Thus were they completely defeated, without the loss of a single man on the side of the besiegers. Nevertheless, the confederates had still manifold difficulties to encounter. For the space of four days they were in continual action, disputing every inch of ground; and beating the Mexicans from the trenches dug, and the works erected in every street; at the same time they were under the necessity of fortifying fresh quarters for their defence in the evening. At last, after encountering a multiplicity of dangers, and conquering an infinity of difficulties, Pedro Alvarado arrived in the spacious square of Tlatelcuco, where he found the Mexicans drawn up in battalia; but he charged them with such vigour that they fell in confusion, abandoned the square, and retired to the adjoining streets. He had just possessed himself of a large temple in the neighbourhood, on the top of which he had made a signal to his friends of his success, when Cortez and de Olid arrived with the division under their command, driving before them a multitude of Mexicans, who now were enclosed between the two corps of confederates, and so warmly attacked in front and rear, that few of them escaped. Not long after Sandoval brought up his division, and gave up the crowds of Mexicans he was driving before him to the fate of their countrymen, that of perishing by the swords of the enemy, by whom they were enclosed. The carnage was so great, that several companies of Indians were employed the whole evening in clearing the square of dead bodies; and the Spaniards were forced to keep the strictest watch to prevent their allies from running away with their wretched burdens, in order to feast deliciously on the human flesh, according to the detestable rites with which those savages celebrated their victories. Here Cortez took up his quarters for the night, after having used every precaution to defend himself against the sudden attacks of an enemy now driven to despair.

siege.*

IN the morning the troops were drawn out to renew the attack, intended against the quarter of the city, into which the emperor and court had retired. All the streets in that district were seen full of armed men, behind whom were a great number of workmen diligently employed in erecting fortifications, against the last misfortune that hung over this almost ruined city. Cortez did not doubt but the Mexicans would dispute this last stake with obstinacy; it was therefore adviseable, he thought, to spare the effusion of blood, by renewing his overtures of peace, at a juncture when he imagined they would hardly be rejected. Accordingly he chose out four noble prisoners to carry a message to the emperor, and acquaint him, that the Spanish general was far from desiring the destruction of so fine a city, and would willingly avoid shedding the blood of a greater number of Mexicans, provided they would listen to equitable terms of accommodation. This produced a suspension of hostilities, the enemy expressing the utmost desire to forward a pacification. In the mean time Cortez employed himself in reconnoitring the ground, and viewing those fortifications the Mexicans were erecting, which, after all their labour, he found, must soon yield to his artillery. Nor did he meet with any opposition, the Mexicans signifying by their silence and stillness, that the negotiation was popular. The art with which they endeavoured to disguise their necessity was very remarkable. They took the utmost pains to persuade the Spaniards, that although they were no way averse to the peace in agitation, yet they were able and willing to prosecute the war. They sent out several soldiers of gigantic stature, to challenge any of the Spaniards, or Tlascalans, to single combat; and this practice they continued until they so far roused the indignation of Mercado, a youth of seventeen, who acted in the capacity of page to Cortez, that he flung himself into the canal, which separated him from the Mexicans, swam to the opposite bank, engaged the challenger, and thrust his sword into his breast, laid him dead on the ground, to the great joy of the Spaniards, and astonishment of the Mexicans, who beheld this exploit, in a youth, as a specimen of the general valour of the enemy.

AFTER a suspense of three days, during which all action ceased, an answer arrived from Guatimozin, expressing his desire to terminate differences in an amicable manner; which, however, proved only an artifice to gain time to pursue certain measures which had been projected in his council. It was afterwards known, that he had frequently assembled the nobility to deliberate upon the answer he should return. A majority voted for admitting the proposed treaty; and this opinion would have prevailed, had not the priests again interposed. They gave fresh assurances of victory from pretended oracles delivered to them by their idols; they excited a kind of fanatical fury in the breasts of the council, by calling this cause the cause of heaven, and they practised with the utmost address all those frauds by which the pious impostors of all nations are accustomed to delude the ignorant. Upon this, it was unanimously resolved to run every hazard in the prosecution of the war, and immediately to renew hostilities, as soon as the piraguas and canoes should be provided to favour the emperor's retreat, in case the enemy should prevail. In consequence of this determination, orders were issued to collect all the vessels in Mexico, to a bay of the lake that run in upon one side of the quarter of the city in which the court at present resided. Cortez had notice of the motions made to execute this order; and judging of the design, directed Sandoval to have a watchful eye with the brigantines upon the bay. Then he marched forward to the enemy's works; but the Mexicans had already received orders to stand on their defence, and they had declared the breach of the treaty by their hostile cries, before the Spaniards levelled a shot, or threw an arrow. Cortez began the attack, and the courage of the enemy forsook them, on perceiving the havock made among their wooden fortifications by the first discharge of the cannon. They had imagined

a gined these works were impregnable, and when they saw them shattered in pieces, they were seized with dread, and gave immediate notice of their situation to the emperor. It was now necessary to have recourse to artifice to gain time; Guatimozin accordingly sent word, that they should demand a parley, which was done by signs, and granted without hesitation, the general entertaining no doubts of their sincerity on account of their defenceless situation. Cortez gave them to understand by the interpreters, that whoever had any proposals to offer from Guatimozin might advance and deliver them in perfect security; upon which four nobles advanced to the brink of the trench, and acquainted the general, that the supreme majesty of Guatimozin had deputed them, his servants, to treat of an amicable accommodation, and to demand any proposals which the captain of the Spaniards had to offer, in order to report to his sublime highness the articles of capitulation. The reply made by the general was, that his only view was peace; and although he now had it in his power to give law to the refractory Mexicans, yet he was ready to renew the treaty which they had wantonly broken. To remove all difficulties, he said it was requisite that the emperor should either appear in person, or, at least, draw nearer with his council, the sooner to terminate such disputes as might arise in adjusting their differences. He assured the ambassadors, that he would willingly agree to every thing that was not injurious to the authority of his own master, the king of Spain; and he promised in the most solemn manner, that he would not only cause all hostilities to cease, but take particular care that his royal person should be in the utmost security, and treated with all the respect due to the exalted character of an emperor of Mexico. For the space of four days Guatimozin continued this feigned negotiation, until all the vessels were ready for his retreat; and Cortez was so persuaded of his sincerity, that he made some preparations for his reception. At length notice was brought of what was transacting on the lake; and Cortez, now sensible that he was the dupe of these barbarians, swore revenge. Orders had already been given to Sandoval, narrowly to watch the Mexican piraguas and canoes, and Cortez was purposing to give the assault early next morning. Sandoval acted in the most judicious manner. He kept out small canoes, hid among the reeds, to observe the enemy, and when he received advice, that great numbers of people were seen embarking in the canoes and piraguas, he advanced slowly with his fleet of brigantines, until he was near enough to play his artillery: on the first discharge of the cannon, all the enemy's canoes, and several brigantines, fell upon him with great fury, resolving to maintain the fight until the emperor had made his escape. The nobles had charged themselves with this business; and, indeed, they made desperate efforts in defence of their sovereign, attacking the brigantines with undaunted courage, notwithstanding the terrible havock made by the cannon. In the midst of this engagement Sandoval observed, that five or six piraguas were making the best of their way, with the utmost force of oars, from the bottom of the bay, and suspecting that the emperor might be on board, he dispatched captain Garcia de Holguin, with one of the brigantines, to take them with as little damage as possible. This officer executed his orders with punctuality, directing his attack against the foremost piragua, which seemed to command the others; and he had no sooner seized upon this vessel, than all the others lay upon their oars, calling out not to fire, for that the royal person of the emperor of Mexico was on board. To make themselves the better understood, the crew threw down their arms, and put on all the appearance of submission; upon which the Spanish captain, and some soldiers, leaped into the prize and secured her. The emperor immediately discovered himself by the dignity of his manner. He got up, and advanced with an air of intrepidity, offered himself the captain's prisoner, and only expressed his concern for the honour of his royal consort, who then accompanied him. He made a signal to the other piraguas, and they instantly lay upon their oars, ceased hostilities, and submitted. When the nobility, who were deeply engaged in their canoes with Sandoval, and had undertaken, at the expence of their own lives, to effect the liberty of their prince, were informed of the emperor's fate, they not only surrendered without further resistance, but besought the Spaniards they might be sent on board the same vessel, that they might die at the feet of their sovereign. The same happened on the shore. Holguin had detached a canoe to acquaint the general with his good fortune, the news spread through the confederate army, and seized the Mexicans as if by sympathy; they deserted their works, began dismal lamentations, and offered submission at the discretion of the conqueror. Two companies of Spaniards were sent to the banks of the lake to conduct the imperial prisoner to the army; and orders were issued that all hostilities should cease, and the army remain in the present situation until further directions. Cortez went out to meet the captive monarch, received him with the most profound reverence, and was astonished at the magnanimity which that prince shewed under the pressure pressure of misfortune. When they arrived at the general's quarters, Guatimozin and the empress went first into the tent, intimating thereby, that they had no reluctance to their confinement. Both took their seats; but the emperor rose up of a sudden, and desired Cortez to take his seat, telling him at the same time by the interpreters, and putting his hand upon the general's sword, "Why do you hesitate to take away my life? Prisoners of any rank are only a trouble to the conqueror. Let me then, at once, have the satisfaction of dying by your hand, since I have not been so fortunate as to lose my life in the defence of my people."—Here his constancy failed him, and he dropped some involuntary tears, which drew the sympathetic drops from the eyes of Cortez; endeavouring to suppress those tender emotions, he replied to the emperor, "That he was not his prisoner, nor had his dignity fallen into so inglorious a condition; but that he was the prisoner of so great and powerful a monarch, that the whole universe could not produce a potentate equal to him in grandeur, dominion, or noble qualities. From him he might not only hope to regain his liberty, but likewise the throne of his ancestors, with the honourable addition of his friendship; and, until he could receive his sovereign's instructions, he should be respected by the Spaniards, and treated in such a manner, that he should not be able to distinguish their services from those of his own subject;" a promise to which he ought to have adhered more rigorously, as it was made voluntarily (A).

Aug. 13, 1521.

In this manner ended the conquest of the vast empire of Mexico, the whole depending upon the fortune of the sovereign, and the capital. Some provinces still held out, but we shall see how easily they were reduced. The siege lasted near three months; it cost Cortez the lives of near a hundred Spaniards, and an infinity of Indians. The loss of the Mexicans exceeded an hundred thousand men, at the most moderate computation; besides those who perished of disease and famine. Some thousands of nobility were among the slain; but the pestilence and famine chiefly afflicted the lower sort of people, who ate the most nauseous food in their necessity, and drank salt water. What greatly contributed to spread the contagion, was the intolerable stench produced from the heaps of corrupted carcases, all the slain having been heaped together in empty houses, that their funeral obsequies might be celebrated at more leisure. The women displayed all the noblest qualities of the mind during the whole course of the siege. They attended the sick, dressed the wounded, made slings, and other weapons, carried water from the most distant pits, and even fought occasionally with truly masculine valour. The city, according to Herrera, was given up to be plundered, and the booty was immense, although it was suspected that Moteczuma's treasures were concealed. Cortez expressed his acknowledgments to the Almighty for the signal success of his arms by a solemn thanksgiving, after which the troops were led back to Coyoacan, and the bulk of the confederates dismissed, with large presents and honourable rewards of their fidelity and important services. Many of the Mexican nobility were set at liberty, and Cortez exhorted the inhabitants to a perfect resignation and submission, which alone would secure them in all the privileges they enjoyed under the government of Guatimozin. With respect to Moteczuma's treasures, the most diligent search proved fruitless. It was well known that when Cortez resided in the court of that monarch, he was possessed of immense wealth, which might have possibly been now expended in supporting the war, and preserving the fidelity of the provinces and nobility. This was a consideration that never once occurred to the minds of the Spaniards, who regarded the riches of Moteczuma as altogether inexhaustible. Fully persuaded they would become their own property as soon as Mexico was reduced, they pushed the siege with redoubled vigour, and now were chagrined with disappointment, in proportion to their sanguine expectations. The soldiers cried out, that Guatimozin had concealed the treasures; and it was indeed affirmed by some of the Mexican nobles, that he had often declared his resolution of throwing all his wealth into the lake, whenever he found resistance would be fruitless, and Mexico must fall. Many, however, suspected, that this declaration was an artifice, and so impatient were the soldiers, that Cortez yielded to their Search after the imperial treasure, and cruelty of the Spaniards.

(A) Guatimozin was a young prince of extraordinary qualities, high birth, great courage and ability in the art of war, although he was prevented by the policy of his court from leading his own armies in the attacks on the Spanish quarters, knowing that the fate of the city depended on his safety. He was tall, robust, well proportioned, handsome in his features, and so fair in his complexion, that he scarce resembled an Indian. In his air he was noble and majestic, preserving even in his captivity such a dignity of carriage as commanded the respect of his conquerors. The empress was also young, but so graceful in her manner, and so lively in her mien, that she attracted admiration and reverence. She was niece to the great Moteczuma; and this circumstance more strongly recommended her to the Spaniards (1).

- a pressing instances, to bring the monarch and his prime favourite to a strict account. The latter was put to the torture, but confessed nothing, casting his eyes, as he was expiring upon the rack, upon his sovereign, with all the expression of inviolable tenderness and fidelity, which some construed into a presumption that he was possessed of the secret, but resolved to carry it with him to the grave. It was this suspicion that produced the resolution of trying the effects of torture upon the monarch himself; imagining, possibly, that his constancy might yield to the excruciating pangs of the rack: an action which reflects eternal disgrace upon Cortez, who had passed his word for the emperor's good usage. It was piteous to behold the effects which this unworthy punishment of her lord produced on the empress, which even mollified the hearts of the brutal soldiers, and drew forth
- b tears of compassion from the eyes of the general, who now ordered Guatimozin to be taken from the wheel, after he had endured, without shrinking, the extremity of pain. Cortez afterwards excused himself, for this breach of his engagements, and act of barbarity, by alledging, that he was accused of being privy to Guatimozin's concealment of the treasure, with intention to deprive the soldiers of their proportion; a suspicion which it was incumbent on him to remove. But the method which he took to clear himself was by no means approved. The soldiers, who had insisted upon his making strict inquiry for the treasure, now taxed him with perversity and cruelty; they were moved with the heroism with which the monarch supported his sufferings, and glad to shift off from themselves the odium of so detestable an action, though at the expence of the honour of their commander. In a word,
- c the glory of one of the noblest conquests related in the annals of mankind, was sullied by avarice and cruelty; and the reputation of Cortez, which would otherwise have been handed down to posterity with untainted lustre, was greatly obscured, by suffering an act equally mean, sordid, and perfidious.

It was now the general's endeavour to restore peace and tranquillity in the new conquest, knowing that the security of the Spaniards depended greatly upon the degree of ease and felicity which the inhabitants enjoyed under their government. His first measure was to establish a civil policy, by appointing alcades, regidors, and other magistrates, agreeable to the Spanish constitution. Next he determined to transmit an account of his successes to court, to exhort his majesty to continue and confirm the new magistrates in their

d respective employments, and to make grants of lands to those who had performed the most eminent services. Alonso d' Avila and Antonio de Quimanes were the persons selected to carry these dispatches, the king's fifth of the booty, the presents from the army, and the private remittances of Cortez to his father and other relations. Among the other presents sent to the king, to give him a proper idea of the importance of the new conquest, was an emerald of prodigious size, of a pyramidal form, pearls of immense value set in bracelets, rings, jewels, and other ornaments, wore by the Indians; a number of gold and silver cups of curious workmanship, considering the low condition of the arts in that barbarous country; figures of fishes, birds, and other animals, in solid gold; vizors of mosaic work, in fine stones; pictures of feathers; historical paintings on cotton; priests vestments; with an infinity of other particulars, valuable either for their curiosity or intrinsic

e worth. The new magistrates wrote a letter to his catholic majesty, extolling the gallantry and prudent conduct of their general, to whose measures they ascribed all their good fortune; and Cortez himself sent a minute relation of every particular, requesting that some person of ability and integrity might be sent to survey the wonders of the new conquest, and make a just report to his majesty; and that a sufficient number of the clergy might be ordered to New Spain, to take care of the interests of religion, and assist in the propagation of the gospel.

Cortez sends an account of his success to court.

- f Soon did the fame of the reduction of Mexico spread itself among the provinces, like the motion communicated to the waters of a stagnated lake, passing from the centre to the extremities in circles, that multiply as they advance. Every tongue spoke the praises of the Spaniards, and their admiration of the wonders they had wrought in the downfall of so vast an empire. The very terror of their name was sufficient to procure the submission of a great number of different caziques, of whom Cortez never heard before. A Spanish soldier had been seduced by the Indians into the territories of the sovereign of Mechoacan, where he was civilly used, and dismissed with such presents, as induced Cortez to send an embassy to that monarch, whose kingdom was reported to extend near three hundred leagues, in order to obtain some account of a country, which would make a valuable
- g accession to the Mexican empire. Montano, with three other Spaniards, and about twenty Indians of the first distinction, were appointed for this service. They set out on their journey, and in four days arrived at Taximaroa, a town on the frontiers of Mechoacan, by the cazique of which they were treated with great respect. On approaching the capital, they were met by a numerous and splendid deputation from the sovereign lord of Mechoacan, who assured them of his friendship and protection, out of regard for their valiant exploits, their conquests over his enemies, and the great reputation in arms which they had so justly acquired; however, when he once had them in his power, he altered his tone, questioned them with great severity about their intentions, and delivered them over to his guards to be sacrificed to his gods. Influenced by the remonstrances and persuasion of one of his counsellors, he dropped his design, and sent them away to Cortez, with presents, attended by an embassy of some of the prime nobility of his court, a promise of subjection to the king of Spain, and an assurance that he would soon make his acknowledgments in person. The presents in gold were estimated at upwards of a hundred thousand pieces of eight, besides several valuable curiosities in feathers, stones, and pieces of elegantly wrought and figured cotton. These ambassadors returned with so favourable a report of their reception, the courtesy and magnanimity of Cortez, as well as the wonders beheld in the Spanish quarters, of thunder, and other extraordinary particulars, that the king was more than ever inflamed with curiosity; however, prudence restrained his eagerness, and determined him first to send his brother, to make sure of the good intentions of the Spaniards. At last he ventured in person upon the visit to Coyoacan, where Cortez at that time resided, and began his journey with a retinue scarce inferior in splendor to that of the emperor of Mexico. The ceremonies of the salutation were extraordinary and formal. The king never condescended to address himself to the interpreter, but first spoke to his general, who reported the words to a person of inferior quality, and he to some other in a subordinate capacity, until after passing thro' several hands, they at length reached the interpreter, who explained them to Cortez. The king made a long speech, in which he acknowledged his vassalage to the king of Spain; but no formal instruments were made out, as was usually practised upon similar occasions. He was treated with the most profound reverence; he made presents of great value, received some trinkets in return, and then departed with the highest sentiments of the generosity, genius, and valour of the strangers.

RELYING upon the king's protestations of eternal friendship and fidelity, Cortez detached Christopher de Olid, with forty horse and a hundred foot, to take possession of the kingdom of Mechoacan, in the name of his catholick majesty, and settle a colony at Knitzitzilla, and was very well received by the monarch, and for some time met with no opposition in founding the projected settlement, as he proceeded gradually in his endeavours to civilize the native barbarians. It was the general's intention to open a way to the South Sea, for which purpose Olid had instructions to penetrate into the provinces of Colima; in which divers Spaniards, who had been sent on the same design, were murdered, at the time when Cortez was driven out of the city of Mexico. Gonzalo de Sandoval was detached with two hundred foot, and thirty-five horse, to facilitate the scheme, by reducing all the nations lying towards the north-sea, in order to open an immediate communication. It was in this excursion, that Sandoval built the town of Espiritu Santo. Some disturbances in the provinces called Misteca, obliged Cortez to send Alvarado, with a party, to reduce the inhabitants to obey the Spanish government, which he effected by blockading an army of natives within a fortified inclosure of stone they had erected near Ytzquintepcc. Their fortification was said to have been a league in compass, and it required all the ability of the Spanish commander, assisted by a large body of confederate Indians, to prevent the enemy from introducing provisions. At last he obliged them to surrender for want of water, after being reduced to such extremity, that they were forced to quench their thirst with drinking their own urine. Upon the report of some Spaniards, who had been sent to the provinces of Tipecoantepec, and Zacotecla, on the South Sea coast, Alvarado was ordered to assist the cazique of Tecoantepec against another neighbouring cazique. This success was purchased by presents, and promises of acknowledging the sovereignty of the Spanish government. Alvarado quartered his troops in the capital of his enemy, whom he made prisoner by a stratagem, releasing him afterwards on his paying a high ransom. The country being rich in mines, Alvarado founded a colony at Tatutepec, which he called Segura, intended for the security of the province: it was soon after abandoned, in consequence of the private disputes of the inhabitants. Upon this the natives revolted; Alvarado again marched into the country, reduced them to obedience, and entirely subdued the provinces of Sacoresco and Guimala.

GREAT discoveries were now made in the most remote provinces of the Mexican empire. Five Spaniards travelled through the interior countries, between the ridge of moun-

a rains and the north-sea, passing Xaltepeque, along the foot of Chiapa, until they arrived at Socomejco, being about four hundred leagues. By this means great part of the South Sea coast was discovered. Cortez ordered ship-builders to go to Zacotecla, to set about equipping a fleet, which he destined for the Molluco islands; all the rigging, and other materials, being brought from Vera Cruz. Christopher de Olid, at that time with a party in Mechoacan, was ordered to assist in this business; and he set out with his Spanish corps and a body of Indians, had several engagements with the Catimens, sustained considerable loss, and was forced to abandon the enterprize, until he could be reinforced. Sandoval was sent to his assistance, and he was attacked by the Catimens before he could unite himself with the troops under Olid. The battle was obstinate and bloody, the Indians fought with uncommon fury and good order; but they were in the end compleatly defeated, and so weakened, that they submitted without further resistance. A colony was founded at Colima, and lands were divided among the Spanish soldiers.

OLID having erected a settlement in Mechoacan, proceeded towards the coast of the south, upon being reinforced by Anárca de Tapia. On his arrival at Zacotecla, he committed the charge of directing the shipping to his colleague, and returned to Mexico, to assist in the expedition which Cortez was meditating in person against Garay, who had now made another attempt to settle in Panuco. The general began his march with three hundred Spanish foot, eighty horse, forty thousand Mexicans, and several field pieces. In his way he engaged the inhabitants of Ayotuxtellatlan, who, confident of victory, fell upon him with a greatly superior force, and were defeated. Not dispirited with this stroke of adverse fortune, they retired behind their lakes and morasses, rejected all overtures of peace, and even destroyed the messengers sent with proposals by Cortez, which obliged him to march to Chila, where Garay's men had formerly been defeated, to assemble some boats in the night, cross the river with a hundred Spanish foot and forty horse, and endeavour to fall upon the enemy by surprise. His scheme, however, was frustrated. In the night he found the country totally abandoned; but no sooner had day-light appeared, than he was attacked with great impetuosity, by such a multitude of Indians, as reduced him to as dangerous a situation as he had ever experienced. He triumphed, however, in the issue, by dint of valour and good fortune. The confederate Indians observing, from the opposite side, that he was engaged with the enemy, crossed the river, fell upon the Panucans in flank and rear, and made a dreadful carnage before they would yield the victory. At last, being entirely broke, the Panucans retreated with great precipitation, suffering Cortez to quarter his troops that night in a neighbouring town, where he found the cloaths and arms of Garay's soldiers hung up in triumph, and the skins of their faces stuck up to adorn the walls. In proceeding to the capital, a body of the enemy lying in an ambush, was discovered by the horse, and vigorously attacked. The courage and discipline of the Indians never shone so conspicuous as upon this occasion. They kneeled, shot their arrows, fought resolutely, and though their lines were put in confusion, rallied with the greatest exactness of the military art, and at last retreated in good order to the opposite bank of a river, where they maintained their ground until night put an end to the engagement. Next day, however, they abandoned the country, suffered the Spaniards to range about unmolested, and at last to attack their capital in the night, which yielded after great slaughter was made of the inhabitants. In consequence, all the adjacent country submitted, and Cortez founded the colony named San Estavan del Puerto, in the neighbourhood of Chila. This great town and Panuco he wholly destroyed, in revenge for the obstinacy with which they had been defended; or, as Herrera alleges, because the inhabitants were Anthropophagi, sacrificed their prisoners, and fed deliciously upon human flesh (B).

San Estavan built.

From hence the general directed his course to Tatuepec, and other towns, which had rebelled, and destroyed all the country that continued faithful to the Spaniards. He vanquished the enemy, hanged the cazique of Tatuepec, and after reducing the whole territory to obedience, returned triumphant to Mexico, where he applied himself diligently to repair the city, greatly damaged during the late siege. We have already mentioned his having appointed magistrates, and formed a regular government and police, which he sent to be ratified by his catholic majesty. He now drew a plan of the city, divided the ground among the conquerors, allotted a particular quarter for the residence of the Spaniards; and marked out places for churches, markets, and other public structures. He

(B) This expedition put Cortez to great expences. Horses were now become so scarce, that two thousand pieces of eight were given for this animal. It was the same with iron, and a horse shoe was valued at fifty pieces of eight, and every iron nail deemed worth its weight in gold (1).

surmounted

surmounted numberless difficulties in the execution of this project, suppressed a variety of conspiracies formed to obtain the emperor's release, or to murder the general. To gratify the Mexicans, he committed the superintendency of building one of the wards to Xibwara, who had been general of the imperial forces. To Pidro Motezuma, son to the emperor of that name, now baptized, he gave in charge the direction of another, allotting certain islands and streets to other persons of quality, to be disposed of at their pleasure. Cortez built a magnificent palace for himself, the work went on cheerfully, several thousand hands were continually employed, the idols were destroyed, arsenals were formed, and Mexico not only resumed its ancient lustre, but great addition of strength, beauty, and extent (C).

Attempts of Garay defeated.

It was about this period, that the commission and imperial grants made to Cortez by Charles V. came to his hands; in consequence of which he redoubled his endeavours to bring the whole Mexican empire under the Spanish dominion. He was preparing to dispatch troops to the most distant provinces, when another attempt made on Panuco, by Garay in person, obliged him to send Alvarado, with a small party, to that country, hoping that the certainty of the royal grants to Cortez would deter him from pursuing a design expressly contrary to the emperor's meaning and intention. Alvarado met with de Avalle, one of Garay's officers, who was ravaging the country; he laid before him the intention of his arrival, and acquainted him with the extent of the commission lately received by Cortez; upon which they both agreed to prosecute the public service in peace and amity. Garay was not so fortunate as his officer. Having sent some of his people to sound the inhabitants of the new colony of San Estavan del Puerto, he was invited thither, set upon by the Indians and Spaniards in the interest of Cortez, and defeated, with the loss of forty of his men taken prisoners. Four of his ships were also lost upon the coast, and the rest were one by one put by their commanders into the hands of Cortez. His affairs being quite desperate, the finishing blow was struck by Vallejo, governor of Estavan, who arrested Garay, but released him afterwards at the intercession of Ocampo; upon which he went to Mexico, threw himself at the general's feet, was pardoned, and treated with the utmost kindness and humanity.

A. D. 1524.
The farther actions, and the death of Cortez.

EVERY thing being settled on this side, Cortez bent his thoughts on finding a passage from Honduras to the South Sea, so little was the country known after the many expeditions made to it by the Spaniards. The command of this enterprise he conferred on Christopher de Olid; who had, upon many occasions, signalized his zeal and valour, and eminently distinguished his good sense and spirit. Five ships, well provided, and five hundred Spaniards, were assigned him, with which he had orders to repair first to the Havannah, where he was to purchase a great quantity of arms, provision, and other necessaries. He was to proceed afterwards to Ibuera, and there to found a colony. It was during his residence at the Havannah that he was persuaded, by the friends of Velaquez, to throw off all obedience to Cortez, and commit the first breach of that fidelity, which he had hitherto inviolably preserved upon the most trying occasions, and amidst all the vicissitudes of fortune. As to any private motives he could have, they were never known; but it is certain, that on his return to the continent, after building the town called Triumpho de la Cruz, in the neighbourhood of Cavallos, he openly avowed his intentions. Against him

(C) It merits observation, that while Cortez was thus employed in Mexico, there were many considerable discoveries made by Gonzalez d'Avila, in the large province of Nicaragua. Having built four vessels in the bay of Panama, Gonzalez set sail on the 21st of January 1522, and coasting about an hundred leagues westward, landed with a hundred men, and proceeded up the country to Nicota, where the cazique made him rich presents, and embraced christianity. From thence he proceeded to Nicaragua, the monarch of which province received him with equal civility, having been prejudiced in their favour by the loud report of the valour of the Spaniards, the sharpness of their swords, and the docility of certain warlike animals in their army, by which was meant their horses. This prince followed the example of the cazique of Nicoya, made presents to the amount of twenty-five thousand pieces of eight, and received baptism, together with nine thousand of his subjects; on condition, however, that they should be allowed to dance when they were drunk, as being a harmless recreation; to make war upon their enemies, and to wear their plumes, military trophies, and usual weapons. The cazique was very desirous of knowing, whether the Christians had any knowledge of the flood that destroyed the world, and was equally astonished at their answering in the affirmative, as they were at his question. He whispered the interpreter in the ear, asking whether those knowing people came from heaven? and whether they were not wafted upon clouds? Prodigious presents in gold plates were made by the women that received baptism, that tender sex generally carrying superstition to the greatest pitch of extravagance. But the people did not long continue their reverence for the Spaniards. They were disgusted with their rapacity and avarice. The curiosity which they expressed to know where the mines of the precious metal lay, roused their jealousy that they entertained designs of subjecting the country, and establishing colonies. The natives assembled in their own defence; they attacked the Spaniards, who were carelessly dispersed in parties round the country, skirmished with some success, but could not prevent them from uniting, and retiring to their ships with the presents they had received, valued at twelve thousand five hundred and twenty-four pieces of eight in gold, besides pearls and other jewels.

Cortez,

- a Cortez sent Francisco de la Casas, who arrived at the new settlement at the time when Olid had fitted out two vessels at the new town Saint Gil Buenavista, one of the many settlements already planted in this country by the Spaniards. At first the parties cannonaded each other from their vessels, by which one of Olid's caravals was sunk. This obliged him to make overtures of submitting to Cortez, on condition that he should be allowed to keep his command. In the midst of the treaty a tempest arose, Casas's two ships were driven a-ground, forty of his soldiers drowned, and the rest, with their commander, forced to save their lives by swimming, and to throw themselves upon the mercy of Olid. He treated the prisoners with so much kindness, that most of the soldiers enlisted under his banner; and being thus reinforced, he made prisoners several out-parties belonging to
- b Cortez, and among others, one very considerable detachment, commanded by Giles Gonzalez. Neither gratitude nor honour could engage the affections of Cortez's soldiers who had enlisted with Olid; it is probable they were instigated by Casas. First they demanded their dismissal, which being put off under various pretexts, they broke out into murmuring, and at last formed a conspiracy, which proved fatal to the life of Olid. He was assassinated in a base manner, as the just punishment of his perfidy to Cortez, who had always treated him with the marks of the strongest friendship.

SOME writers ascribe the divisions among the Spaniards in Mexico to the policy of Charles V. who dreaded the ambition and popularity of Cortez. He imagined that his towering spirit, the elevation of his genius, and the veneration in which he was held by the Mexicans, might stimulate him to usurp an independent authority, over this vast empire, and throw off all obedience to the Spanish crown, at that time rather splendid than powerful, upon account of the discord that prevailed among the different members of the widely extended imperial dominions. Herrera insinuates the jealousy of the court, by observing, that Charles paid little regard to the complaints of his general against the mutinous spirit of his officers; "thinking it convenient that so great a government should be divided," there being now little danger that the Mexicans would attempt to throw off the Spanish yoke. Cortez was preparing to set out against the revolted Olid, of whose death he had yet received no intelligence, when a number of officers, appointed by the king, arrived in Mexico. Alonso de Espada was sent in quality of treasurer, one

d Albernon came in the character of comptroller, Alernoz Chirinos was inspector, and Gonzalo de Talazar took upon him the quality of factor and agent, employments which they began to exercise with all the petulance of office, making reformatations in the whole œconomy of Cortez, endeavouring by every means to retrench his authority, and grate his spirit. They exerted themselves to frustrate the expedition meditated against Olid; but Cortez pursued his measures with success, in despite of all opposition, set out with above a hundred horse, a hundred and fifty Spanish foot, and three thousand armed Indians, for Ibueras. He was no sooner gone, than the government, now lodged in the hands of the treasurer, and the other Spanish officers lately arrived, fell into anarchy and confusion. Every man was eager to engross more power than fell to his share; and these magistrates accorded in e nothing but their enmity to Cortez, and a resolution to plunder his house, and make their own fortunes, upon a report that he perished in the attempt to reduce Olid. There was something unaccountably licentious in their behaviour. They sold off the general's goods, and those of his principal officers, as if themselves had been the nearest heirs, and they had been certain of his decease; they even arrested, tortured, and hanged the faithful Frederic Paze, the steward and kinsman of Cortez, because they supposed he had concealed the general's treasure. The treasurer carried his insolence and cruelty to such a pitch, that he ordered a Spaniard's wife to be publicly whipped, only because she expressed her suspicion, that the report concerning the general's death was ill-founded.

A. D. 1525.

- f In this manner was Cortez treated by his ungrateful countrymen at Mexico, while he was hazarding his life, and supporting incredible fatigue, in the service of the public. He passed through a wild, uncultivated, desert, marshy country, having, in the space of thirty-five leagues, crossed fifty rivers, over which he laid bridges with infinite labour, and subdued various nations, who had been seduced to revolt by the civil divisions among the Spaniards. After a victory obtained over the lord of Patouchan, he founded a little settlement in his dominions. For the space of several months he traversed barren countries, untrod by christian feet, suffered all the extremities of want, exhibited fresh and astonishing proofs of constancy and perseverance, built La Natividad on the bay of St. Andrews; and, after passing through the vast tract of country between Mexico and Honduras, returned again to the capital. It appears from Herrera's relation, that Cortez took with him the royal captive, Guatimozin, upon this expedition; probably to prevent any designs to set him at liberty, during his absence from Mexico. This monarch still retained the ambitious notion of one day re-ascending his throne, for which purpose he was continually forming some new conspiracy. At this juncture, when Cortez was pressed with the united misfortunes of famine, fatigue and disease, he set on foot a project for murdering him and his principal officers, sending advice of his design to his friends in Mexico, that they might be in readiness to second his enterprise. Happily, however, remorse seized the breast of Mexicalsin, one of the conspirators, who discovered the whole affair to Cortez, and at the same time confirmed his relation, by giving the names of all the accomplices. The general called a court martial: the emperor, and his principal officers, were tried, condemned, and hanged, with all the formalities which the situation of the place would permit; the credulous Mexicans persuading themselves, that he came to the knowledge of their contrivances by means of a sea-compass, which he always carried with him, and which he now made subservient to his policy, by cherishing the delusion of the Indians. It was at Tlaxillo that Cortez was first made acquainted with the disturbances in Mexico, the sale of his own effects, the death of his steward, and the arbitrary conduct of the new officers, with whom he had intrusted the government. No time was to be lost in deliberation; he immediately issued out commissions to some of his friends, in whom he had the greatest confidence, to supersede the present magistrates, and take the government upon themselves, until his arrival. These he dispatched by a trusty Spaniard, escorted by some Indians. The arrival of this messenger, and the certainty that Cortez was living, diffused the utmost satisfaction among his friends in the capital, and confounded his enemies, who were immediately deposed and taken into custody, to answer for their crimes to the general.
- g

As it would be descending to unnecessary minuteness, to trace Cortez through every step of this and other expeditions, made into the provinces, in order to accomplish the whole reduction of the empire of Mexico, we shall only observe, that the expedition to Xbuera was not finished before the year 1527. The next year he found it advisable to make a voyage to Spain, to solicit the court in person for more ample powers, to justify his conduct from the aspersions raised by the malignity of his enemies, and to procure a stronger curb on the seditious, headstrong humour of the inferior officers, each of whom aspired at being the first in command. He was well received by the emperor Charles V. who created him marquis of Guaxaca, procured him an honourable marriage, and conferred on him the whole viceroyalty of Atrisco, as the inadequate reward of his eminent services; but, however, he suffered Cortez to return the ensuing year to Mexico, with a very limited commission, which did not at all answer the purpose of his application. In progress of time the marquis of Guaxaca lost all civil authority, a viceroy being appointed; but retained the dignity and power of captain-general. The conduct of an ungrateful court to him, was indeed similar to what was formerly shown the celebrated Columbus. The very extraordinary services of both, made them envied by the ministry, and suspected by the monarch. When Mendoza came over to Mexico, with the commission of viceroy, the government was immediately distracted by the opposition between the civil and military officers. Like Cæsar and Pompey, Mendoza could not brook a superior, nor Cortez an equal. He had conquered Mexico, and he reasonably imagined he should reap the reward, by enjoying the full authority, civil and military, during life. However, he never once lost sight of his patriotism, nor suffered private animosity to prejudice the service of his country. He went on with all possible alacrity in reducing provinces, and making discoveries in the most remote parts of the southern continent of America. He even co-operated cordially with his rival, in attempts towards the discovery of a north-west passage, and likewise in the reduction of the provinces of Sibola and Quivera, situated at the immense distance of five hundred leagues from Mexico. A great number of expeditions were made to the northward. The Spaniards went to a country governed by a great lord, called Ticoantipe Cician Pipe, who received them hospitably, and sent ambassadors to Cortez, imagining that he had dropt from the clouds, and believing his vessels to be sea-monsters of an extraordinary nature. This prince greatly admired the Spanish horses and fire-arms; he offered them fifty thousand men to assist in reducing Tatepec, who had declared himself his enemy, on account of his partiality to the Spaniards. In the year 1542, the marquis of Guaxaca resolved to make another voyage to Spain, in consequence of certain disputes with the viceroy, relating to the late discoveries. His reception, and the success of his application, were the same as before; he was much respected and caressed by the emperor, who, however, artfully evaded taking cognizance of the dispute between the marquis and viceroy. Cortez was too penetrating not to discover the partiality of the court to his rival; however, he determined to extinguish every spark of suspicion by his conduct. He redoubled his assiduities towards the emperor, attended him in the famous expedition against a against Algiers, charged as a volunteer, was unhorsed in battle, and is reported to have lost two emeralds in the field of immense value. This was the last military action of his life; the remainder of it was spent in a retired manner; and he yielded up his last breath at a village near Seville, on the second day of December, in the year 1554, in the sixty-third year of his age.

b SUCH was the end of this illustrious conqueror, the greatest hero, and one of the brightest ornaments in the Spanish annals; who, by dint of merit, raised himself from the lowest and most adverse fortune to the highest pinnacle of wealth and renown, in despite of the malice of public and private enemies. Courage, magnanimity, constancy, prudence, and deep policy, conspired to form the soldier and the statesman; and if we find his character stained by a few blemishes, they vanish like the spots on the body of the sun, before the radiance of his glory. It would be unnecessary to dwell upon his picture; the whole series of his conduct, from his first arrival on the coast of Mexico, sufficiently speaks his extraordinary qualities; to contract the lineaments into miniature, would only serve to weaken the distinguishing features (D).

(D) The reader may observe that we have purposely omitted a variety of expeditions mentioned in the Spanish writers, because they were necessary consequences of the reduction of Mexico, and would only swell the volume, without contributing either to his instruction or amusement. We now propose to defer the account of the present state of Mexico, until we have concluded the conquest of Peru, to avoid interrupting the narrative of hostile transactions, and that the whole of the Spanish dominions in America may appear under one uniform point of view, which we imagine will have a better effect on the memory, than giving historical, natural, and geographical detached pieces.

WE have already mentioned the intimations which Nunez de Balboa, in his expeditions, had in Peru. After this officer was superseded in his command, and afterwards put to death by Peter Arias d'Avila, several attempts were made to prosecute the enterprize, but unsuccessfully. The navigation southward, from the bay of Panama, was at last deemed impracticable, on account of the winds and currents driving northward.
Hence the towns of Porto Bello and Panama, situated on opposite sides of the Isthmus, began to flourish extremely, particularly the latter, which appears to have been the seat of government, or at least the residence of the governor. Early in the year 1526, Arias made an expedition to Nicaragua, on pretence that Hernandez, one of his officers, had revolted, although it was generally supposed his intention was to oppose Cortez in the reduction of that province, and prevent his penetrating farther to the southward. He knew he was to be supplanted in his government by Pedro de los Rios, who was daily expected from Spain, and he wanted to make a new establishment independent on the new governor. Thus the discoveries southward were wholly abandoned; however, Arias had, previous to this undertaking, authorised an enterprize concerted by Francisco Pizarro, Jacobo Almagro, and Ferdinando de Lue, of making discoveries to the westward. It is sufficient presumption that no opinion of the success of this expedition was entertained, that the governor stipulated for himself no share of the profits which might arise, as was usual upon similar occasions (A). These three adventurers entered into articles never to abandon each other, or to be discouraged by any hazards or disappointments, until they had fully executed their design of discovering and conquering Peru; an agreement to which they swore in the most public and solemn manner, each of them taking upon him a certain department. In this triumvirate Pizarro shone the brightest character, upon account of the nobility of his birth, and the reputation he had acquired by former desperate and bold actions. He served in all the wars in the island of Cuba and Hispaniola, and afterwards accompanied Ojeda to the gulph of Uraba, as hath already been related, where he saved from destruction the infant colony of Darien, by his prudence and valour. He was one of the captains who had the good fortune to make the first discovery of the South Sea; he attended Arias when he settled the colony of Panama, and was employed by that officer in the reduction of Veragua. When he entered upon this enterprize, Pizarro was in the decline of life; his fortune was sufficiently easy to sit down contented; but he had a restless enterprising disposition, and eagerly aspired at being the rival of Cortez in glory. As to Almagro, he was of obscure birth, but had raised himself by his conduct to affluence and considerable reputation; while the third partner in the expedition, Ferdinando de Lue, was an ecclesiastic, proprietor of the island of Tobago, who had avarice and spirit enough to embark his fortune with those bold adventurers.

THE commission was no sooner granted, and the agreement between the parties finished, than two ships were purchased, the command of one of which Pizarro took upon himself, and set sail from Panama in the month of November 1525, having on board one hundred and fourteen Spaniards, according to Garcilasso, or eighty men and four horses, if we chuse to follow the relation of Herrera. It was matter of astonishment to see persons of discretion and property embark their fortunes in an enterprize already judged, by repeated experiments, to be desperate; but our adventurers were not discouraged. Arriving at Port Pinas, Pizarro landed with his soldiers, leaving the mariners on board, marched up the country along the banks of the river Biru, in expectation of finding provisions in the territories of the cazique of Biruquetta, and encountered all the difficulties which the roughness of the country, the want of provision, fatigue, and heavy rains, could throw in his way. Necessity obliged Pizarro to embark, though he persuaded himself that he was now in the fair tract to Peru; that the river Biru took its rise in that kingdom, and that the dominions of the cazique of Biruquetta bordered immediately upon those of the

(A) Herrera indeed alledges, that Arias demanded to have that proportion of the profits usually assigned to the governors (1); but we prefer the authority of La Vega.

- a Incas. He continued his course for ten days, every man on board being limited to two ears of Indian corn a-day, a pint of water, and scarce any animal food; a scarcity that obliged him to put to shore at the first port, land with his soldiers, and send the ships back for provision to the Pearl Islands, in the neighbourhood of Panama. During the absence of the vessel he was reduced to the utmost extremities, and forced to live on bitter palmetoes and a kind of acorns, in consequence of which twenty of his people perished. At last he met with some cocoa-nuts, and a bushel of Indian wheat, which the natives had left behind. This was immediately seized as a treasure of inestimable value. In a word, the necessity to which the Spaniards were driven in this inhospitable country, exceeds description; but they were soon forgot on the return of the ship loaded with wheat, animal food, and great abundance of fruits, roots, and pulse.

The distress he underwent.

- By this time twenty-seven of the crew were dead; but Pizarro kept up the spirits of the survivors by promises, and vast expectations of wealth and glory. Again they all embarked with a full determination to proceed, and after sailing some days, landed in a bay, which they called Puerto de Candelario. They marched up the country, perceived by the tracts cut through the woods that it was populous, came to a town which was deserted by the natives, and here met with great abundance of provision, and a booty of six hundred pieces of eight in gold. Afterwards they proceeded by sea to a place called Pueblo Quemado, from whence the ship was dispatched to Panama to be careened, Pizarro and his soldiers resolving to employ the intermediate time in discovering the nature of the country. The natives assembled to oppose them, and placed centinels all round the Spanish quarters to watch their motions, in order to fall upon the out-parties. An action was soon brought on, in which the Spaniards lost three soldiers, killed by the Indian poisoned darts, which so elated them, that they attacked Pizarro with great resolution in the town, while Mentengro was absent with sixty men. They were received with valour; but the Spaniards must have sunk under the infinite superiority of numbers, had not the out-party returned seasonably, fallen upon the rear of the enemy, and obtained a complete victory. Not many days after the ship returned refitted, bringing a reinforcement of men, and supplies of provision, to the great joy of the adventurers. They proceeded to Chinchama, and were there joined by Almagro with another ship, sixty-four Spaniards, and abundance of arms, ammunition, and provision. Here fresh consultations being held, it was resolved their force was too inconsiderable, and that Almagro should return to Panama to enlist more soldiers, while Pizarro endeavoured to gain some farther knowledge of the country. It was not long before Almagro returned with a commission from Arias, by which he was raised to an equal command with Pizarro; this was an affront to the pride of the latter, but he then suppressed his sentiments, and determined to make use of the fresh supplies towards promoting the end of the expedition.

- SAILING in company from Chinchama, they coasted along to a river, which they called St. John's. On the banks of this river they surprised a town, where they found a booty of fifteen thousand pieces of eight, with some provisions. A new resolution was now formed to apply the profits of the expedition towards raising a still more formidable armament, for which purpose Almagro again returned to Panama with the treasure. Pizarro continued on shore with the bulk of the soldiers; and the pilot, Bartholomew Ruyz, was dispatched, with the other ship, to make discoveries along the coast. He advanced to the island Del Gallo, discovered the bay of St. Matthew, and took a large float, with a triangular sail, upon which were two boys and three women, who appeared to be Peruvians, which afforded the utmost satisfaction. Ruyz proceeded on his course, until he arrived at De Raffado, under the line, and then returned to Chinchama.

The Spaniards find some treasure.

- THE new governor, Pedro de los Rios, gave more countenance to the enterprize than his predecessor. He assisted Almagro in enlisting troops, gave him forty of the soldiers he had brought with him from Spain, equipped him in every necessary, and put on board several horses, with which supply Almagro joined his colleague Pizarro. All now advanced under the direction of Ruyz to the island of Gallo, where a dispute arose between the commanders, that had almost blasted the whole hopes of the enterprize. This infused doubts, fears, and jealousies, among the troops, who were all unanimous in returning to Panama; but these murmurs were at length quieted, and Almagro once more dispatched to Panama for further succours. We are thus minute, only to shew the difficulties which attended this great undertaking, which, from a very unpromising aspect, terminated successfully, beyond the most sanguine expectations. All possible care was taken to prevent the soldiers from transmitting home an account of the unfortunate occurrences of the voyage, the sickness and famine that prevailed.

Desperate state of the Spaniards.

It was from the island of Gallo that Almagro took his departure. Here Pizarro thought of remaining till his return; but perpetual rains pouring down from the heavens, the great scarcity of provisions, the discontent which appeared among the natives, and the prodigious swarms of musquitos that tortured the soldiers, and occasioned ulcers and sores in different parts of their bodies, obliged him to make preparations for returning to the continent. While he was thus employed, a vessel arrived from Panama, with advices from Almagro, upon which the people grew clamorous to return, obliged the captain to take them on board, and only thirteen Spaniards and a mulatto remained with Pizarro. a

The Spaniards

In all appearance the enterprize was now entirely defeated, Pizarro's affairs appeared quite desperate; but he determined to perish in the attempt, rather than return disappointed in his expectations. Mean time supplies arrived from Almagro, who, incensed at the desertion of the troops, immediately sent another ship to carry off Pizarro, with his few faithful attendants. Bartolomew Ruyz commanded this vessel, and he concerted with Pizarro to pursue their discoveries, instead of returning to Panama, according to the intention of Almagro. Holding their course south-west, they arrived, in twenty days, at an island on the coast of Tumbez, and soon perceived they were come into a wealthy country, from the great number of bits of gold and silver which they found in the form of hands, heads, womens breasts, and one silver pitcher that contained twelve quarts. This revived their hopes, and encouraged them to pursue their voyage, in the course of which they took a large bark, manned with fifteen Indians, cloathed in tunics and mantles, made of fine yellow wool. Next day they fell in with four more barks, which they understood were destined on an expedition against the natives of Puna. Pizarro dismissed the Indians after the kindest treatment, desiring they would inform their caziques that his intentions were friendly. This produced the proposed effect. The caziques marvelling at what they had been told of the sails, the rigging of the ship, the complexion, the beards, and the civility of the Spaniards, immediately dispatched twelve floats, loaded with all manner of provisions, and a lamb, sent by the virgins of a temple, a present that excited astonishment among the Spaniards, who little expected to have met with this species of quadruped upon that coast. An Orejan, or nobleman of Peru, came on board himself, with whatever the country afforded. A Spanish soldier had the resolution to land singly, enter the fort at Tumbez, and suffer himself to be brought before the great monarch, Huayna Capac, who treated him civilly, and sent him back with several presents. The soldier's relation of the prodigious wealth he had beheld was so incredible to the Spaniards, that they dispatched Pedro de Condin, a person of approved integrity, for further information. Condin was conducted to the governor of the fort, saw, with astonishment, the truth of the soldier's report; fired his musket at the desire of the cazique, who was highly delighted with the novelty of the artificial thunder, and poured abundance of liquor down the barrel, saying, "Drink, since you can vomit fire, and imitate the heavenly thunder." Both La Vega and Herrera alledge, that the Spaniard was ordered to defend himself against a lion and a tyger let loose upon him; that he fired his piece, and these wild beasts came tamely up, and licked his hands, to the great amazement of the spectators, who were then convinced that the Spaniards were divinities. He was dismissed, after both sides had gratified their curiosity, and informed his companions that he had seen a rich temple, built by Huayna Capac, dedicated to the sun, and inhabited only by two hundred noble and beautiful virgins, to whom none of the other sex were admitted, except on particular occasions. Here he said was treasured up such an infinity of gold and silver, in curiously wrought vessels, as exceeded belief. The fortress of Tumbez, he said, was filled with silver-smiths, who converted into wrought plate the taxes levied by the crown-officers; in a word, he so inflamed the imagination of Pizarro and his crew, that they regarded this immense wealth as already within their grasp, and determined to encounter all possible danger. It was resolved to proceed to Paita, where Pizarro was informed there was a good harbour; and he accordingly run down the coast to the seventh degree of south latitude (B), as far as where Truxillo was afterwards founded. Pizarro would have pursued his course, as he found the natives received a favourable impression of his people, from their behaviour at Tumbez; but his crew being impatient to return to Panama, he yielded to their remonstrances, from the consideration, that what he had already discovered would give sufficient reputation to the expedition, and that to execute his whole design, a much greater force, and more extensive powers, would be necessary. To- g

(B) The reader, unacquainted with the geography of America, will observe that a town of this name stands on the northern coast, between the capes of Honduras and Camacon, south-west of the bay of Honduras. We have already mentioned that Cortez's troops went thither.

a wards the close of the year 1527, he arrived safe at Panama, after having spent three years in a voyage attended with incredible hardships.

THE success of the voyage was related to the partners in the enterprize, and confirmed by the specimens of woollen cloth, gold, silver, and precious stones, shewn by Pizarro. There were inducements enough to pursue the undertaking, but there were likewise impediments that appeared insurmountable. The three colleagues had exhausted all their fortunes in the armaments already made; however, this difficulty was removed, by the great reputation which the discoveries had acquired, that enabled them to borrow money. No sooner was this obstruction conquered, than another no less important arose. The governor refused to renew their commission, and they were now forced to sit down with their b loss, tantalized with the near prospect of wealth and honour, or to apply to the court of Spain for powers, with very little certainty of succeeding. This last resolution, however, was taken, and the event warranted the most sanguine expectations. Pizarro took upon himself this commission. He set sail for Old Spain, was honoured with an audience of the emperor, related the dangers he had encountered in his tedious fatiguing voyage, displayed the specimens he had brought of the produce of the countries he had discovered, and obtained the commission of Adelentado, or lieutenant of Peru, of captain-general, and governor of all those territories which the Spaniards, under his auspices, might conquer in Peru, together with the rank and title of a nobleman; for which reason we afterwards find him stiled Don Francisco, by Garcilasso de la Vega (C). According to this writer, the same c honour was conferred on Almagro, whom he distinguishes constantly by the title of Don Diego. Attended by four brothers, Pizarro embarked at Seville, and arrived at Panama, after a short and prosperous voyage, where contests soon arose. Almagro resented his claiming to himself the whole authority of commander, though he had been an equal contributor to the discovery, had spent a large fortune in the service, and lost an eye in one of the skirmishes with the Indians. He demanded at least an equality; and there was not wanting busy friends to inflame the rising animosity. Mutual interest at length silenced the parties, though it did not extinguish the sparks of jealousy. They proceeded in their undertaking, and suppressed, but did not forget their resentment. Two ships well manned and provided, horses, and all other necessities, were bought up by Almagro, and d put under the direction of Francisco Pizarro, upon that gentleman's transferring to him the title of Adelentado, and promising to exert his interest with the court of Spain, to procure a ratification of this assignment.

Pizarro sets sail for Spain, and receives powers from the court.

HAVING, by the interest and influence of the three colleagues, drawn together near two hundred men, another vessel was added to render the navigation more commodious, and Pizarro, attended by his brothers Hernando, Juan Gonzalo, and his half-brother Martin de Alcantara, began his voyage towards the beginning of the spring of 1530. He sailed from Panama, with intention not to touch at any port before he arrived at Tumbez; but meeting with adverse winds and currents, he landed a hundred leagues short of this destination, designing to proceed by land, and send the ships back to the settlement. In this e march the Spaniards encountered numberless difficulties. Entering into a barren country, they were soon pressed with famine. The way was rough and tedious, over mountains, rivers, and morasses. Floats were every day making with great labour and fatigue, over which they passed with equal danger and difficulty. Don Francisco Pizarro was himself the sole guide and director, and indeed he conducted every thing with equal prudence and vigour, animating his people by his exhortations and example, and bearing a principal share in every hazardous and laborious action. Such was his patience, humility, and perseverance, that he often assisted in carrying the sick upon his own shoulders. After wading thro' unspeakable hardships, the Spaniards at length reached the province of Coaqui, which f Herrera calls Quaque, proceeded to the capital of the same name, seated among the high mountains, found great abundance of provision, and a booty in gold and silver to the value of twenty thousand pieces of eight, and a great number of fine emeralds, many of which the Spaniards destroyed, by making injudicious experiments. Trying the hardness of the jewel, they are reported to have broke in pieces turquoises and emeralds of four

He resumes the expedition to Peru.

(C) This is all we find upon the authority of Garcilasso; but Herrera adds, that Pizarro, after the council had taken his remonstrances into consideration, was not only honoured with the preceding honours and employments, but allowed to build forts, and erect settlements, where he thought proper, the government of them to be in him and his heirs; also a salary of a thousand ducats yearly during his life. He was besides entitled to a twentieth part of the profits arising from his conquests, provided this share did not exceed one thousand five hundred ducats yearly. Almagro was made governor of Tumbez, and raised to the dignity of a gentleman, while Lugue was recommended to the pontiff to be made bishop of Tumbez, and protector-general of the Indians (1).

thousand ducats value; an instance of inconceivable ignorance, in which they were imitated by the soldiers of Pedro de Alvarado, who afterwards came into this country. The inhabitants of the town thought it strange that the Spaniards should plunder men who never injured them; they admitted them freely into their houses; but when they saw them begin to pillage, they fled to the mountains. The cazique hid himself in his palace, but was discovered, and brought to Pizarro, who found some difficulty in convincing this honest barbarian that he had not violated the laws of hospitality. This indeed was an imprudent step, which entirely destroyed the reputation of gentleness, lenity, and integrity, which the Spaniards acquired in the preceding run upon the coast, and that could only be justified by the necessity they were in for money to raise further supplies. The value of twenty-four thousand ducats was now remitted in gold to Almagro, together with some emeralds of extraordinary size and beauty, among which there was one belonging to Pizarro of the size of a pigeon's egg. Two ships were dispatched to Panama, and one to Nicaragua, while Pizarro remained some months in the neighbourhood of Coaqui, under the equinoctial, exposed to the intemperature of the climate, the intense heat by day, and the chilling damps in the night. Garcilasso relates, that the Spaniards were afflicted with a loathsome disease, which at first appeared in swellings on the head and face, resembling wens, or large warts, that soon digested, and dropt an ichor. He compares this tumor to a ripe fig, says that it was not always mortal, though great numbers died of the disease; and to confirm his report, affirms that he saw three Spaniards at Cuzco ill of the distemper, who recovered. Besides the unhealthiness of the country, the Spaniards had other dangers to encounter. It was easily perceived that the natives had not forgot the pillaging of their town, though they dared not break out into open hostilities. A Spanish soldier dared hardly to stir out of the town singly and unarmed, the Indians having killed two who had ventured to roam about carelessly, which obliged Pizarro to seize upon the person of the cazique. He released him upon his promise to keep his people within subjection, and restrain them by the laws of hospitality, which required that strangers, who entertained no bad designs, should be entertained with civility; an argument which did not carry conviction to the mind of the prince, although his circumstances required he should appear satisfied. These things determined him to proceed to Tumbez, even before the return of the shipping; and it was on his march thither, according to Garcilasso, that he overtook a body of Spaniards, under the conduct of Sebastian Balazar and Juan Fernandez, who came from Nicaragua to make conquests in Peru, upon the report spread of the immense wealth of the country. We are not told in what manner they traversed this vast extent of country; it is probable they came by sea, the march by land being next to impracticable. Sufficient it is for our purpose, that both those officers cheerfully united their forces to those of Pizarro, and put themselves under his direction; so that he now imagined his strength was equal to the enterprize meditated against the fort of Tumbez, and the island Puna. This fortunate reinforcement of upwards of thirty men, was picked up in the province of Puerto Viejo, from whence the Spaniards set out for Tumbez.

The court of Quito receives information of their progress.

ADVICE of all that was doing by the strangers was regularly sent to Atabualapa, king of Quito, a province of the empire, bestowed upon him as an inheritance by his father Huayna Capac, with the consent of his elder brother Huascar. By this time Atabualapa, whom some call Atabalipa, had taken upon him the tuft, or tassel, which is the badge of regal dignity in that country. He was fortunately for the Spaniards embroiled, at this juncture, with his brother, which probably prevented his sending an army against them, as he expressed great concern at their conduct, and wondered what could induce them to traverse seas and lands, encounter enemies, sickness, and famine, merely for the sake of making discoveries, and changing the religion of other nations, which was all they alleged for a motive. Pizarro meeting with no opposition from the monarch, advanced directly to the strait opposite to Puna, and was preparing to pass over, when murmurs broke out among his troops, who desired to return to Puerto Viejo, to found a colony;
however, he persuaded them, with many arguments, of the bad consequences that would necessarily attend their betraying any symptoms of fear to the Indians. He represented Puna and Tumbez as the keys of Peru, extremely rich in themselves, and the proper places for founding settlements, in order to assist and promote their future conquests. At last he prevailed, the soldiers consenting to make the experiment, whether the wealth of those places would answer the trouble of the conquest. The islanders were at perpetual war with the people of Tumbez, and it was Pizarro's intention to enter into a confederacy with them, the more easily to effect his designs against the Punese and Tumbezans. The former were no sooner acquainted with the intention of the Spaniards, than they turned into ridicule

a cule the fear and simplicity of the Tumbezans, for admitting such warlike strangers into their country; however, they sent Pizarro an invitation to come over to their island, though their purpose was to destroy his whole army, by cutting the joints of the floats upon which the Spaniards were transported. The cazique Tomala accordingly sent a great number of floats already made; but the diligence of the Indians created suspicion of some evil design. The interpreters intimidated their fears, and he prudently deferred his embarkation, until his brother Hernando arrived with the remainder of the forces. This delay made the cazique impatient, fearing lest his design should miscarry; and to expedite measures, he passed over in person to the continent, to pay his compliments to Pizarro, and endeavour to prevail on him to accept his invitation without delay. He seemed greatly astonished when the Spanish commander taxed him with treachery; but as there appeared no symptoms of guilt upon his countenance, Pizarro, to make himself certain of the inclinations of the Indians, ordered some men to get upon the floats, and keep constantly upon their guard. They were safely wafted over to Puna, and entertained with so much kindness, that it was soon believed the whole suspicion was groundless. Nor is it at all impossible that fear might have suggested that idea of treachery upon this occasion to the Spaniards, notwithstanding the disputes which afterwards ensued with the islanders.

PIZARRO had brought with him to the island several natives of Tumbez, which gave great offence to the Punese, who could not bear to see their inveterate enemies walking about their territories, under the protection of the Spaniards. It was this, according to some accounts, that gave the first disgust, made them offer sacrifices to their gods, and interrogate their idols about the means of revenge. After long deliberation, it was at last concerted that the Spaniards should be invited to a great hunt, where they imagined the strangers might easily be surprised and destroyed. Notice was given to Pizarro, by his interpreters, of the conspiracy, some hints relating to it having dropped from the natives. Some ascribe the discovery to the Tumbezans, and others treat the whole as a fiction, propagated by the Spaniards, to apologize for their unjust attack, and perfidious breach of the rites of hospitality. Be this as it may, all writers are agreed about the issue; that he fell upon the islanders, took their sixteen caziques prisoners, whom he delivered over to their enemies the Tumbezans, routed the Punese in divers engagements, reduced the whole island, and acquired immense booty, of which his allies, the Tumbezans, had their proportion (D). The misfortunes of the Punese did not dispirit them; they were defeated by the Spaniards, insulted by the Tumbezans, forsaken by the inca, and their caziques were galling pressures to a free people. Their first attempt was upon a Spanish ship arrived on the coast, to attack which they sent three hundred archers upon floats, while the rest of the natives should fall upon the Spaniards on the island. The attack of the floats was desperate, but fruitless; the cannon of the ship having sunk and destroyed them, before they could reach within the distance required by the archers. On shore, their projects were equally abortive. The Spaniards repulsed them in every assault, and drove them to the mountains, whence they made excursions, that rather harrassed the Spaniards, than effected the original purpose of the revolt. And now this scheme was totally defeated by the arrival of supplies, brought in two vessels from Nicaragua, by Ferdinando Soto, who was sent with men, horses, and provisions, by Almagro. Upon the arrival of these succours, the resolution was taken of passing over to the continent, Pizarro relying upon the friendship of the Tumbezans, whose affections he imagined he had gained by the conquest of their enemies, the share of the plunder, and the Punese caziques whom he had surrendered into their hands, as well as the prisoners of their nation he had set at liberty, after they were long confined by the enemy, and in danger of being sacrificed. He gave them notice of his intention; and Garcilasso alledges from Gomara, that they put the messengers to death. Herrera affirms, he had so little doubt of their friendship, that he embarked a

(D) The island of Puna, standing in the bay of Guaquil, in the third degree of south latitude, contained upwards of twelve thousand inhabitants, though it was not six leagues in diameter. In the division of the empire, between the two sons of Huayna Capac, it fell to the share of the elder, Huascar, although Atahualpa pretended a right, as part of his kingdom of Quito. It was this dispute which had now revived the ancient animosity between them and the Tumbezans, who had first reduced them under the dominion of the incas of Peru. The Punese, indeed, relying upon the natural strength of their situation, had long practised piracy, infesting all the coast of Guaquil, and robbing the Tumbezans upon all occasions. The war was carrying on with great vigour at the time Pizarro arrived upon the coast, and he had the address to make his advantage of the enmity of the Indians. The Punese were cannibals, their island was fertile, but the scarcity of water rendered it unwholesome, and intolerable to any besides the natives. Prodigious quantities of gold and silver were found in the temples, all which Pizarro remitted to Panama, to be employed in augmenting his fleet and army.

part of his people on floats, and passed over without any previous intimation, which the Tumbezans resented so much, that they seized upon the first men who landed, conducted them to the town, pulled out their eyes, cut off their privities, and then flung them into cauldrons of boiling water, in which they perished miserably. What motive could prompt them to this act of violence, is not ascertain'd. Probably they either dreaded the resentment of the inca, for entertaining foreigners, whose views were suspicious, or they apprehended sharing the fate of the Puncse. All the floats were in the utmost danger, the stream being rapid, and the Indians, who navigated them, treacherous. The greater part of Pizarro's baggage was plundered; but he, getting safe on shore with the horse, soon revenged the injury, fell upon the town, and made terrible slaughter of the inhabitants. A variety of skirmishes and battles were fought; but the Indians, perceiving themselves worsted upon every occasion, began to entertain an opinion that the Spaniards were invincible, that they were assisted by some divinity, and that themselves were guilty of enormous crimes, in attempting to oppose the will of heaven. They now endeavoured to appease the Spaniards by immense presents of silver, upon which metal they observed they put a great value. One Indian in particular, of some quality, entered into an intimacy with the Spaniards, and had such particular favour shewn him, that a cross was put up in his house, to shew that it was exempted from being plundered. He related marvellous stories of the wealth of the empire and the grandeur of Cuzco, the residence of inca Huascar, assured the Spaniards of the facility with which they might effect the conquest of the empire, amidst the present civil commotions, and so inflamed the ambition of Pizarro, that he instantly set out on a march to examine the country, and endeavour to reduce some of the neighbouring little princes. First, however, he dispatched a vessel to Panama with all the treasures found in Tumbez, to be laid out by Almagro, as the former remittances were, in enlisting men, and sending supplies of provision, arms, and ammunition. The sovereign of Tumbez had taken refuge in the mountains, upon the late defeat of his troops; and Pizarro laboured to get him into his hands, which was one of the chief objects of his expedition. In this excursion he reached the beginning of the great road of the inca's leading to the principal cities; but his men being harrassed with fatigue, he was forced to return without succeeding in any of the points proposed. Ferdinando Soto was at the same time detached with a party, with a similar design. He marched as far as Caxas, saw many flocks of Peruvian sheep, a number of magnificent buildings, found some bars of gold and silver, defeated the natives in battle, discovered the great road called Huana Capac, and then returned to Tumbez, where he joined Pizarro, who had finished his unsuccessful expedition a few days before. It was after this junction that Pizarro determined to found a colony among the vales of Tongarala, to secure his footing in the country, and serve for a place of arms, retreat, and refreshment. Accordingly he built the city of St. Miguel de Piura, and appointed the soldiers least fit to endure fatigue as a garrison and magistrates, dividing among them the territories of Tumbez and Piura, as a district to the city, and the lands of the new settlement (E).

Civil war in Peru.

WHILE he was employed in the business of the colony, various accounts daily arrived of the fortune of the civil war now raging between the brothers Huascar and Atabualapa. Pizarro thought it necessary to keep a strict eye upon every event, as great part of his hope was founded upon the intestine commotions of the empire, which would prevent either of the brothers from paying much regard to the accidental arrival of a handful of strangers upon the coast. With this view his brother Juan was ordered to penetrate farther into the country with fifty horse; at the same time he employed himself in making the necessary preparations for following this party, and in gaining the best intelligence concerning the country, the customs and manners of the inhabitants, their civil and military policy, method of fighting, power, and the cause of the present war, together with the disposition of the people in general with respect to the rival princes. He learned that Atabualapa, of whom we have spoken, was much more popular than the emperor, though only a natural son of the late prince, by one of his concubines; that in the wars carried on by his

(E) St. Miguel was the first Spanish colony planted in Peru, now called New Castile; but it did not continue long in that situation. It was found to be unhealthy, which obliged the Spaniards to remove it from Tongarala, to the place where it now stands, nearer the coast, and surrounded by beautiful and fruitful vallies. These they cultivated with great diligence, raising great variety of European vegetables, which flourished as if in their native soil, though the climate is extremely dry, and the soil sandy. Vines and figs in particular bear astonishingly, and two crops of wheat shoot up every year. Formerly this valley was populous, and the inhabitants independent of the inca of Peru (1).

(1) Her. dec. iii. lib. v. sec. iii.

a father he had signalized his courage, and gained the affections of all the commanders of eminence; that he was politic, affable, liberal, and generous, by which means he had engaged a strong party to support him in disputing the imperial crown with his brother; though he alone, of forty brothers, had the ambition or boldness to lift their minds to so great an enterprize. In Quito he was already acknowledged as inca; though, by the emperor's will, this province was only given him as a fief and dependency on the imperial crown. Huascar took umbrage at this presumption, and after holding a council, sent notice to Atabualapa, that he could not possibly shut his eyes to a conduct so injurious to his own person, so dangerous to his crown, so impious in itself, and so contrary to the established laws of the empire. He therefore requested that he would desist from his ambitious practices, which must necessarily terminate in civil discord, his own, and perhaps the ruin of his people. At the same time he levied an army, to give weight to his message, and enforce obedience.

b Little attention did Atabualapa give to a remonstrance which he expected, and for which he was prepared. Elated with his popularity, hurried on by his ambition, he thought probably of rivalling his brother, by building a city at Quito equal to the imperial residence at Cuzco, and then he enlarged his views to the conquest of the whole Peruvian empire. He began to sound the sentiments of some of the lesser provinces, and finding them averse to every measure that threatened to disturb the public tranquillity, he directed his march towards the capital, to meet his brother the emperor, to whom he gave battle c with such success, as obliged Huascar to retire precipitately to repair and augment his scattered forces. Upon this he proceeded to the capital, subduing all the provinces in his way. On his arrival at Caxamalca, he received a more particular account of Pizarro's transactions at Puna and Tumbez, and therefore formed the resolution of remaining there with part of his troops, while the rest were sent to give battle to his brother, who had again taken the field with a fresh army. The two armies met in the vale of Xauxa, with nearly equal forces, each exceeding a hundred and forty thousand men. The conflict was bloody, and victory, a second time, declared for Atabualapa. A third battle was fought with similar fortune; and the emperor was soon after treacherously seized in the heart of his capital, and delivered up into the hands of his brother and rival. His women were d infamously and inhumanly treated, his effects plundered, and his royal person thrown into a dungeon.

This series of prosperity gave Atabualapa more time to reflect upon the arrival of Pizarro; but when he was told that his troops did not exceed two hundred men, he made light of the affair, and thought it impossible that so inconsiderable a body could ever give the least shock to so vast an empire. Accordingly he contented himself with sending an orator, or nobleman of his court, to dive into the designs of the Spaniards, for which purpose that nobleman employed a number of emissaries in Tumbez. Such was the situation of the empire, when Pizarro departed from St. Miguel on the fourth of September, on his way to Caxamalca, at the distance of twelve days journey (F). Floats were prepared e for crossing the river, in three days he came up with an officer he had sent with a detachment to reduce the cazique, or Caraen, of Piura. In the vale of this name, Pizarro continued for ten days, making the necessary provision for his march, and procuring the best intelligence possible of the progress and strength of Atabualapa. Before he renewed his march, a general muster was made of the forces, which amounted to sixty-seven horse, and a hundred and ten foot, of whom nine returned to fort St. Miguel, on Pizarro's declaring, at the head of the army, that all who had no inclination to proceed should have lands assigned them in the new colony, for that he reposed more confidence in the valour of a few, than in the shew of a number. So bold a declaration gave Pizarro great reputation with the soldiers; and he well knew how to make his advantage of his character, to f strengthen his own authority, and raise the hopes of his people.

His affairs being thus adjusted, Pizarro boldly advanced through a hostile country altogether unknown to him, with all the caution required in such critical circumstances, and soon reached the frontiers of the Curaca Pever, a powerful vassal of the imperial crown, notwithstanding he had been grievously oppressed by the late inca, Huayna Capac. The Spaniards, upon his invitation, took up their quarters in his town, and were kindly treated. Here Pizarro gained better information of the state of the war, the situation of the country, and every particular that could forward his designs. Among other pieces of information, he learnt, that a body of Atabualapa's forces lay at Caxas, a town in his way to Caxa-

malca, at the distance only of two days journey. A captain, with a party, was detached a before, to view the place, and endeavour to cultivate an alliance with the people. Pizarro followed slowly, and halted at a town called Zamen, to wait for the return of the party. In five days a messenger returned from Caxas, with the following relation, that the captain had endeavoured to surprise the town, but found it unnecessary, the people being extremely civil; that the inca's officer had received him in the most cordial manner, and given him all the information he could require of the present condition of the empire, of which he must be a competent judge, on account of his employment of collecting the tribute in the different provinces: that this officer related wonders of the wealth of Cuzco, the metropolis, at which Atabualapa now resided. The captain had orders to rejoin the main body with his detachment, upon which Pizarro proceeded first to Caxas, and then to Guacacamba. b At the former of these towns, struck with the appearance of a large building, enclosed with mud walls, like a fortress, he was informed that it was the residence of a great number of women, employed in spinning and weaving cloth for the royal army, no males being admitted entrance. In going out of the town, he perceived a number of men suspended by the heels, and was told they were punished in this manner for presuming to enter the female hospital, which was deemed sacred. In his march he was accosted by an Indian of distinction, who called himself an ambassador from Atabualapa, presented him with two cups of stone curiously wrought, a load of a kind of perfumed powder, and assurances that the inca desired nothing more than the friendship of the strangers, with whose valour and heroic qualities he was not unacquainted. c It was not difficult for Pizarro to discover that this Indian was sent as a spy; but he disguised his sentiments, ordered him to be well treated, and dismissed with presents and promises of duty and respect towards the inca. To keep the colony of St. Miguel in spirits, he sent back an account of his progress, and a present of the cups, and several pieces of beautiful woollen and cotton cloth, finely adorned with flowers of gold and silver, charging the garrison to live upon terms of amity with all the surrounding Indians. Guacacamba, a day's journey from Caxas, was a city of more consequence, secured and beautified by a fine fortress built of stone, a large river, and a variety of bridges and causeways. Through these towns passed the great road of the incas, exceeding the distance of four hundred leagues from Cuzco to Quito, paved with the utmost art, and so broad that six horses marched easily a-breast. d In every part it was supplied with water, brought at a vast expence in pipes from distant mountains, and at the end of every four leagues were tambos, or houses of refreshment for travellers, supported by a small toll.

It would seem that Pizarro now quitted the great road leading to Cuzco, upon information that the inca was at Caxamalca; for we find him passing through a desert, in which he was reduced to the utmost necessity for water, before he reached Motex. The curaca of this town was now serving, at the head of three hundred men, in the inca's army; nevertheless, the commanding officer in the town consented that no hostilities should be committed upon either side, and that the Spaniards should have free quarters, to refresh themselves for a day or two after their fatiguing journey. e It was matter of astonishment and horror to Pizarro and his people, to observe the periodical human sacrifices that were offered to the idols. On a certain day in every month the faces of those false deities were sprinkled with fresh blood, issuing from the veins of the wretched victim; and in such reverence was this religious ceremony observed, that when sacrifices were wanting, many voluntarily devoted themselves to the purposes of piety, and rejoiced at the happiness of being cut in pieces by the sacred hands of those ministers of fraud and impostor, who exercised the hierarchy. Besides these scenes of horror, the length of the march, the heat of the climate, the sultry closeness of the atmosphere, the scarcity of water, and the sometimes intolerable fervour of the sun-beams reflected from the sand, pressed exceeding hard f upon the Spaniards, who were supported only by the hopes of ending their toils in the utmost affluence and splendor of fortune and reputation. After surmounting a variety of hardships, Pizarro at length arrived on the banks of a river, the opposite sides of which was covered with towns and villages. To prevent the Indians from obstructing his passage on floats, he ordered his brother, captain Hernando, to swim over with a party of horse; at whose approach the natives retired in the utmost consternation, being equally astonished and terrified at the novelty of the men swimming over upon the backs of animals, whom they guided in the water as if they had been canoes. Hernando seized some of the inhabitants in their flight, and by his dexterous management convinced them that no violence g was intended, and that they might safely return to their habitations. Yet could he obtain no information, until he put one to the torture, who then declared that Atabualapa expected the Spaniards in a warlike posture; that his army was divided into three columns, each

- a each of which was determined to dispute the progress of the strangers; and that one corps was at the foot of the mountain, on the way to Caxamalca, another on the summit, and a third on the opposite declivity. The Indian farther added, that the inca would now have been pursuing the conquest of the provinces; but that he thought it advisable to destroy the Spaniards before their numbers were augmented, or that they had raised a party in the country. Upon this information Pizarro made floats, crossed the river without opposition, quartered his troops in a fort of which he took possession, and sending for the curaca, was told by him, that the army at Caxamalca exceeded fifty thousand fighting men. The curaca declared himself the enemy of Atahualpa, who had put to death four thousand of his subjects, because he had supported his lawful sovereign against an ambitious usurper.
- b What the curaca chiefly lamented was the loss of five hundred women, violently forced from the arms of their husbands and parents, and surrendered to gratify the brutal licentiousness of the conqueror's soldiers.

PIZARRO found it necessary to refresh his men in this friendly town, and employ the time in procuring still more minute intelligence. An Indian offered himself for this service, but refused to act as a spy. He said he would throw himself at the feet of the inca, deliver any message the Spaniards thought proper, and bring back the best information in his power; but he would not take upon him any employment that would injure his character, or subject him to a violent and ignominious punishment. The generous sentiments of this barbarian greatly delighted Pizarro; he believed he might safely trust a man who

c had expressed himself so boldly and so virtuously; accordingly he dispatched him to Atahualpa, to salute that prince in his name, to offer him the best services of the Spaniards, and to signify that they were in full march to have the honour of prostrating themselves before him, and of meriting his friendship; their sole intention being to fight his enemies, without injuring his subjects. The Indian set out on his embassy; and Pizarro, after having fully refreshed his troops, began his journey, and after three days march reached the mountain where Atahualpa was said to have a body of forces. He ascended the hill without any other opposition than what he met with from the steepness and roughness of the ascent. At the head of forty horse, and the bulk of the infantry, he quietly approached a fortress, seated on a high eminence, of so difficult access, that it was scarce possible to d advance with the horse, the whole rock being cut in the form of an irregular steep stair. Round the fortress was a stone-wall, built upon the brink of a perpendicular rock upon every side, except the pass we have described. Had the least opposition been given, it would have been utterly impossible to have gained possession of this fort with double the number of men that composed the Spanish army; and it was matter of great rejoicing, that a difficulty, surpassing imagination, should be so easily overcome. Here Pizarro halted for the remainder of his forces and the baggage, forming to himself the most favourable presages from this fortunate incident. All conjectured that the inca had no intention to treat them as enemies, else he would certainly have disputed this post; but it afterwards

e appeared, that his policy was to suffer the Spaniards to advance into the heart of the country, that he might then have them in his power, without the possibility of their escaping.

WHILE the Spaniards were resting themselves on the tops of the mountains, which they had gained with infinite labour, an embassy arrived from the inca, in consequence of the message sent by Pizarro. The ambassador had a pretty numerous retinue: he presented the general with ten Peruvian sheep, sent by his imperial majesty, some other things of a trifling nature; and then desired to know, in the name of his master, at what time the Spaniards proposed reaching Caxamalca, that accommodations on the road might be got ready. He related the course of the inca's victories, and contradicted all the reports of f his having forces with him at Caxamalca; saying, that he only staid there to make preparations for the reduction of some provinces that still held out for his brother, who was now a prisoner. To this Pizarro made answer, that he rejoiced at the prosperity of his imperial majesty, and thanked him for the good will he had shewn towards strangers, whose commission was of more importance than he could well imagine. He desired the ambassador to acquaint Atahualpa, that he was the servant of the greatest monarch in the universe, sent to reclaim him and his people from the most impious and abominable errors in religion: he therefore hoped that he would receive him peaceably, in which case he might rely upon his faithful services; but if, on the contrary, any hostilities were offered, and his

g majesty preferred war to peace, he would soon find that the Spaniards could make themselves as dreadful to their enemies as useful to their friends. With this answer the ambassador took his leave, and the Spaniards proceeded on their march, halting that night in a beautiful valley, at the foot of the mountain. Here Pizarro was honoured with another embassy, and more presents, of much the same nature as the former. The retinue of this minister was extremely magnificent, and all his servants drank out of silver vases, which gave the Spaniards the most exalted opinion of the extraordinary wealth of their master, which indeed the ambassador cherished by his discourse. Next morning the Indian messenger returned; and being made acquainted with the relation given by the ambassador, he was so incensed, that he flew upon him, called him a treacherous liar, and would have certainly put him to death, had he not been torn away by violence. He now told Pizarro that he was not to believe a syllable of what was advanced by those messengers, who were only spies upon his conduct, and false lights held out to mislead him. He asserted, that the inca was at the head of a numerous army; that Caxamalca was deserted, and the troops in the field; that he had not only been refused access to his majesty, but even dismissed without eating, notwithstanding he was on the point of perishing with fatigue and hunger; in a word, he declared that all the designs of the inca were hostile, and those of his messengers perfidious. Pizarro had no doubt of the truth of this relation; however, he concealed his sentiments before the Peruvian messenger, and dismissed him with presents. Garcilasso de la Vega mentions an ambassador who came about this time from the unfortunate Huascar, craving the Spaniards to revenge his cause, and in the name of justice, truth, religion, and the sons of the god Virachoca, to punish the ambition and usurpation of his unnatural brother. This messenger was treated with extraordinary kindness, and returned with an answer, that the Spaniards were in full march to procure the enlargement of the unhappy monarch, and to redress all his grievances.

In proportion as the Spaniards approached Caxamalca, the embassies from the inca began to multiply. While Pizarro was descending from the mountain, a third ambassador came to him from Atabualapa, more solemn than any of the preceding. He was brother to the inca, and a person of the first consideration about the court, to which his equipage and retinue corresponded. He told Pizarro, that his mighty and sovereign lord had sent him to bid the Spaniards welcome, and presented them with some of the produce of the country, as a proof of his regard and affection. It was great joy, he said, to the inca, to see his kintmen, descended from the same common father the sun. “Inca Virachoca, said he, “since it hath been my fortune to carry you this message, I presume to beseech you, that “you will be generously pleased to grant me three requests. The first is, that you will “esteem my inca, Atabualapa, your friend, and enter into a perpetual league of friendship with him. The second is, that you will forgive all those crimes and trespasses “which his subjects may have committed, either through ignorance, or want of reflection. “The last is, that you would remit, towards the inhabitants of Caxamalca, those punishments, which by the direction of your god and father, the supreme Virachoca, you inflicted upon the inhabitants of Puna and Tumbez; and that, as you are an inca, the “descendant of the Sun, you would exercise clemency, which is one of your attributes.” He then ordered the presents to be displayed, which consisted of a variety of quadrupeds and birds, many fruits of different kinds, curious pieces of cotton and woollen manufactures, honey in the comb, pepper, a variety of liquors distilled or brewed from the grain, vestments of the richest kinds, and a service of silver cups, plates, toys studded with turquoises and emeralds, with abundance of other curiosities, which were of very great value. As a particular mark of the inca’s respect, he presented Pizarro with a pair of hose, of the same kind with those wore by the emperor, and a couple of rich gold bracelets, this being deemed a military honour in Peru, and bestowed on this occasion in acknowledgement of the general’s valour. Titu Antouchi, for that was the name of the ambassador, apologized for having presumed to make so trifling a present to the children of the sun; but he said, that he hoped his master would find other opportunities of shewing them his respect and esteem: in a word, no minister, of the most civilized prince, could have acquitted himself with more address and politeness than this barbarian; who, in course of the conversation he held with Pizarro, eminently distinguished his good sense, policy, and sagacity. Garcilasso alledges, that Atabualapa had no sinister design in this embassy, which was sent merely to appease the resentment of the sun, for the injuries done to his children by the inhabitants of Puna and Tumbez. He affirms, that the inca’s courage began to forsake him on the approach of the Spaniards, and the report of the wonders they performed upon the coast. He mentions a prophecy, uttered by the father of the present emperor, similar to the tradition which we observed prevailed in Mexico, at the time Cortez entered that country; and says, that Atabualapa was persuaded the season was arrived for the completion of this prophecy, because he could not imagine that such a handful of men could defeat the armies of Puna and Tumbez, and dare to penetrate into the heart of his empire, unless they were invigorated and supported by the almighty power of the sun.

WITH

a With respect to the Spaniards, they dismissed the ambassador with presents, and assurances of perfect respect and resignation to the will of the inca ; but their sentiments were greatly divided about the intention of the embassy, and the presents. Some regarded them as a blind to conceal the inca's real designs, and lull the Spaniards into security ; whence they inferred the necessity of redoubling their vigilance and circumspection. Others ascribed the presents wholly to the magnificence and hospitality of the emperor ; while a few of the more sanguine believed, that they could discover his fears under this appearance of courtesy. It was, however, the unanimous opinion that they could not be too cautious in their march to Caxamalca. As they drew near the town, they had a view of the inca's army, which extended the space of a whole league, and presented the most formidable appearance, where victory to depend on numbers. In the evening they reached Caxamalca, and found it deserted by the inca and principal nobility ; though orders had been left to feast and treat the children of the sun with the utmost respect, if we may credit Garcilasso, whose relation is diametrically opposite, in this place, to that of Herrera. According to this last writer, the Spaniards found not a soul in the town, except a few women, who openly avowed the design of destroying the christians, and pitied their unhappy fate. Immediately Pizarro ordered the place to be diligently searched lest any troops might be concealed ; and after taking every precaution for his security, sent an Indian to the emperor, to demand what quarters he had provided for his friends, agreeable to the promises of his ambassadors.

Pizarro arrives at Caxamalca.

c It was afterwards known that the arrival of the Spaniards in Caxamalca had greatly disconcerted Atahualpa, whose fears increased in proportion as the danger drew nearer ; however, he betrayed no other symptoms of the terrible apprehensions he was under, than what might be perceived from his holding more frequent councils than usual. On the other hand, Pizarro deliberated with his officers, whether it was not requisite he should send a formal embassy to the inca, to acknowledge the civilities received, request the continuance of his favour, and acquaint him with the purpose of his expedition. After various debates, this proposition was carried in the affirmative. Accordingly Hernando Pizarro, and Ferdinando Soto, were appointed to execute this commission, their retinue being composed of twenty horse ; Soto to proceed with this party to the emperor's

d presence, and Pizarro to remain at a little distance behind, with another party, to bring him off in case any violence should be offered to his person. The Spaniards found the Peruvian army drawn up to receive the ambassadors, notice of whose arrival had been given by an Indian sent to prepare the way. As they passed the ranks, the Indians gazed with astonishment upon the horses ; and Soto leaping over a ditch, plunging, rearing, and curveting, with his horse, greatly delighted all those simple spectators, who could hardly separate, in imagination, the rider from the horse, taking both to be one animal, as several other Indian natives had done before. The inca had dispatched one of his generals to receive the ambassadors, and shew them all possible respect. When this officer approached Soto and the Spaniards, he adored them with the most profound veneration ; and then turning round to his people, declared to them, that those were the descendants of their god Virachoca, whom they ought to worship with the most profound adoration ; a speech that was scarce uttered, when all the Indians files began their reverences with the utmost submission, accompanying the Spaniards, at the same time, into the inca's presence. The amazement of both parties was pretty nearly equal. The Spaniards admired the riches, grandeur, and magnificence of the inca ; while the monarch was surpris'd at the habit, beards, complexion, manners, arms, and horses of the Spaniards. Some minutes passed in profound silence ; when at length the Spaniards recovering themselves, approached the throne of gold in which Atahualpa was seated, making the most submissive obeisances as they advanced. When Soto came within a proper distance, the inca rose up, embraced him cordially, and bid him welcome into his dominions : " Behold, said he, the very face, attitude, and habit of our god Virachoca, in " the exact manner described by the inca Virachoca, our ancestor, to whom the deity " appeared." Having spoke this, an elegant entertainment of bread, fruits, and divers kinds of liquors, was served up by six virgins, and as many boys, well dressed. Two beautiful maidens of the royal blood advanced before these, holding in their hands small cups of gold, filled with the liquor usually drank by the inca ; of which they gave one to Atahualpa, and another to the ambassador, who drank peace and friendship to each other ; this being deemed in Peru a mark of the most cordial reception and sincere welcome. Having gone thro' the preliminary ceremonies, the Spaniards began to deliver their commission ; but they had scarce uttered a sentence, when they were stop'd by the inca, who said he must admire a little longer, in their form and figure, the image of his his god. Soto mounted his horse, to please the emperor, made him prance, leap, and curvet to the great satisfaction of Atahualpa, who suffered the horse to run up to close as to smell him, without seeming afraid, though the Indian soldiers fled in crowds when the animal came near them. At length the ambassador was permitted to speak, but a charge was given that he should be concise. Accordingly Soto, after making several profound reverences, began to inform the inca, of the exalted dignity of the pontiff, and the vast power of Charles V. emperor and king of the Romans, who, desirous of rescuing the Peruvians from the gross ignorance and idolatry in which they were immersed, had sent don Francisco Pizarro, with his companions, and some priests, to teach them the knowledge of the true God, and to enter into a perpetual alliance and amity with his imperial highness. He concluded with acquainting the inca of the arrival of the Spaniards in Caxamalca, and referring him for farther particulars to a personal interview with Pizarro. a b

Difference among the Spanish writers.

It must be confessed, that the Spanish writers differ widely about the particulars of this audience, and indeed the whole of the inca's conduct. Herrera relates, that he received the embassy politely, but gave immediate orders that the army should march to Caxamalca, to crush Pizarro at one blow, take all his people prisoners, and offer them up as sacrifices to the gods; for which purpose he had prepared a kind of gin nets, or toils, in which they were to be caught alive, like wild beasts^b. According to Garcilasso, the inca had given up all thoughts of defence, seeming to regard his empire for lost, from the time the Spaniards ventured to advance to the heart of his dominions. In answer to the ambassador, he said, that altho' he could not but be pained to think that the prophecies of his ancestors were to be completed in his days; yet it could not but give some uneasiness to reflect, that the end of a vast and flourishing empire was approaching. He told the Spaniards, that notwithstanding the advices he had constantly received of the victories obtained by them in Puna and Tumbez, and of the fortifications they were erecting in his dominions, he had taken no measures with his council for their expulsion, because he fully persuaded himself that they were the children of the great god Virachoca, and the messengers of the Pacachamac, and had therefore published it as a law in the schools of Cuzco, that none should presume to take up arms against them, unless he would be guilty of sacrilege, and the grossest impiety. He desired, however, that the ambassador would inform him how it came to pass, that while the Spaniards professed that their sole intention was to cultivate an alliance, and promote peace, they had made such dreadful slaughter in the countries through which they passed, without so much as informing themselves of the dispositions of the inca, and imperial court? "But I conceive, added he, that the two princes, your employers, enjoined you to act with the utmost severity against us; wherefore I resign myself wholly to your will, only imploring that you shew some compassion to my subjects, wives, and relations, whose misfortunes affect me more deeply than my own." These two accounts are extremely different; yet they may be reconciled, if we suppose that their scheme was designed to blind the Spaniards, and conceal the stratagem formed to seize them alive. Yet we must consider it as a little extraordinary, that all the nobility and soldiers, within hearing of the inca, should be so deeply affected with Atahualpa's speech, which they knew to be perfidious. According to Garcilasso, they shed tears, groaned and sighed piteously, and gave themselves up to despair, with such appearances as could not be counterfeited. Indeed the inca himself, if we may credit this historian, was so strongly impressed with the prophecy mentioned, that he neglected all means of resistance, regarded the Spaniards as the messengers of heaven, and prepared his mind for an entire resignation. The fact probably is, that neither the Spaniards nor Peruvians rightly understood each other, upon account of the ignorance of the interpreter, who was a native of Puna, almost entirely unlearned in the Spanish, and but imperfectly acquainted with the language spoke at the inca's court, which was very different from the provincial dialect^c. In one thing both writers agree, that the inca told the ambassadors he would visit Pizarro in Caxamalca, but that he hoped it would give no umbrage if he should be attended by his army, as was customary in the country when the emperor travelled. c d e f

As soon as the dawn appeared, great fires were seen lighted in the Peruvian camp, and every thing was perceived to be in motion, which gave the alarm to Pizarro, as he had no great confidence in the fair words given to the ambassador. He drew the Spaniards up in order of battle, in a great square, and firmly waited the approach of the inca, who was four hours marching three leagues, the distance between the town and the camp. He was carried in a golden litter of rich workmanship, supported, upon the shoulders of In- g

^c Lib. i. cap. 23.

- a dians of the first distinction, and attended by a body of twelve thousand Orejans, or noblemen, who had arms concealed under coats of mail of palm-leaves, contrived to ward off the edge of the Spanish swords. Besides this guard, there followed an army of seventy-five thousand men, attended by near thirty thousand servants, women and children. All the Indians were richly dressed, and adorned with plates of gold and silver, and great abundance of precious stones. Pizarro observed them at a distance; and the glittering appearance they made, served rather to whet his avarice, than raise any emotions of fear. He exhorted his men to be of good courage, and sent an Indian to acquaint the emperor, that he impatiently expected his arrival; to which Atahualpa made no other reply, than requesting that the Spaniards would keep up their dogs and horses, which were so terrible
- b to his people, and not take offence at seeing several of them armed, contrary to his orders and promise, as he again assured them no hostilities were intended. From this message Pizarro was convinced that the suspicions of treachery he entertained were well founded. He communicated his sentiments to the chief captains, and a resolution was taken to improve the circumstance to their own advantage, and to place the horse and dogs in ambush, under pretence of complying with the inca's request. Observing that the emperor now pitched his tent in the fields, Pizarro, apprehending lest the design might be to postpone the interview until night might furnish the Indians with an opportunity of practising some insidious purpose, sent Aldena, a Spaniard, to beseech him to hasten his march, Atahualpa received the messenger angrily, and at first ordered him to be seized and
- c punished; but afterwards suppressing his resentment, he dismissed him courteously, desiring him to acquaint Pizarro, that he would be with him immediately. This incident, more and more, betrayed the design of the inca, and put the Spaniards on their guard. Pizarro ordered a body of musqueteers, to take post on an eminence in the square, and to fire, upon the word of command, among the thickest of the enemy, while the cavalry were to sally out upon different quarters, and to secure the passes, that none of the principal Indians might escape. There was something uncommonly bold and desperate in the resolution of attacking an army of near a hundred thousand fighting men, with a party of less than a hundred and seventy soldiers; but the Spaniards knew the genius of the Indians, their dread of the fire-arms, horses, and dogs, their ignorance of the art of war, and
- d their great disparity in point of courage; nor were they strangers to the strong impressions left upon their minds by the victories obtained at Puna and Tumbez.

- THE inca advanced with great order and solemnity, amidst the sound and din of warlike instruments, sending out scouts to observe the posture of the enemy, who returned with the joyful intelligence, that only the general, and fifteen of his companions, were waiting on foot in the great square. This advice rendered the Indians so bold and tumultuous, that they poured in without order into the square, confident they could easily bring all the Spaniards bound to Atahualpa. The inca followed the crowd, and raising himself up in his litter, exhorted his people to behave themselves with proper courage and vigilance. They were preparing to fall upon Pizarro, when he thought it necessary to justify
- e his own conduct, by once more making pacific overtures, with which he sent the friar Vincenti Valverde, accompanied by the interpreter Filippo. The friar was admitted to the presence of the inca, who beheld his habit, different from any thing he had before seen, with wonder, asked him several questions about the God-head, the pope, and the emperor; desired to know why the Spaniards required that the tribute should be paid to Charles, who was of inferior quality to God the Creator and Father, to God the Son, to God the Holy Ghost, and to the pope? He likewise asked the friar, how Jesus Christ, who was a God, came to lose his life, and how he came to be informed of all the particulars which he mentioned in his speech concerning the Divinities of the Trinity? To this the friar
- f replied, that he learned all these things from the book he held in his hand, which was a breviary. Atahualpa desired to see the book; he took it in his hand, put it to his ear, and not hearing it speak, flung it upon the ground, as if he imagined the friar wanted to impose on his understanding. "You believe, said he, that Christ is God, and that he
- " died; I adore the sun and moon, which are immortal. I owe no tribute to any mortal prince, and know none superior to myself. I should be glad to be a friend to the
- " monarch who has sufficiently displayed his power, by sending armies to such distant
- " countries; but I disdain being vassal to any, but the gods. I know of no duty I owe
- " the pope, nor can I see what right he has to dispose of my kingdom. As to changing
- g " my religion, it would be equally foolish and impious in me to abjure the doctrine
- " received by my ancestors, until you have convinced me that it is false, and that yours,
- " which you would have me adopt, in its stead, is true."

WITH this answer the friar returned, not chusing to attempt convincing the mind of the inca by reasoning, when he knew that more powerful arguments were preparing. He was no sooner returned, than Pizarro gave the signal for executing his orders. The mus- a queteers began a most terrible fire, while the cavalry sallied out from different quarters, and trod down the affrighted Indians. At the same time the foot pressed on with their cross-bows, pikes, and swords, making dreadful slaughter of a confused multitude, who were entirely disconcerted by the suddenness of the attack, the unusual noise of the musquetry, the vigour of the onset, the death of their companions, the fury of the horses and dogs, and a method of fighting, to which they were utter strangers. Mean time, Pizarro, sensible that the whole depended on the fate of the inca, fell desperately, with his fifteen targetteers, upon the corps surrounding the royal litter, and met with an unexpectedly obstinate resistance. Great numbers of the Orejans were slain; but their place was undauntedly filled up by others; infomuch, that the Spaniards must have relin- b quished their design of seizing the monarch, through mere fatigue, had not Miguel, a resolute soldier, pierced through the middle of the guard, laid hold of the litter, and made way for Pizarro, and some other soldiers, who immediately laid hands upon Atabua-

 May 3, 1533. lapa, overturned the carriage, and took him prisoner. The consternation of the Indians was inexpressible upon this event; they endeavoured to escape at the outlets of the square, and there met the fate they endeavoured to avoid. Several thousands were slain, or trampled down, and a multitude perished amidst the ruins of a wall that sunk under their weight. At last a heavy shower of rain put a stop to the carnage, and obliged the Spaniards, quite spent with slaying, to look for shelter, carrying with them the inca in triumph, whom they justly esteemed ample security for their future success. Atabualapa c was conveyed to his quarters, put under a strong guard, and, as Gomara ailedges, loaded with irons, which were taken off next morning by order of Pizarro. The booty was collected, and it appeared immense. The vessels in gold and silver found in the inca's tent were incredibly rich, one of these alone being reputed worth a hundred thousand ducats. Besides these a prodigious number of ornaments in gold, silver, and jewels were taken from the dead; and one would imagine that the whole wealth of Peru had been collected only to reward the valour of the conquerors. Above five hundred women, belonging to the emperor, and his principal attendants, surrendered to Pizarro, and were kindly treated. Many of them were of the blood-royal, others were prime favourites of the emperor, and a few vestals taken from the temple of the sun, to pray for the success d of the imperial arms, and the destruction of the Spaniards.

At first, the Indians imagined that Atabualapa was slain; but finding that he was only taken prisoner, above five thousand returned to Caxamalca, to attend him in his confinement, and bear a share in his affliction. Nothing could be more moving than the fidelity and affection they expressed on this occasion to their sovereign, which convinced the Spaniards they could not be too vigilant, as nothing would be neglected by his subjects to procure his liberty. As to the imperial general, Yiumiravi, he made the best of his way to Quito, carrying off above three thousand loads of treasure, and there exercised the most cruel tyranny (A). Every nobleman of ambition profited by the misfortune of the prince, erected a little dominion for himself, and governed with the most despotic authority; at e the same time that others constantly attended the person of the unhappy inca, dried up his tears, and, by their fidelity and attachment, broke the poignancy of his grief, and poured comfort into his wounded bosom; to which Pizarro contributed all that lay in his power. He not only gave orders to the Spaniards to treat him with the utmost respect, but suffered his women and attendants to have free access to his apartments. In the end he gained so much upon Atabualapa, who, at first, was sullen and dejected, that he seemed somewhat reconciled to his situation, and condescended to enter upon divers conversations with the Spanish general, who seized that opportunity of disclosing to him more fully the purport of his expedition. Although we mentioned the defeat of the inca, Huascar, in the f preceeding pages, it was not till this time that Atabualapa received the news of his imprisonment. When it was told him he smiled, and said it was extraordinary to be a conqueror and a prisoner in the same instant. Observing that the Spaniards were extremely covetous of gold and silver, Atabualapa judged that his metal was the key to his liberty, and accordingly made proposals of a prodigious ransom. It is reported, that he offered as ransom.

(A) Yiumiravi, or, as Garcilasso calls him, Rummiravi, had the bulk of the army at command, and, under pretence of revenging the cause of his sovereign, was actually aspiring at the imperial diadem. He immediately seized upon all the sons and kindred of Atabualapa, under pretext of securing them against the violence of the Spaniards. He soon afterwards put them to death, particularly a brother of the inca's, who had ventured to commiserate the misfortunes of the empire. He maintained a court at Quito, which was the asylum of all desperadoes, robbers, murderers, and out-laws, whom he cherished and protected, because he was sensible it was their interest to see the government subverted (1).

a many vessels of gold and silver as would fill the apartments in which he was confined, up to a certain line he had drawn upon the wall, as high as he could reach, amounting, according to Herrera, to upwards of ten thousand bars, besides jewels, and precious stones, of inestimable value. He sent for great quantities to the adjacent provinces; but not being able to fulfil his promise, the Spaniards murmured, alledging that he had some sinister intention in this delay. The inca excused himself, by alledging the great distance of the places, whence the ransom was to be drawn, and desiring that Pizarro would send some of his Spaniards to satisfy themselves about the treasures in Cuzco, whom he would order his subjects to conduct with safety, and treat with the utmost kindness; affirming, that they had nothing to fear during his imprisonment. This offer was embraced, Pizarro b not chusing to deprive him of hope, lest the treasure might be destroyed. In consequence, Hernando de Soto, and Pedro del Barco, were appointed to go to Cuzco, while Hernando Pizarro undertook to give an account of the wealth contained in Pacacamec, and other provinces specified by the inca, where his treasures were deposited. Before their departure, the inca ordered proclamation to be made throughout his dominions, that the Spaniards should be hospitably received wherever they went, and shewn every thing they desired.

FULL of expectation of great wealth, and confident of safety, under protection of the inca, the Spaniards set out upon their journey, in a kind of litter, which the Peruvians call Huantu and Rampa, supported on the shoulders of twenty Indians, who were relieved c by others, posted at certain distances. Soto and Banco were the first who began their journey, directing their course to Cuzco. They met with the most profound respect from the natives, who not only honoured the inca's passport and commands, but regarded the Spaniards as the messengers and ministers of some powerful divinity, who had for certain purposes, brought affliction upon their sovereign. Many sacrificed to them, and others loaded them with rich presents, to appease their resentment, and expiate the crimes they had ignorantly committed against heaven. There were some who regarded Soto and Barco as inferior deities, of a malicious cruel nature, to be satisfied only with gold and silver, of which they made liberal offerings. Not long after their departure, Hernando Pizarro began his journey to Pacacamec, in the temple of which place the inca affirmed there b were immense treasures. On the road they met with one of the inca's brothers, attended by some hundreds of Indians, loaded with plate for the payment of the ransom, amounting to upwards of a million of pieces of eight. The name of this prince was Quitlaschaca; he had escaped the snares laid for him by the perfidious Yiumiravi, and had used his utmost influence with the Curacas to raise a sufficient price for the inca's liberty, for whom he had the most tender fraternal affection. By him the first intelligence was received at Caxamalca, of the revolt of the general; but as no measures could be taken for punishing his treachery, until Atabualapa was set at liberty, the affair was dropt, in hopes that the return of the Spaniards from Cuzco, and the other places mentioned, might produce a favourable crisis.

c PIZARRO having reached the temple of Pacacamec, where he saw every thing corresponding to the inca's relation, returned, after a fatiguing journey, with a good deal of treasure, and one of the inca's generals, named Chalchuchima, who had been assembling troops to attempt the recovery of his prince, but had yielded to the remonstrances of Pizarro. Hernando was so bold, as to go attended only by an interpreter, into the midst of the Indian camp, and, by the force of eloquence and argument, prevailed upon the general to attend him to Pacacamec, to dismiss his troops, to submit quietly to the fate of his sovereign, and to repair to the place of his confinement, to endeavour, with the rest of his friends, to alleviate his misfortunes, until the ransom was paid. On their f journey, Hernando Soto, and his fellow traveller Barco, touched at Sanja, where the inca Huascar was detained prisoner by the officers of Atabualapa. Curiosity made them desirous of visiting this prince, and the Indians readily gratified their request, upon examining their passport. Little, however, could be made out at the interview, for want of an interpreter. The Spaniards had just learned enough of the language, to make themselves barely intelligible in common affairs, with the help of signs; but they found it impossible to conduct a political negotiation. The royal prisoner, however, being given to understand that they were his brother's conquerors, that they professed redressing injuries, and distributing exact justice, conceived great hopes of being reinstated. He g complained of the tyranny, cruelty, and usurpation of his brother, who, not content with robbing him of his crown and dominions, was now going to deprive him of life, for which reason he was kept in close confinement. He conjured them not to leave him in that condition, but to take him under their protection to Cuzco, where his presence would would be mutually beneficial. He promised not only to fulfil the promise made by Atabualapa, respecting the ransom, but to pay the Spaniards much larger sums than his brother had in his power, as great part of his treasure had been concealed during the late war, and deposited secretly in the hands of his faithful vassals. It was certainly unpolitic in the Spaniards to refuse these proposals; but they feared that attempts might be made to rescue the prince out of their hands, when they had no power to protect him; and therefore contented themselves with promising, that, on their return from Cuzco, they would conduct him safe to their commander. By this means Huascar lost his life, and the Spaniards immense treasures, no account of which could ever afterwards be obtained. Atabualapa's officers soon gave him notice of Huascar's promise, as to the Spaniards; and he dreading the consequences, determined to remove so dangerous a rival out of the way; upon which he immediately founded Pizarro, desiring, in the most artful manner, to know how he stood affected. He just told him, that his officers had unadvisedly killed Huascar; and finding Pizarro extremely indifferent, then sent private orders that he should be immediately strangled, which was punctually executed, while Soto and Barco were at Cuzco (B).

The Spaniards
send to Cuzco.

On the arrival of the Spaniards in that city, they were astonished at the respect and deference shewn them by the Indians, of both parties. The friends of Huascar, imagining that prince was still living, endeavoured to engage the strangers in his interest, by the utmost civilities, and the most liberal presents and offerings; those of the opposite faction put on a similar behaviour, in expectation of procuring the release of Atabualapa. The vestals, called Mamaconas, dedicated to the sun, were ordered to attend upon the strangers, whom they regarded as the children of that luminary. Unfortunately, however, the Spaniards abused the respect shewn them, laughed at the simplicity of their votaries, and thereby incurred their hatred and contempt; a ridiculous weakness which Herrera ascribes to four Spaniards, who attended Soto and Barco on this expedition. To their misconduct, the same writer attributes the great effusion of blood that ensued; for had the Spaniards maintained the dignity of their character and indulged the natives in their superstitious veneration, they would probably have quietly received the yoke, and submitted to the will of their conquerors, whom they beheld as the descendants of the great god Virachoca. As the emperor's chief treasures were lodged in the great temple, application was made to the high priest Vilavina, to issue out what was necessary for Atabualapa's ransom, which he readily granted. Immense quantities of gold and silver were accordingly brought to the Spaniards, who set out with it to Caxamalca, attended by several hundreds of the natives, loaded with the precious metals, in vases, urns, and other utensils of curious workmanship. Pizarro was astonished at the prodigious wealth that flowed in, which greatly surpassed his most sanguine expectations; but not satisfied, he obtained a grant from his prisoner of the treasures contained in the temple of Pacacamec, in the province of the incas, which his brother Hernando had surveyed.

Almagro joins Pizarro.

By this time Pizarro was joined by Almagro, an hundred and fifty Spaniards, and fifty horses brought from Panama, with great difficulty and danger. Endeavours were used to revive their mutual animosities, and create jealousies that might have proved destructive to the enterprise; but Almagro discovering that his secretary was in the conspiracy, ordered him to be hanged, and for that time quieted the suspicions entertained, that he had planned an expedition independent on Pizarro. After refreshing his people, he offered to attend the general's three brothers to Pacacamec; and accordingly set out upon that journey, being every-where well treated by the natives, tho' great part of the treasure was concealed before his arrival. The report of the behaviour of the Spaniards at Cuzco had spread itself to Pacacamec, which determined the priests of the temple of the sun to disappoint their avarice, and obstruct the plundering of so ancient and venerable a temple. It is affirmed, that four hundred load of plate had been carried away, and concealed in such a manner that it never afterwards appeared. Notwithstanding this, the Spaniards found as much as amounted to ninety thousand pieces of eight, besides several pieces of rich plate, stolen and plundered by the soldiers, with which they returned to Caxamalca.

Divisions among
the Spaniards.

ALL the treasure being now collected, and the inca's promise punctually fulfilled, he demanded his liberty according to agreement; but divisions arising among the Spaniards, the execution of their promise was entirely neglected. Their business was to amass wealth,

(B) The manner of Huascar's death is variously related. Augustino de Carate speaks as if he had been cut in pieces, and his flesh devoured by his barbarous murderers. Acosta relates that he was burnt; but all agree he was put to death by order of his brother, after he had sifted the sentiments of Pizarro (1).

(1) Apud Garcil. lib. i. cap. 33. pag. 470.

a and little regard was paid to the sentiments which the natives might entertain of their integrity and honour. Almagro's people insisted upon sharing all the acquisitions made since the arrival of the Spaniards in Peru, because they had contributed equally to the success of the expedition, as if they had been actually present. This, indeed, was true of Almagro himself, but not of the soldiers he had enlisted subsequent to the imprisonment of the inca. Pizarro readily admitted the claim of his partner, and, to avoid the consequences of disputation, ordered that the value of a hundred thousand ducats should be distributed among his followers, with which they appeared satisfied. Agreeable to the power vested in him as lieutenant-governor and generalissimo, he then passed a decree, ordaining, that the king's fifth should be deducted, and the remainder of the treasure be divided in b a certain proportion to each, according to the merit that should be adjudged him by his commander. After imploring the divine assistance to enable him to perform exact justice, he then shared to the amount of one million, five hundred and twenty-eight thousand, five hundred pieces of eight, deducting the king's fifth, and all other incumbrances and expences. In this division the Spaniards reaped the fruits of all their labour, as far as riches could afford a recompence; but the effects did not correspond with their wishes. Wealth is not always productive of felicity; and it appeared, on this occasion, that the prodigious treasures amassed served only to diminish the enjoyment of the adventurers, who were infinitely more happy in expectation, than actual enjoyment. The great plenty of precious metal diminished its value one half; those who imagined themselves rolling in wealth, were astonished to find they, in reality, had but half what they expected.
c Disappointment begat jealousy, the parent of discord; it also naturally produced avarice, each striving to acquire a fortune equal to what he first imagined he enjoyed. Gaming grew to an exorbitant height among them, and property was continually shifting from one hand to another. The tides of affluence and indigence brought along with them an infinity of vices, which foiled all the authority and influence of the commander, and rendered the Spanish conquerors the most profligate, corrupt, and abandoned set of miscreants in the universe. No regard was paid to the most sacred obligations; wealth was the only pursuit, and power the only rule of right; nor was Pizarro himself untainted with the general depravity. Atahualpa, in the most pressing manner, urged the compact for his liberty, d every particular of which he had fulfilled. He offered to lay himself under the strictest ties, to act in nothing contrary to the interest of the Spaniards, to acknowledge himself a vassal of the emperor Charles V. to pay a regular tribute, to receive baptism, as soon as his understanding could be convinced, and, at all events, to live upon terms of the strictest amity with the Spaniards; but his remonstrances were vain, and fresh pretexts were invented to prolong his confinement. Upon these delays, some of his commanders proposed attempting his release, by force of arms; to which he very prudently refused his consent, admonishing them in the strongest manner not to have recourse to violence, which might endanger his life, and the total subversion of the empire. In obedience to him they laid aside their designs; but the discontent which appeared in their countenances excited suspicions in the Spaniards, which were corroborated by the whispers of e the Yuaconas, or Peruvian slaves, who were grown rich, haughty, and insolent, during the late confusion, and desirous of a change in the Orejans, or nobility. They spread a variety of reports, the foundation of which could never be traced, though they were readily believed by the Spaniards, who wanted an apology for their own perfidious conduct. Pizarro doubled the guards, and very probably cherished rumours which he could not possibly credit. Atahualpa grew extremely uneasy, and remonstrated with him; but meeting with no satisfactory answer, poured his grievances into the bosom of Hernando
f Pizarro, who had gained his confidence and affection. The whole blame of these disturbances were charged upon the Indian general, Qualiquietriama, who would certainly have been sacrificed to the vengeance of the Spaniards, had not Hernando interposed, and asserted his innocence.

It was now the subject of great grief and mortification to Atahualpa, that he was going to be deprived of the only person, among the Spaniards, for whom he had entertained a friendship. The general thought it necessary to transmit an account of his success to the court of Spain, to remit the king's fifth, and thereby insure the countenance and protection of the emperor and ministry. His brother was appointed to discharge this commission; and the inca was no sooner informed of the resolution, g than he imagined his ruin was determined. He told Hernando his fears, and bewailed himself in the most piteous manner, saying, "that he was now deprived of hope, as he had lost his only remaining friend and confident." In this he discovered his penetration, for Hernando was departed but a few days, when all that Atahualpa had foreseen happened (C).

THE discontents of Almagro's soldiers, which were again revived, their refusal to be led to the reduction of the provinces, the difficulty of keeping so mighty a potentate as the inca securely confined, the attempts which would probably be set on foot to procure his release, the jealousy which his breach of promise must excite in the Indians, and the almost impossibility of establishing the dominion of the crown of Spain over such an immense tract of country, greatly perplexed Pizarro, and suggested the first hint of the necessity of putting Atahualpa to death. This he regarded as equitable, because it was convenient; it being a maxim of his policy, to stick at nothing which contributed to his own interest, the security of his people, and the good of the public, however, contrary to the faith of treaties and engagements. A notion that it was essential to the accomplishment of the conquest of the Peruvian monarchy, was the actuating motive to this base action, whatever the Spanish writers may alledge of intrigues carried on by Filippo, the interpreter, in consequence of a passion which he entertained for one of the inca's women. It is not indeed improbable that Filippo might be employed as a tool to Pizarro, to stir up those discontents among the Incaconas, which we have mentioned; but all the stories related of the egregious ignorance of the general are no way compatible with his birth or refined policy. Garcilasso alledges, that the inca, who at first adored him as a god, began to fall off from his respect, on observing that Pizarro was rough, unpolished, ignorant, and void of honour. The same writer observes, that Atahualpa admiring nothing so much as the faculty of conveying ideas by writing, one day resolved to make experiment of the reality of the pretended art, desired a Spanish soldier to write the word God upon his thumb-nail, which he had heard them often repeat; then calling another soldier, he desired to know what these characters meant, and was answered God. He called a third, and received the same answer; and at last putting the question to the general, Pizarro replied he could not tell; and hence it is inferred he could not read, and asserted that he sunk greatly in the inca's opinion, for shewing himself inferior, in point of knowledge, to the common soldiers. Insinuations are likewise given, as if this circumstance tended to widen the breach between the emperor and the commander, and hurry on the tragical end of the former. Pizarro was piqued to observe the contempt in which he was held by a barbarian; and all constraint being now removed, since the departure of his brother, who strenuously vindicated the inca upon all occasions, caused a formal process to be drawn up against him, consisting of several articles, many of which were truly absurd and ridiculous. That being a bastard, without any right to the imperial diadem, he had ordered his brother, and legitimate sovereign, Huascar, to be put to death, and seized his dominions. That he had given orders for this barbarous murder since his own imprisonment by the Spaniards. That he was an idolater. That he not only allowed, but commanded, the sacrifices of men, women, and children. That he had raised unjust wars, and occasioned much blood-shed and cruelty. That he had levied taxes and tributes since the arrival of the Spaniards in Peru, and consumed and embezzled the public treasure, which now became the property of the conquerors. Lastly, that he had endeavoured to stir up factions and rebellions against the Spaniards. From hence it appears that Pizarro was resolved, at all events, to rid himself of the inca; for else would he never have strained so hard to find sufficient ground of impeachment.

To all these charges the inca pleaded not guilty. With respect to the death of his brother, he justly alledged that the Spaniards could take no legal cognizance of the fact. With regard to the taxes which he had levied, and the wars he had carried on, they were nothing to the Spaniards; and as to the conspiracy mentioned in the impeachment, it was utterly false and groundless. He called heaven and earth to witness the integrity with which he had discharged his engagements, and the perfidy of his accusers; and desired he might be sent over to Spain to take his trial before the emperor; but little regard was paid to his remonstrances, he exclaimed, he reasoned, he intreated in vain; Pizarro proceeded out of form to examine sham evidences, and after a full hearing, Al-

(C) With Hernando Pizarro near fifty Spaniards returned to Spain with immense fortunes. Almagro solicited, by letters, that he might be constituted adelantado of certain countries beyond those assigned to Pizarro, and entirely independent on his authority. Knowing that a difference subsisted between the two brothers, he entrusted this commission to Hernando, and is said to have gained the promise of his interest, by a present of twenty thousand ducats. The wealth which they brought to Panama, raised such a spirit in the inhabitants of that place, that it was with difficulty the governor could restrain the whole colony from seeking their fortunes in Peru. a magro and he occupying the bench, condemned him to be burnt, giving the sentence into the hands of the friar Vincenti Valverde, to be reviled and confirmed. It is alledged that the friar used every argument with the inca to convert him to Christianity; and that he at last prevailed, on assuring him that he should get the sentence changed from burning to strangling, which the unhappy prince now regarded as an extraordinary favour. In all other respects the sentence was rigorously executed, and the inca yielded up his last breath with that resolution, firmness, and heroism, which would have done honour to a more civilized prince, and legitimate sovereign. Pizarro did not carry his resentment farther than the grave; he now treated with the utmost honour the royal corpse, went into mourning, and saw it interred with the most solemn magnificence; but he soon found how detestable

b this action rendered him to the natives. As there appeared no necessity to keep the death of the inca secret, it soon spread into the remotest parts of the empire. Most hideous cries were first set up by his women as the funeral procession passed; many offered to bury themselves with him, which being refused, they hanged themselves out of grief and vexation. Their affliction communicated itself, like a contagious distemper, to all who resided near them; the whole town of Caxamalca was filled with lamentations, and the melancholy scene extended itself over the provinces, then to Quito, and afterwards to all the countries that acknowledged the sovereignty of Atabualapa. His personal merit had gained him powerful alliances, and his misfortunes could not fail to move pity. Friends and enemies joined in accusing the Spaniards of treachery and inhumanity. The ambition

c of the deceased prince, with all its fatal consequences, were forgot, and nothing now was present to the imagination of his people but his virtues, which they exaggerated, as if to aggravate the crime of his barbarous murderers. Loads of gold that were coming to Caxamalca, by order of Atabualapa, were now brought back to Cuzco, and the loss of the treasure was the first unfortunate consequence which the Spaniards perceived to flow from their late unjust and iniquitous measures. The two factions of Indians united against Pizarro, and many of the Spaniards not only exclaimed against the death of the inca as a base infraction of the laws of nations, and a violation of the Spanish honour; but they would even have proceeded to open mutiny, had not the impending danger united them for their common safety. At Cuzco, the friends of the late emperor Huascar immediately

d proclaimed Manco Capac, the legitimate brother of the late inca, and determined to support him with the last drop of their blood against the machinations and violences of the Spaniards; while Pizarro set up Taparpa, the son of Atabualapa, caused him to wear the imperial diadem, to be treated with all the honours due to the dignity of emperor, and to have all orders and public business dispatched in his name. It was essentially necessary to the success of his designs to gain possession of Cuzco, the capital, and suppress the opposite faction before it could gather strength sufficient to maintain the vigorous resolutions taken. Accordingly he set out from Caxamalca, attended by the new inca, after having spent seven months in that city, where he met with the most luxurious accommodation, the soldiers being emasculated with ease and abundance. Near the valley of Xauna, advice was brought, e that an army of Indians had occupied the passes, and resolved to dispute Pizarro's progress. Advancing a few miles farther, the plain was seen covered with armed troops; a sight extremely formidable to the Spaniards, who so long enjoyed perfect tranquillity, and were now fatigued with the march, and the prodigious rains that had lately fallen. Almagro led the van; he approached so near as to hear the enemy's revilings, and giving way to his indignation, attacked them with great impetuosity, after having passed a rapid river, in despite of all their opposition. Nothing could withstand the Spanish cavalry; the Indians were confounded, broken, and defeated, before the rear came to close fighting. They lost great numbers in the flight, and left behind a considerable quantity of gold, and other

f booty. In the fruitful vale of Xauna was a temple dedicated to the sun, where the conquerors likewise found some wealth; and here Pizarro resolved to found a colony, which, however, was not permanent, it being afterwards removed to the place where now stands the city Des los Reyes, afterwards called Lima.

Consequences of his death.

Manco proclaimed inca
by the natives.

While Pizarro was thus employed, Ferdinando Soto was detached with sixty horse, to make the best of his way to Cuzco, and clear the road for the march of the remainder of the army. Soto had not advanced far, when he received intelligence, that a considerable body of the enemy had fortified themselves at Cavabayo, to defend that pass; and fearing lest his strength should be unequal, he sent notice to Pizarro, and desired that the inca might join him, because the presence and influence of the monarch might possibly save the effusion of blood, and obtain the ends of a victory without the hazard; but Taparpa fell sick about this time, died, and thereby frustrated all the expectations entertained by the Spaniards of bringing the Indians, by means of their friend the inca, to acknowledge their authority, authority, without the necessity of having recourse to arms. Soto was now forced to place his dependence on his own valour; the Indians had cut down a bridge over an exceeding rapid river that divided them from the Spaniards; but Soto, without regard to the violence of the stream, plunged in with his horse, made the opposite banks, put the enemy in consternation, defeated them without striking a blow, and performed what has never been since attempted, the fording a river which had always been deemed impassible, and without the loss of a single horse, or soldier. The enemy flying to Lima Tambo, he continued the pursuit, notwithstanding he had received orders to advance slowly, saying, it would be folly and cowardice to adhere so literally to orders, as to neglect seizing the opportunity of an important advantage, which could not possibly be foreseen when the orders were issued. Accordingly he continued his march along the great road of Cbina-bayso to the mountain of Bilcacongá, seven leagues from Cuzco, where the Indians determined to fortify a difficult pass, to dig pits and trenches, and fill them with stakes, to incommode the horses. Here they resolved to make their last effort; great abundance of provision was brought, the army was augmented, some alledge the new inca was present, and every measure taken that could defeat the intention the Spaniards had of seizing the capital. They said it was shameful to suffer themselves to be driven like a flock of sheep before sixty strangers, whose chief dependence was founded on the pusillanimity of their enemies. The present opportunity was favourable, and they ought to strike the blow, where the Spanish horse could not act on account of the ruggedness of the country. Soto could have no reliance upon assistance from Pizarro, who was employed in reducing the Yuanas and Yayas, and settling the new colony. He, therefore, reposed his whole hopes on vigour, and the possibility of repulsing the Indian army before it could be reinforced. As he advanced, however, it was perceived that the enemy were exceedingly numerous. The whole face of the mountain was covered with their forces, and unexpected difficulties occurred with respect to the danger of the pass. The Indians began to pour in their darts and arrows upon the Spaniards with more resolution and regularity than they were accustomed to observe, which produced murmurings and discontents among the soldiers. Upon this Soto told his people, that it was now necessary to conquer or die. The numbers of the enemy cut off all possibility of retreating, without being exposed to disgrace, and the most imminent danger; and, if they hesitated a moment, the same difficulty would attend their advancing, new levies being continually joining the inca. One victory more, he said, would remove every obstacle, and the same valour which had hitherto proved invincible, would now likewise be successful, if they would exert it as became Spaniards. This speech gave new life and vigour to the troops. They advanced with great resolution up the hill, amidst showers of the enemy's weapons, and reaching the narrow pass, they formed themselves two a-breast, cut their way through the Indians, made dreadful slaughter, and at last reached the summit of the mountain, in despite of all resistance. Five soldiers and two horses were killed in this attack, and eleven men and fourteen horses wounded; however, the joy of obtaining a victory rendered this loss of less consideration. It is probable that Soto must have encountered the same dangers next morning, had not Almagro seasonably arrived with a reinforcement, which so dispirited the Indians, that they dropped their intention of renewing the engagement, and suffered the Spaniards to proceed unmolested.

PIZARRO had detached Gabriel de Rojas with a party to Pacacama, about the same time that Soto began his march for Cuzco. This officer was met on the road by the Peruvian general Quizquaz^f, and twelve thousand men, who had determined upon revenging the death of the inca Atabualapa. Herrera and most of the Spanish writers relate, that a battle was fought, which terminated to the advantage of Rojas; but Garcilasso affirms, that Quizquaz receiving intelligence of the approach of the Spaniards, in a careless manner placed a great number of troops in ambush in the woods and rocks, and ranging his army in a semicircle, in a narrow pass through which the Spaniards must proceed, attacked them with great fury, and at the first onset wounded four soldiers in the rear, and killed twelve auxiliary Indians. When the horse advanced, Quizquaz retreated slowly among the rocks, where part of his troops were concealed, and by this means drew the Spaniards into his snare. The cavalry pursued, and were suddenly attacked by the Indians in ambuscade. Here the slaughter began, seventeen Spaniards were killed, several were wounded, and seven fell into the hands of the enemy. A multitude of the auxiliary Indians lay bleeding on the field, and the victory was complete in favour of Quizquaz^g, altho' it is disputed by the Spanish writers. Garcilasso speaks, as if Pizarro had been present in this battle; and he affirms, that the Spanish wounded and prisoners were treated with the

- a greatest humanity by the Indians, whose general accepted peace notwithstanding his victory. One they put to death, upon information that he was deeply concerned in the death of the inca Atahualpa, and had actually drawn up the process against the monarch, although this account was in reality false. It was owing to the policy and diligence of the Spanish prisoners, that a peace was negotiated. They so gained upon the affections of the Indians, and powerfully represented the madness of opposing Pizarro, who had more than half the empire in his interest, that they dismissed them with rich presents of gold, signed a peace with them, as the representatives of the general, and exhorted them to procure his ratification of the treaty; the terms of which were to the following purpose. That henceforward all hostilities should cease between the Spaniards and Indians. That the
- b Spaniards should not deprive the new inca of his right, nor oppose his election. That the Spaniards should set all the Indians at liberty whom they held in chains, and that henceforward no Indian should be imprisoned who was willing to enter into the Spanish service. That all the laws made by the former incas, which were not prejudicial to the pretensions of the Spaniards, should remain in force; and that the governor Don Francisco Pizarro should send this treaty to the court of Spain, to be ratified by the emperor.

- THE new colony at St. Miguel was left under the direction of Sebastian de Belalcazar. Since the departure of Pizarro, it was powerfully reinforced by a great number of Spaniards, that flocked from Panama, upon the report of the immense riches acquired by the adventurers. Belalcazar, who was of a warlike, enterprising spirit, thought to profit
- c by his strength, enlarge his stock of riches by new conquests, and rival the power of the other commanders, by striking some blow equally important and unexpected. He contrived matters with such address, that the council proposed he should march with a body of forces to Quito, where it was reported Atahualpa, and the preceding inca, had treasured up much wealth. He was not long in obeying the orders of the magistrates. Having assembled a corps of an hundred and forty horse and foot well armed, he marched to Carrachabamba, one of the interior mountainous provinces, and, before he reached Zeropalta, suffered incredible hardships. The news of his progress soon reached Quito; upon which it is supposed that the Indians concealed a prodigious quantity of gold and silver, in order to disappoint the Spaniards, whose avarice they detested. They also as-
- d sembled forces to oppose them, under the conduct of Yiuruminavi, who represented to them the danger that threatened their liberty, lives, and property. The first thing done by this general was to dispatch a body of men to watch the motions of the Spaniards, in the neighbourhood of Zeropalta. Without knowing any thing of this detachment, Belalcazar was advancing with thirty horse towards Tomabamba, met the Indian party on the road, and by his presence, with the terror which his horse inspired, defeated their designs, and obliged them to retire with great precipitation to the main army.

Belalcazar's expedition to Quito.

- WHILE the Spanish commander resided at Tomabamba, he received an embassy from the inhabitants of the provinces called Canaries, desiring an alliance with the Spaniards, in order to revenge the cruelties committed by the friends of Atahualpa, in their country,
- e during the late civil commotions. Their request was readily granted, and Belalcazar exhorted them to raise forces immediately to assist in the designs formed upon Quito. However, before any effects could be expected from this confederacy, advice of the defeat of their detachment arrived at Quito, where it produced the strongest and most ardent thirst of revenge. It was immediately resolved to raise an army of fifty thousand men, and to crush the Spaniards under the weight of numbers. Belalcazar was no less diligent and eager. He detached a small party of ten horse, under the conduct of Ruyz Diaz, to get intelligence, and reconnoitre the enemy's disposition. This party was soon attacked, and surrounded by a body of Indians placed in ambush by the general. The Spaniards
- f fought with great resolution, and made dreadful carnage; but he must have sunk under the weight of superior numbers, had not one of his soldiers broke through the enemy by an extraordinary effort, and given advice to Belalcazar of the danger of Ruyz. Leaving a small party for the security of his quarters, Belalcazar posted away to the assistance of this brave officer, whom he found fighting valiantly in the midst of heaps of slaughtered Indians. The enemy were not discouraged either with their loss, or the arrival of Belalcazar: on the contrary, their fury was exalted, they redoubled their endeavours, and appeared determined to perish or to conquer; but fatigue, at length, obliged the combatants to separate, as if by mutual agreement, the Indians all the while denouncing vengeance, and
- g boasting that the Spaniards would find a different kind of resistance in their approaches to Quito, to what they met with at Caxamalca.

In the night Belalcazar took the utmost care of his wounded, while the enemy employed themselves diligently in making such fortifications as the time would allow, and they thought sufficient to resist the power of the Spaniards. Of this the Spanish commander was aware. The courage and obstinacy they had shewn the past day, left him little hope that he should be able to force their entrenchments; he therefore resolved to try the effects of policy, and, while the darkness of the night concealed his motions, to take the road of Chima and Tarbas. An Indian offered to conduct him by a safe road through which he might escape the enemy; but he had scarce marched a league when he was overtaken, and attacked in the rear, by the whole body of the Indian army. At the same time, Yiuruminavi dispatched several thousand men to occupy the passes, and dig pits, which he ordered to be covered with grass, as passes for the cavalry. The action was sustained in the rear by thirty horse, while Belalcazar, with the rest of the troops, struggled to gain a neighbouring eminence, which he at last accomplished, after much difficulty, and then sent succour to the cavalry in the rear. Here the battle raged for some time, until the enemy thought that the pits, ordered to be dug, were finished; when they drew off, and wheeled, with great velocity, to the front. What the consequence of this stratagem might have been, is uncertain, had it not been discovered to Belalcazar by a deserter; but it was now rendered abortive by the resolution of the Spaniards to quit the road to Ricbamba, and make the best of their way over some steep mountains leading to Quito. When the Indians observed their intention, they were dispirited, not doubting but the Spaniards were protected by some divinity, who revealed all the stratagem contrived against them. They insisted that their generals would make immediate proposals of peace; but Yiuruminavi laboured to convince them, that it was better to perish with their swords in their hands, than to become the slavish dependants on an insolent, rapacious enemy, who paid no regard to justice, innocence, treaties, misfortune, or the most sacred ties of religion and humanity. His eloquence again roused up their resentment, and they marched in pursuit of the Spaniards, who arrived safe at the stately palace of Ricbamba before they were overtaken. From thence they sallied out with thirty horse upon the Indians, and drove them back with great slaughter; but they again returned at the persuasion of their general, and seemed determined to dispute every inch of the road to Quito. After resting twelve days, Belalcazar resumed his march, and was joined on the road by a body of his new allies, the Canaries, who congratulated him very cordially on his late victories, and assured him of their endeavours to render the issue of the expedition as fortunate as the beginning. They were averse to all pacific overtures; however, the Spanish general, that he might have nothing to reproach himself with, in case of any untoward incident, made very equitable proposals to the Indians, which were rejected by Yiuruminavi, who was now fortified on the opposite bank of a river, over which the Spaniards were to pass. The cavalry led the way, and charged with great impetuosity; the infantry followed, ply'd their musketry and cross-bows while they were crossing the river, and, as soon as they touched shore, fell in with their swords upon the enemy with irresistible fury, and defeated them at the first onset, making very considerable slaughter, and a number of prisoners. Here they had likewise dug pits for the horses; but the Spaniards grown cautious by experience, discovered and eluded the stratagem: yet still they were continually harrassed in their march; every thing produced fresh and obstinate skirmishes. Belalcazar was tired and shocked with slaughter and bloodshed; he sent an Indian, with a cross in his hand, to make proposals of peace, or, at least, of a cessation from hostilities, which many of the Indians were ready to embrace, had not Yiuruminavi again interposed, and by his inflammatory eloquence revived the dying sparks of resentment and vengeance. He painted the character of the Spaniards in the most odious colours, and declared his fixed resolution rather to perish than submit, a determination to which all presently acceded. They honoured their leader with the title of atundapo, or great lord, and, in the transport of their fury, murdered the messenger. Every mind was bent on opposing the advances of the Spaniards to Quito; they made perpetual attacks, and kept Belalcazar in continual alarm and hurry, but could not prevent his reaching a pass in the country of Quito, which they had fortified with all the knowledge they possessed in the art of war. Several deep trenches had been dug here, and divers little bastions, filled with archers, were erected; however, the fame of the immense treasures contained in the capital of the province so inflamed the minds of the Spaniards, that they pushed the attack with more than human valour, carried all the works before them at the first assault, drove the enemy to take shelter in Quito, and from thence in the mountains. Yiuruminavi perceiving he could not maintain his ground in the city, used his utmost influence with the inhabitants to retire to the mountains, and there watch the first favourable opportunity of attacking the enemy, lulled in security, and intoxicated with prosperity; but three hundred families having resolved to rely upon the humanity of the Spaniards, he ordered them to be massacred, and their houses levelled to the ground. Thus Belalcazar got possession of the city, without opposition, though here he expected the greatest resistance; but none of the vast treasures

a of which fame had spoke loudly were to be found, to the grievous disappointment of the soldiers, who now regretted all their past labours. Belalcazar made the strictest enquiry amongst the natives; but he could obtain no other answer, than that Turuminaui had concealed it in some place unknown to them, and that great riches were carried off by the families who retreated to the mountains.

MEAN time Pedro de Alvarado, one of the principal officers engaged under Cortez in the conquest of Mexico, was seduced by the report of the inexhaustible wealth of Peru to raise an armament for invading that empire, contrary to the express privileges granted to Pizarro and Almagro. Almost all the Spanish settlements on the continent were abandoned by the inhabitants, who flocked in crowds to share in the honour and profit of Pizarro's enterprize. Alvarado with regret beheld himself second to Cortez in the former expedition; but he hoped to render himself equal, or even superior to Pizarro in the second; and to his own experience in the art of war, he joined the assistance of some of the best officers and approved soldiers of the age. Garcilasso de la Vega, whose father attended Alvarado upon this occasion, alledges, that he had a commission from Charles V. to conquer, govern, and plant all those countries on that part of the continent, not yet possessed by the Spaniards, and that his jurisdiction was wholly independent on the authority of Pizarro and Almagro: this is possible enough; but with respect to Peru, it was contained in the charter given to Pizarro. While Alvarado's fleet and army were getting ready, he dispatched Garcias Holguin, in a small vessel, to procure some intelligence of the country and coast, against which he intended the expedition, and also of the progress of the Spaniards; but Holguin, after encountering manifold hardships, could proceed no farther than Puerto Viejo, where he received some vague accounts of Pizarro, the riches he had acquired, the immense wealth that still remained; and a few other general pieces of information, with which he returned to Alvarado, and whetted the appetite of the mariners and soldiers for pursuing the enterprize. They now embarked to the number of seven hundred men, two hundred and twenty-seven of whom were horsemen; and, after thirty days sailing, arrived at Cape St. Francis, in one degree of north latitude. Alvarado perceiving the crews grew sickly, and that the horses perished, or contracted such diseases as would render them useless, landed on the bay of Caragues, harangued his men, nominated all his officers, sent the provisions by sea to Puerto Viejo, and proceeded with some horse to Mantua, a town in which was found a very rich booty in gold and silver. Orders were given to the pilot to sail along the coast of Peru, to the farther extremity of Pizarro's government, to make the necessary charts, observe the soundings and harbours, and set up marks of having taken formal possession. It appears that Alvarado had no design to encroach on Pizarro's rights; but the exaggerated accounts which the Indians gave of the incredible wealth of Quito, so inflamed his people, that he was compelled into that expedition, to avoid being deserted. The hardships from famine and fatigue, encountered in this tedious and perilous march, proved the ruin of his army. Great numbers of men and horses died, and to such necessity were the troops reduced, that even the officers lived upon the flesh of dogs and horses which had perished with want. What the Spanish writers relate of his having passed over snowy mountains under the equator, and losing sixty of his people, who were frozen to death, has so much the air of fable, that we do not chuse to follow them in so extraordinary a particular. Very probably the heavy rains, which fell in those countries, might have produced a mortality among the Spaniards; and we cannot possibly deny, although we have the liberty of doubting another circumstance in the Spanish account of this expedition. It is affirmed, that Alvarado directed his march over a sandy desert, wholly destitute of water; where all his people must infallibly have perished, had they not providentially met with large groves of bamboe canes, of extraordinary size, in the joints of which were found a sufficient quantity of excellent water for the men and horses.

Pedro Alvarado arrives in Peru.

AT this time Pizarro and Almagro were deeply engaged in the progress of their conquest, and the news of Alvarado's approach and designs gave them the greatest disturbance. A body of horse was immediately detached by Almagro to watch his motions; but this party fell into Alvarado's hands, was kindly treated, and dismissed. This moderation suggested the first idea of compromising differences in such a manner, that all should heartily unite in the same design. Almagro made the proposals, and they were accepted, without hesitation, by Alvarado; who was sensible of the necessity of perfect harmony among the Spaniards, which alone could insure success to any of the parties engaged in this arduous enterprize. An interview was appointed, and the following agreement signed by the commanders; that an hundred thousand pesos should be paid to Alvarado, by Pizarro and Almagro; that such of Alvarado's officers and soldiers as desired to serve under Pizarro and Almagro, should be provided for as their own troops, according to the merit of their services; that Alvarado should return to Mexico, after he had visited Pizarro at Cuzco, of which capital a he had heard the most extravagant accounts. There were some other stipulations of less consequence in this treaty, to which both parties adhered with great punctuality; except that Pizarro, apprehensive lest seeing the immense wealth of Cuzco might stagger Alvarado's resolution, sent him a message, that he would save him the trouble of so tedious a journey, and give him the meeting in the valley Pacacamec; for which place he immediately set out, escorted by a body of cavalry. Here he met with Alvarado and Almagro, to the former of whom he gave the command of all the troops while he remained there, in order to ingratiate himself the more, and by acts of complaisance keep Alvarado steady to his agreement. He also paid him 20,000 pesos more than was stipulated in the treaty, made him several valuable presents of torquises, and other precious stones, and conducted him- b self with so much address, that Alvarado returned perfectly satisfied to Mexico, having been fully recompenced for the expences and trouble of the expedition, and assured that all his soldiers and officers would be well provided for, according to their several abilities.

Pizarro sets out for Cuzco.

WE must now return to survey the proceedings of Pizarro, previous to the agreement with Alvarado, which we were obliged to defer, to prevent interrupting the chain of events. He had remained at Caxamalca since the death of Atahualpa, contenting himself with sending detachments to gain a more perfect knowledge of the different provinces. We have related the issue of these expeditions, and the death of the new inca, Taparta, set up by the Spaniards. Pizarro now determined to follow Soto, with the rest of the forces, and proceed to Cuzco; the total reduction of which might greatly contribute to restore the c tranquility of Peru, and dispose the natives to submission. Almagro accompanied him in this march, and was chiefly instrumental in the defeat of an Indian army that opposed their progress, and gave battle in the vale of Xauxa. On the mountain of Bilcaonga he rejoined Soto; and in the month of October made his public entry, without obstruction, into the great city of Cuzco; where, notwithstanding the immense wealth that had been carried off and concealed, he found treasures, beyond the most sanguine expectation, in gold and silver, cast into bars, vessels, and ornaments. Gomara gives the following account of the behaviour of the Spaniards at Cuzco, and of the vast riches they required. "They immediately set to work in unripping the gold and silver from the walls of the d temple, to dig up the vessels of gold and silver concealed in the graves, and buried with the dead, to plunder the idols, houses, and fortrefs, in which great quantities of the precious metal had been amassed by the late inca. In Cuzco much larger treasures were found than those brought to the Spaniards for the ransom of Atahualpa. However, the share of each soldier was not equal to the former dividend, because their numbers were now greatly augmented by Alvarado's troops; nor was the fame of this action so loud as the first, which united the triumph of riches with the imprisonment of a great monarch. A certain Spaniard entered a vault, and found e there an entire tomb of pure silver, of inestimable value. Others met with similar fortune in an inferior degree; for it was customary with the rich men of this country to be buried in this manner in the fields, and laid in state like idols. Nor were the Spaniards contented with this prize; but still thirsting after more wealth, they searched, with indefatigable industry, for the treasures of Huascar Capac, and other princes of Cuzco; but they were disappointed in their enquiries, although they tortured several poor Indians, to oblige them to discover what they did not know, and the places where their great men were interred." It is probable that the Peruvians concealed their riches in the temples and tombs, because they could not imagine the Spaniards would be so brutal, as to rake up the ashes of the dead, or violate the reverence due to the gods; in which they were mistaken.

BEING now in possession of the capital, Pizarro invited the people to return to their dwellings. It was by no means his intention to drive the people to despair, lest the whole power of Peru uniting, might inclose him in Cuzco, and, by cutting off his provision, reduce him to their own terms, without hazarding a battle, or giving the Spaniards an opportunity of exerting their superior skill and courage. Many accepted the invitation; and it is asserted, that the inca himself made an offer to embrace Christianity, and acknowledge the sovereignty of his Catholic majesty, provided that neither himself nor his subjects should, for the future, be molested in their persons and property. He entertained thoughts of visiting Pizarro in person, and demanding restitution of his kingdom, on the preceding conditions; but he was dissuaded for this time by the remonstrances of his council, who strongly admonished him not to confide in the treacherous Spaniards, who had cruelly put his brother to death, without regard to the most solemn engagements. Soon after, however, he resumed the same project, and spoke to his council in the following terms: "Sons, brethren, and subjects, we have now determined to demand justice in per- f a "son of those strangers, reputed the descendants of the great god Virachoca, who, at "their first entrance into our country, declared their firm resolution to do justice to all "mankind. I cannot therefore doubt they will admit my claim, so consonant to reason "and equity. If they really are the children of the sun, as our ancestors were, who "brought us truth for a principle, their actions will correspond with their words, and "they will certainly not deny what they solemnly engaged to perform. For my part,

 "I had rather trust to the justice of my cause, than to the force of arms. If they are
 "what they pretend, the messengers of the god Pachacamac, they will dread offending
 "him, by doing any thing so inconsistent as injustice with the nature of the divinity.
 "Let us therefore boldly go to them, armed with the justice of our cause; and since we b "believe them to be the offspring of the great deity, trust they will act agreeable to their "high descent. Our ancestors never deprived the curacas of their hereditary rights,
 "even in cases of rebellion; can we then imagine that the Spaniards will divest us of our
 "lawful inheritance, who never did them any injury, who, instead of opposing their "entrance, actually resigned every thing upon their summons? Let us go in a peace-
 "able manner; for if we go armed, they will suspect our intentions are hostile, and "will make that a pretext for refusing our just demand. Avarice lays hold of the "smallest opportunity to gratify that passion. Instead of our arms, let us carry such "presents with us, as may serve to win the affections of covetous men, and pacify the "displeasure of offended gods. Let us collect all the gold and silver, and precious stones, c "in our power, and by this offering of our wealth, take away the temptation to in"justice and oppression. It is true, the ancient power of our kings is fallen; but still
 "let us maintain their integrity, honour, and prudence; and if this will not prevail with
 "the strangers to restore to us our empire, we may then absolutely conclude, that
 "the prophecy of the inca, our father and predecessor, is accomplished, that our mo"narchy is to be translated to strangers, our political government destroyed, and our "religion abolished; part of which prophecy we have already seen fulfilled. If the "Pachacamac has ordered these things, what have we to do but to submit? Let them
 "act as they please, it becomes us to pursue the maxims of reason and justice."

The inca's speech to his council.

THIS speech, pronounced with great pathos and energy, drew tears from the whole asd sembly. They lamented the approaching destruction of the empire, but prepared to obey their prince, and provide every necessary for his journey. When his retinue and equipage was in readiness, he set out for Cuzco, with a great number of vassals, officers of his army, great lords of his household, and other dependents; and was met by the Spaniards, who had intimation of his design, at some distance from the city. His courtiers advised that he might be carried, agreeable to his dignity, in the state chair, made of pure gold, and wear on his temples the coloured wreath: but the inca said, that these badges of royalty ill-became a petitioner; therefore he desired to be conveyed in a bare low litter. He was received and welcomed with great reverence by Pizarro, who caused him to be crowned and invested in the cassona, or royal palace, with all the formality used on e former occasions in that country. A treaty was concluded, favourable to both parties, which we need not specify, as it was soon broken, and mutually disregarded. These pacific measures were taken, because it was known, that both the southern and northern provinces were assembling forces, under the generals Tiruminavi and Quizquiz; and also, because Pizarro had formed a project of settling colonies, and founding cities upon the coast, which he could not execute until the public commotions were subsided. The latter of these generals, incensed at the concessions made by the inca, and the power assumed by a few hundred strangers in the centre of the empire, and heart of the capital, assembled a great army of Mitimies to expel them from Peru, and recover the ancient liberty of the nation. He harangued his people with great vehemence, laid before them the shameful f usurpation of the Spaniards, the disgraceful timidity of the inca, the danger that threatened their religion, manners, lives, and properties, the dreadful carnage already made by the strangers, their extraordinary avarice and rapacity, with every other circumstance that could rouse, inflame, and animate. When he found he had sufficiently excited a spirit of resentment and revenge, he artfully applied himself to the Guamaracunas, a nation distinguished for valour in the province of Quito. This people had already felt the scourge of Spanish tyranny, and thirsted for an opportunity of revenging their losses and disgraces. These he advised, merely to try their sentiments, to retire quietly to the lands of their ancestors, to till the grounds, and depend on the generosity of the strangers for g the liberty of enjoying the fruits of their labour. So inflammatory an insinuation produced the desired effect. The Guamaracunas declared to a man, they would first try the fortune of war with the Spaniards, desired he would conduct them, and, if they failed in the enterprise, they would then pursue his advice, and submit to slavery. It was then resolved a to attack Cuzco, and endeavour to drive the Spaniards out of the capital, and accordingly he advanced with great resolution. Pizarro and Almagro, who had intimation of the designs of the Indians, marched out at the head of a select body of horse and foot, came up with the enemy at the bridge of Apurima, and, by the vigour of their onset, soon reduced them, unmindful of all their valorous determinations. Without scarce any resistance, they turned their backs, and suffered themselves to be slaughtered in heaps, till night and fatigue put a stop to bloodshed. Soto continued the pursuit as far as Bilcas, while Pizarro returned triumphant to Cuzco, in full expectation that the enemy would not venture upon a second attempt to disturb the public tranquillity; in which he was mistaken.

QUIZQUIZ was disconcerted, but not discouraged, by this defeat. He resolved upon b another trial of arms, and accordingly set, with great diligence, about levying forces. It was now his intention to surprise the Spaniards; but it was impossible to conduct so great an undertaking with secrecy. The Ymucanoes, who stood in dread of Pizarro, brought him informations of all that was transacting; and it was determined to meet the Indians in the plain, where the cavalry might act in conjunction with the infantry and confederate Indians. Here another battle was fought with the same fortune; but victory proved less decisive, and more bloody on the side of the Spaniards, who could not prevent Quizquiz from taking the road of Quito, in good order.

It was after these fortunate events, that Pizarro resolved to pursue his project c of establishing colonies and building cities, for which purpose he now set out for Cuzco. Accordingly he laid the foundation of Lima, in twelve degrees and a half south latitude, on the borders of a river, about six miles from the South Sea, and nearly the same distance from the island and harbour of Callao. In this particular Garcilasso and Herrera agree, notwithstanding some writers date the foundation of this capital four years earlier. Hither he removed the colony settled at the city called Des los Reyes, and it soon became populous and flourishing. Lands were assigned to the inhabitants; and the natives, who were tied down to the glebe under the curacas, were now transferred like cattle, or any other property, by the Spaniards. Proceeding farther northward, he built another city, in nearly the eighth degree of south latitude, which he called Truxillo; d and here also he made a division of the lands and Indians among the new colonists, without any distinction between those who were born freemen, and those who had been slaves and villains from their birth, all being subjected to the same drudgery, and the same tortures, if they proved disobedient, repined at their hard fate, or refused to discover, what they never knew, where the treasures of the caziques and princes were deposited. During his residence in this city, advices arrived from Spain, that his brother Ferdinando had succeeded in almost all his negotiations at the Spanish court. Pizarro petitioned that his government might be extended two hundred leagues to the southward; that he might have a grant to him and his heirs of the province of Atabilos, with all its revenues, and the perpetual vassalage of twenty thousand Indians: but the emperor, who found an unreasonable ambition in this request, only vested him with the title of marquis of that e province, and enlarged his government to the southward. But with respect to the dominion over the Indians, he must, he said, inform himself of the peculiar customs of the country, and the equity of the measure; after which Pizarro might depend on all the favour that was consistent with justice. Almagro too, in consequence of Ferdinando Pizarro's application, had very extraordinary honours bestowed upon him. He was created marquis of Peru, and had a jurisdiction of 200 leagues extent, southward of the frontier of Pizarro's government. He was likewise empowered to make discoveries in what manner he thought proper; and the rich province of Chili fell under his authority, which laid the foundation of all the discord and contention that ensued. Almagro and Pizarro grew jealous of f the favours shewn to each by the government. The one regarded the other as the minion of the court, and complained that sufficient regard had not been paid to his peculiar services. Their adherents cherished these seeds of animosity, and the brothers of Pizarro treated the friends of Almagro with great haughtiness. The Spanish writers differ in their relation of this affair. Herrera alledges, that the marquis Pizarro returning from Truxillo, adjusted all differences with Almagro, restrained the insolence of his brethren, set out for Lima, and left the government of Cuzco in the hands of one of his brothers; while, on the other hand, Almagro went upon an expedition to Chili. On the contrary, Garcilasso affirms, that Almagro, jealous of the capital's being assigned to Pizarro, took upon himself the g title of governor of Cuzco, and all its dependencies, and threw off all subordination to Pizarro; an usurpation that was boldly opposed by the brothers of the marquis. According to this writer, the dispute rose to such a height, that both parties had recourse to arms, a formal war was declared, and several Spaniards and Indians were slain on both sides, before the

- a the arrival of the marquis, who, by his moderation and policy, accommodated all differences, and concluded a treaty with Almagro. It was therefore, in all probability, after this affair, that Almagro formed the scheme of marching to Chili; since we find it expressly stipulated in the treaty with Pizarro, that his right to this province should not only be uncontested, but he should have the command of the bulk of their joint forces to assist him in reducing it to obedience. The other principal articles of the agreement were, that the co-partnership between Pizarro and Almagro should subsist, without infraction through interest, ambition, or any other motive; that all the conditions stipulated in the original contract, should be rigorously maintained; that all dispatches to the court of Spain should be in the joint name of the commanders; and that all profits and expences should be clearly produced, and faithfully divided. This treaty was signed on the 12th day of June, and solemnly sworn to by both parties; but how it was executed, will soon appear.

- Such was the posture of affairs when Almagro proposed to set out on the expedition to the southward; requesting the inca to appoint two Indians of distinction, to prepare and dispose the minds of the natives for the reception of the Spanish forces. In consequence of this request, the inca ordered his brother Topu, and the high priest Vileboma, to execute that commission, whose high dignity would not only give them consequence with the natives, but whose absence from Cuzco would remove all cause of jealousy from the Spaniards, as the high priest was of a restless turbulent spirit (D). The Spaniards also took with them a great number of slaves to carry the baggage; and that all the soldiers might be well supplied with necessaries, Almagro lent them two hundred thousand crowns, taking only their notes for the repayment out of the booty they might acquire in the expedition. Through the course of a tedious march of two hundred leagues, he was well accommodated by all the Indians, who paid the highest regard to the inca's command, and supplied the soldiers with abundance of provision; but reaching the inhospitable barren country of Charcas, fatigue and hunger produced discontents among the troops, and determined Almagro to proceed to Chili, being ignorant of the immense wealth, both in the country he despised, and the invaluable mines of Potosi. The confederate Indians in his army remonstrated on the hazard and difficulty of the design, acquainting him, that the journey must be pursued either over the high mountains of the Andes, or Cordilleras, which at this time were covered with snow, and so intensely cold, that no Indian could possibly support the rigor of the climate; or through a sandy desert along the coast, where the excessive heat of the sun reflected from the sand, and the want of water, would hazard the entire destruction of the army. These were difficulties which could not check the ardor of Almagro, inflamed with the exaggerated accounts of the riches of Chili. He chose to climb the Cordilleras, as shorter, and more agreeable to the constitution of his troops; but he made only an inconsiderable progress, when the depth of the snow obliged him to dig his way through, while the Indians perished in multitudes, their naked bodies being exposed to all the severity of the weather. Garcilasso alledges, that not less than ten thousand Indians, and an hundred and fifty Spaniards, breathed their last in these dreadful mountains; and so intense was this cold, that many of the survivors lost their toes and fingers. At last, after encountering all the difficulties which the most rigorous cold, the greatest fatigue and hunger could throw in their way, the Spaniards conquered the Andes, and reached a fine, fertile, temperate plain on the opposite side, where they were received with the most cordial and feeling hospitality by the benevolent natives, who supplied them with every kind of provision and refreshment, which the country afforded, administering to the necessities of the wretched soldiers with the utmost humanity.

- While Almagro was resting his wearied troops in this terrestrial paradise, the inhabitants of Chili, informed that certain deputies of the great god Virachoca had honoured them with a visit, immediately collected an offering in gold and silver, which amounted to two hundred thousand ducats, and soon after brought another present to Almagro, exceeding three hundred thousand ducats; upon which he cancelled the notes taken from the soldiers, and also made them a present in compensation of their sufferings. Those rich offerings confirmed all the accounts he had conceived of the wealth of the country: he congratulated himself upon the valuable grant made to him by the court, and determined immediately to subdue the provinces of Purrumanta, Antielli, Pinta, Canqui, and other in-expedition.

(D) As a specimen of the immense wealth found at Cuzco, it is sufficient to observe, that when the plate was melting down to defray the expences of Almagro's expedition, one of the soldiers begged a ring out of the heaps of gold and silver; and Almagro told him, he might take as many as he could hold in both hands: besides which, he made a present to the soldier's wife of four hundred pieces of eight (1).

terior countries which did not acknowledge the authority of the inca. With this design, ^a he recommended to Paulla Topu, brother to the inca, to assemble all the Indians he could to reinforce the Spaniards, and with the united forces he advanced towards the southern extremity of Chili. In his march he had several sharp skirmishes with the natives, who fought with great resolution, and disputed every inch they yielded. The confederates sustained considerable loss; but in the space of five months they reduced all the provinces under subjection, and would have effectually established their dominion, had not new projects filled the mind of Almagro. He had been joined by Knyz Diaz and Juan de Herreda, with above a hundred Spaniards, who had crossed the mountains in a more favourable season of the year, and was in a prosperous course of victory, when he formed the resolution of returning to Peru, ^b in consequence of the emperor's commission, brought to him by the hands of Herreda. By this commission it appeared that Cuzco was within his department. Pizarro's original grant extended no farther than the equator; that was now enlarged by two hundred leagues to the southward; but as Cuzco lay three hundred leagues from the equator, and all south of his frontier was assigned to Almagro, within prescribed limits, he justly reckoned Cuzco within his jurisdiction, and resolved, by the advice of his friends, not to give up so valuable a city, happily situated to command the provinces of his department. The plan, therefore, was concerted for returning to Peru, in full hopes, that if Almagro possessed the capital, all the southern provinces would immediately submit. As the Spaniards had not yet forgot their sufferings on the Andes, they now resolved to try the other passage through the deserts, and to provide in the best manner possible against every accident, and especially the want of water; for which purpose, ^c parties of Indians were detached before them, to cleanse the wells choaked up with sand, and neglected during the late intestine commotions. Besides this precaution, a great number of leathern bottles of sheep skins were provided, and filled with water; and a small body of horse was sent out to examine whether the Indians had given a just report of the country through which the army was to pass, and faithfully executed the orders respecting the wells. Every thing being settled with the utmost punctuality, he began his march, and suffered incredible hardships in the desert of two hundred miles extent, notwithstanding all his foresight and providence. In this march he was deserted by the high priest, in consequence of advices he received of disturbances between the emperor ^d and the Spaniards at Cuzco. Herrera indeed relates, that he went off during Almagro's progress to Chili, and was the chief instrument of the revolt of the inca, and the Peruvians; but Garcilasso not only affirms, that the high priest continued with him until the present juncture, but that to his influence was owing the extraordinary respect shewn to the Spaniards in the different provinces of Chili. He farther relates, that this priest Vileboma was assisted in his escape by the interpreter Filippo, who was seized, condemned, and executed, after he had confessed the false evidence he had given against Atabualapa. With respect to Paullu, he remained faithful to Almagro, and received the reward of his services; for the Spaniards were no sooner informed of the war carried on in Peru, between the emperor and the Spaniards, than they proclaimed this prince inca, and Almagro, with his own hands, ^e adorned his temples with the imperial wreath.

Indians inca discontented.

WHILE Almagro was employed in the expedition to Chili, a variety of causes of discontent arose at Cuzco, between the Spaniards and the Indians; the principal of which was the dilatoriness of Pizarro to execute the articles of agreement with the inca, of reinstating him in his dominions and authority. Upon this head Manco Capac made frequent remonstrances to the marquis; but he was always put off with fresh excuses and pretexts. The inca had sufficient provocation to dive into the bottom of this conduct, and there were not wanting a sufficient number of the Indian nobility to aggravate the grievance, and rake up the embers of discord, both out of hatred to the Spaniards, and motives of self-interest. The inca now perceiving, that the Spaniards not only prevaricated, with respect to the performance of their engagements, but that he would be detained a prisoner, in case he refused submission to whatever Pizarro thought fit to propose, dissembled his resentment, and waited patiently until the opportunity offered to break this galling bondage. The resentment of this prince was likewise increased by fresh injuries and instances of Spanish perfidy. Ferdinando Pizarro, who was returned about this time from Spain, had promised the emperor a large sum of money from Peru, as the price of the honours and grants made to his brother. At this time the court was extremely necessitous, all the money in the treasury being exhausted by the continual wars carried on by Charles V. and the expectation of a liberal donation from Pizarro, rendered the emperor more willing to extend his authority, and load him with honours. However, the marquis was of ^a HERRERA, p. 135. GARCILASSO, lib. ii. cap. ii.

- a opinion, that he had already sufficiently paid for all the imperial favours, and that he and his soldiers were justly entitled to the remaining wealth, as the reward of all their sufferings, toils, and conquests. He could not, with patience, think of yielding up the fruits of his labour, to a set of idle, extravagant, and rapacious courtiers; and therefore told his brother, when he was informed of his engagements to the emperor, that he had conquered Peru at his own expence, without any assistance from the government; that he had already remitted a vast sum of money; that Peru was now exhausted, and all its riches laid out in building towns, planting colonies, and establishing other measures to secure the conquest, all which would redound in time to the honour of the crown, and interest of the government; but that, for the present, it was sufficient for infant settlements to maintain themselves. He particularly resented the enquiry which the emperor set on foot, respecting the ransom and treasures of Atahualpa; and concluded, with leaving his brother Ferdinando to fall upon means to perform the extravagant promises which he made to the Spanish administration. It was this answer which determined Ferdinando to request the government of Cuzco; telling the marquis, that he doubted not but this opulent capital would enable him to make good his engagements to the court, and thereby secure the future protection of the emperor; which he would find of the utmost importance, in case the dispute with his colleague, Almagro, should ever be renewed. By this means he wrought upon the marquis to grant his request; and immediately took possession of his government, with a full resolution to procure the remittance to the court, whatever might follow, and even at the expence of sound policy, of solemn engagements, and the most sacred rights of nations. He gave the inca to understand, that he would engage for his restoration to his dignity, on condition of a considerable present to the court of Spain; and the better to convince him of his intentions, he removed him to the royal palace, and treated him with all the honours due to the imperial character. The bait took; the inca, persuaded that he should regain his lost authority, dispatched expresses all over his dominions, requesting the curacas to bring the usual tribute of gold and silver, as the only means of delivering him out of the hands of the Spaniards. The tribute arrived, and a very rich present was made by the inca to the governor; who repaid it with a renewal of his promises, instead of the performance; which awakened Manco Capac to a full sense of his own danger, and the little dependence to be placed in the engagements of a perfidious nation, that sacrificed every consideration to the thirst of gold. He perceived that honours were indeed paid to him, but that he was still a prisoner, all the gates of the palace being occupied by Spanish soldiers.

- d

It was no unnatural conclusion, from such inauspicious promises, that his fate might resemble that of Atahualpa, who died an ignominious death, after his treasures had been drained, and he was unable to purchase the longer duration of his existence; and therefore he continually revolved in his own mind how he could escape out of custody, and revenge all the indignities he had suffered in his imprisonment. The following stratagem offered itself to his imagination, and was practised with success, which conveys a favourable idea of the cunning and address of this barbarian. He told Pizarro, that in the valley of Yucaya, where the incas were interred, there were several rich tombs, and in one of these a statue in gold of an ancient inca, as large as the life, which he was persuaded he could find, if he was allowed to go in search of it with his usual guard of Spaniards. This was a proposal not to be resisted, especially as it was made with all the appearance of candor, and obviously with design to promote the execution of the governor's engagements. Accordingly Pizarro thanked the inca, readily embraced the offer, and consented that Manco Capac should go to the tombs of Yucaya, with a Spanish guard, little suspecting there was a general conspiracy laid to rescue the prince. In short, the inca had apprised some of the adjacent curacas of his intention, who assembling a considerable army, hid themselves in the neighbouring mountains, and kept spies abroad, to acquaint them when the emperor, with his Spanish guards, should appear. It was intended to attack the Spaniards, but the inca saved his troops that hazard: he found means to escape, joined his army, and then left the Spaniards to lament their own credulity, and admire the policy of the Indian sovereign (E). Herrera asserts, that he purchased his liberty.

(E) This is the account given by two Spanish writers, Gomara and Carate, but related differently by Garcilasso, who alledges, that Manco Capac obtained leave to go to Yucaya to celebrate a festival, prepared by the Indians, where the statue of the late inca, his father, was erecting (1). We must confess we thought the former account more probable, as it affords a stronger motive to the Spaniards to comply with the inca's request.

Origin of the war with the Indians.

The inca besieges the Spaniards in Cuzco.

MANCO CAPAC scarce found himself at liberty, when he contrived the destruction of those perfidious strangers ; who had not only usurped his authority, kept his person in bondage, tyrannized over his subjects, drained his kingdom of its riches, but violated every obligation, human and divine, from an insatiable thirst of gold, and ungovernable lust of dominion. He summoned a council of all the great officers of state, of his generals, and principal nobility ; depicted his sufferings in the strongest terms, the wretched condition of his subjects, and the tyranny and perfidiousness of the insolent Spaniards. He had early suspicion, he said, of the treachery and ambition of these strangers, by their dividing the lands of Peru among themselves, enslaving those who were born free, and putting the natives to the torture, in order to extort a confession where the treasures of the great were deposited. He apologized for sitting a tame spectator of these enormities, by alledging, that he only wanted the opportunity of making his escape, in order to revenge the injuries he had suffered, and assert the rights of his crown and country. It was impossible he could any longer regard those Spaniards as the descendants of Virachoca ; but as vile impostors, who committed the most heinous crimes under the mask of religion, and had taken upon themselves the sacred character of the messengers of the great Pachacamac, while they were perpetrating every villainy. He was now determined to punish their wickedness, and vindicate the liberties of his people by force of arms ; for which purpose, he called upon the assistance of every man, in whose breast the least spark of patriot virtue existed, that the war might be vigorously prosecuted against the ungrateful Spaniards, without whose expulsion they could never secure their religion, liberty, or property. He added a great many other arguments to rouse the council to revenge, and delivered himself with such spirit and energy, that all were wound up to a kind of madness, and called out for vengeance in the most tumultuous transports of fury. As soon as order could be restored, the council deliberated on the means of conducting the war ; with respect to the propriety and necessity of which, all were unanimous. It was resolved to dispatch messengers to all the curacas, tributary provinces, great vassals, governors and officers of the crown, in different provinces, to raise all the troops in their power, with all possible secrecy, unite at a time and place appointed, and at one blow to surprize and overwhelm the Spaniards in their quarters. Agreeable to this plan it was concerted, that three armies should be set on foot ; one to fall upon Almagro, another to attack Lima : and a third, to consist of two hundred thousand men, under the command of the inca in person, to surprize, or, if that failed, to invest Cuzco, and regularly lay siege to the capital. Every thing was executed with the most astonishing celerity ; and the Spaniards in Cuzco saw themselves surrounded by an incredible multitude of enemies, before they had any suspicion of the revolt, or had made any preparation for their defence. The attack began in the night, amidst the shouts of the Indians, and the hoarse din of their warlike instruments ; and such was the fury of the assailants, that they shot fired arrows, and set the city in flames in divers places, being determined to destroy the Spaniards at the expence of reducing the capital of the empire to ashes. Their reverence for the temple of the sun, the convent of select virgins, and a few other sacred buildings, made them abstain from firing the streets and houses in their neighbourhood, by which means the besieged were left in possession of the great square, and as much of the city as could well be defended by a slender garrison, which did not exceed two hundred horse and foot. The enemy had forced the citadel, and obliged Pizarro to form his troops in the great square, and point his artillery against the different avenues, by which he made terrible destruction, the cannon sweeping off the Indians in troops ; though even this dreadful carnage could not check their ardor. They pressed with unremitting fury for the whole night and day succeeding, until at length all the passes to the square were choaked up with dead bodies, and more than half of the city was burnt to the ground. Nothing could exceed the valour and conduct of the Spaniards upon this occasion ; the horse, in particular, sallied out, and made terrible havock. When night came on, a on, the Indian army withdrew to a little distance, occupied all the passes round the city, and blocked up the Spaniards so closely, that it was impossible they should receive any supplies, determining to continue their approaches gradually, and reduce the besieged equally by famine and the sword. To this plan they adhered so steadfastly, that their scheme must have infallibly succeeded, but for a fortunate incident, that probably saved the Spaniards from destruction. The slaves, who first felt the effects of the scarcity that prevailed, took arms in their defence, as the only method of relieving themselves in the present distress, and in hopes that their services to the christians might procure them their liberty. They flocked in multitudes to Pizarro, desired he would accept of their assistance, and were received with such promises of rewards as soon increased their number, b and augmented that of the besieged to a very considerable army. The Spaniards were now in a condition to skirmish vigorously with the Indian army, and accordingly every day produced sharp and bloody actions; but this proving insufficient for their relief, they determined to come to a general battle, drew up their forces in the great square, and seduced the enemy to an engagement with all their forces, where every advantage of situation was on the side of the christians. Here, says Garcilasso, the parties fought with unremitting fury, for the space of thirteen days; the Indians withdrawing at night, and returning vigorously to the attack early next morning, raining showers of arrows, and volleys of stones from slings, so thick upon the besieged, that he ascribes it to a miracle, and the presence of the apostle St. James, who fought for them on horseback, that all were not c demolished, and crushed into atoms, under the superior weight of the enemy. The Spaniards now proclaimed liberty to all vassals and slaves, with such rewards and immunities, as not only augmented the number of those auxiliaries, but animated them to acts of the most heroic gallantry, by which they were enabled to drive the Indians out of Cuzco and the citadel, in storming of which Juan Pizarro was killed, after the enemy had been in possession for the space of nine months, all which time the siege continued with scarce any interruption. After the junction, indeed, of the vassals with the Spaniards, they scorned being cooped up within the limits of the capital, and made excursions far into the country, returning loaded with provision, in despite of the utmost efforts of the Indians. Sometimes flocks of a thousand head of cattle were driven into the city, while a d party of Spaniards were keeping the Indian army in employment; and yet it must be confessed, that Manco Capac performed every thing becoming a spirited and magnanimous prince, had he been properly seconded by the officers and soldiers, who, after the first transports of rage, began to relax in their duty, and neglect the posts committed to their care. Many instances of the valour of private soldiers and officers, on both sides, are recorded by De la Vega; and the same writer relates such a number of prodigies and miracles, as must invalidate the belief of those actions that come within the compass of probability. St. Jago, or St. James, not only was seen fighting on a white horse in the heat of the battle, but the blessed virgin appeared over the Spanish quarters, quenched the flames that threatened to devour them, and turned aside the fiery arrows, or frustrated e their effects, even when they chanced to fall upon the dry thatch of the houses, and among other combustibles. Gomara, Carate, and Herrera, join Garcilasso in the relation of these achievements, but endeavour to persuade us, that heaven assigned them Peru and Mexico, as the Almighty formerly gave the land of Canaan, to his chosen people. God, surely, never countenanced usurpation, tyranny, cruelty, and murder, however he may sometimes permit it for wise purposes: on the contrary, the effects which these conquests have produced on the Spanish monarchy, seem to indicate the intentions of Providence; that a nation, who trampled upon every obligation, human and sacred, to possess themselves of gold, should meet with their punishment in the gratification of their f wishes (A).

ALL

(A) The number of Indians who were slain in the different actions consequent on this siege, are altogether incredible. In every slight skirmish some thousands were always slain, and the slaughter became more dreadful in proportion as the engagement was more general. On the side of the besieged near a hundred Spaniards were killed or wounded; and, what was an irreparable loss at this juncture, above a dozen horses perished. Of the confederate vassals many thousands were slain; but this rather served to animate than discourage them, and the loss even served to augment the Spanish army. When the spirit of revenge took place, many who had before kept aloof from fear, now joined in the revolt against their tyrants, and exerted their utmost endeavours not only to avoid the punishment due to their rebellion, but to merit the reward of liberty promised by the Spaniards. Divers gallant actions were performed in the way of single combat, scarce a day passing without a challenge from one or other of the parties; and it is remarkable, that notwithstanding the equality of the Indians to the Spaniards in strength, agility, and dexterity at handling their weapons when they fought singly; yet in the battle they were always worsted, although their

ALL this while the marquis Francisco Pizarro was at Lima, and the first suspicion he had of the general insurrection arose from the interruption in his correspondence with the capital. Immediately he employed the Yuncanoes, who served the Spaniards, to bring him minute information of what was transacting in the heart of the empire, by inquiries among their friends and acquaintance. The report they made greatly alarmed him; they brought word that not only Cuzco was closely besieged, but that an army was in full march to invest Lima; that another was gone in pursuit of Almagro; and that the whole empire had risen in arms by the direction of the inca, who had deceived Ferdinando Pizarro by a plausible tale, and made his escape. Though the advices of the Yuncanoes were neither very consistent, nor connected, Pizarro perceived that they contained too much truth; and not doubting but all the Spaniards in Cuzco had already perished, he applied with the utmost diligence to provide for the safety of Lima, and the other settlements; for which purpose he sent expresses to Panama, Mexico, Nicaragua, and Hispaniola, to solicit reinforcements to prevent the loss of Peru, and the most valuable conquest hitherto made by the Spaniards. All his detachments, sent to extend his conquests in different provinces, were likewise recalled to the defence of Lima; a body of an hundred horse and foot, under the command of Diego Pizarro, was ordered to march with all possible expedition towards Cuzco, either to succour the garrison if still existing, or to procure more exact information of the state of affairs: in a word, every measure was taken which prudence, and the critical conjuncture could dictate. The army destined for the attack on Lima had notice of those proceedings, and determined to way-lay the detachment sent to Cuzco, the reduction of the capital being the main object of the designs of Manco Capac, on the success of which all the rest would in a manner depend. With this view they took post in all the narrow passes and difficult defiles, through which the detachment was to march; but to conceal their stratagem the better, and to cut off any resources, they suffered Diego to advance upwards of seventy leagues before they discovered themselves, or gave him the least molestation. At last, when they found their opportunity at a pass on the mountains of Parcos, they fell upon the Spaniards with the utmost fury, tumbled down great stones and pieces of rocks from the tops of the mountains, and plied them so thick with darts and arrows, that not a soul of the whole detachment escaped. In much the same manner they cut off several other detachments that were on their way to Lima, by order of the marquis. Gonzalo de Tapia, with sixty horse and seventy foot, were destroyed; Morgovego de Quinmanes, with an equal number of men, met a similar fate; and Alonso de Galeata, at the head of forty horse and sixty foot, perished. Upon the whole, above four hundred Spaniards, who were marching to the succour of Lima, in different detachments, were slaughtered in the field of battle, besides near an equal number who were killed in the mines in different provinces, where they imagined themselves in perfect security. The Spanish writers exclaim loudly against the barbarities exercised by the Peruvians upon these occasions; but, from their own relation, nothing appears besides the just retribution of an highly injured and enraged enemy. Great numbers had flocked from the different settlements on the continent of America, and the islands of the West Indies, to share the spoils of Peru, and they diffused themselves carelessly about the country, little imagining that the Indians, who had submitted tamely to the usurpation of Pizarro when supported only by a few hundred raw adventurers, would now venture to throw off the yoke, when every province was filled with Spaniards, and the inca remained their prisoner.

FLUSHED with success, the Indian army advanced to the destruction of Lima, certain that they could not fail in the reduction of a slender garrison, dispirited by disappointment, and not yet recovered from the consternation into which they were thrown by so unexpected and general an insurrection. When they advanced within eight leagues of the city, a body of Spanish horse sallied out under the conduct of Pedro de Lerma, pushed on with the utmost impetuosity, and made such terrible slaughter, that the Indians retired to the mountains, from whence they alarmed the whole country with the noise of warlike instruments, so that they increased to the number of forty thousand men, descended again like a torrent from the hills, swept all before them, and drove the Spanish horse back to Lima, with the loss of twenty men, who died of the wounds they received in this engagement. This success not only animated the assailants, but augmented their numbers to sixty thousand men, with which army they drew nearer the city, and offered up as a

their numbers were superior by an hundred fold, which we must ascribe to the Spanish discipline, horses, artillery, and musquetry, rather than to superior valour, or miracles wrought in their favour, as all their writers assert, and more particularly Garcilasso de la Vega, that royal historian, descended from the incas by his mother.

sacrifice

- a sacrifice of thanks some Spanish prisoners they had taken, before the eyes of their countrymen; a piteous spectacle, that roused the Spanish garrison to a degree of fury, and occasioned their committing some signal instances of barbarity in their future sallies. Pizarro behaved with the greatest gallantry and prudence; however, he began to feel the pressure of hunger from the vigilance of the enemy, in cutting off all supplies; and but for the Indian slaves in the Spanish service, he must have either surrendered at discretion, or starved. The most vigorous sallies were made to introduce convoys of provision, but the great superiority of the enemy rendered them abortive. The Indians indeed were always defeated; but the garrison was not only weakened and fatigued, but generally disappointed in the design of the sally. The only resource was on the fidelity and address of their slaves, who, under pretence that they had deserted, gained admittance into the enemies camp, whence they always returned laden with provision, at that juncture the most valuable booty. Besides, they brought back an account of all the designs of the besiegers; so that when any attack was intended, the garrison having previous intimation, was in readiness to receive the enemy. However, all this could not have prevented the fall of Pizarro, and with him probably the loss of Peru, had not a providential accident occurred, which confirmed the superstitious Indians that the Spaniards were certainly protected by some invisible power. In consequence of a heavy fall of rain, the river overflowed the banks, deluged the neighbouring country, drowned great numbers of the enemy, prevented their renewing their attacks with the same facility, and opened a path for the garrison to introduce supplies into the city. From whatever natural causes this effect proceeded, both Indians and Spaniards joined in ascribing the overflowing of the river to a miracle; the former grew dispirited, thinking it in vain to strive against the gods, and the latter were animated with a double portion of courage; the one were held together merely by the authority of their commanders, while the others triumphed in every action, harrassed, fatigued, and kept in perpetual alarm, a desponding multitude, which at last withdrew, leaving the Spaniards at liberty to pursue what measures they thought proper.

- It is now time to return to Almagro, the news of whose approach, joined to a variety of circumstances, obliged the inca to relinquish the siege of Cuzco, imagining that Almagro's design was to relieve and succour his countrymen. A principle of honour, and the magnanimity of his sentiments, proved his ruin. It is affirmed that Almagro made proposals to him of an alliance against Pizarro, which he rejected with disdain, saying, that he had taken up arms to recover his own rights, and the liberties of the people, and not to assist in the base designs of one usurper against another. Garcilasso alledges, that the inca consented to an interview with Almagro, with intention to destroy him, and that here he rejected the overture of alliance; but failed in his design to assassinate the Spanish general, on account of Almagro's vigilance and circumspection. His officers endeavoured afterwards to persuade him to accept the proposal, alledging, that in promoting the discord of the Spaniards consisted his greatest security; and that by weakening both parties, he might at last recover his dominions, and totally expel the usurpers; to which he replied, "That it became not the honour of an inca to dissemble, or fail in his engagements; and that he had rather forfeit his empire, and live in perpetual exile and obscurity, than maintain his dignity by falsehood and treachery:" A saying that sufficiently demonstrates the elevation of sentiment, the strict integrity and punctilio of this prince, whom the Spaniards affect to call barbarous. Disappointed in his designs upon Cuzco, and Almagro's forces, this generous monarch now despaired of success in recovering his dominions; and desirous that his subjects might suffer as little as possible for their loyalty, he requested they would disperse, and return to their own dwellings, thereby to appease the indignation of the conquerors, while himself would watch over their safety in a secure retreat, in order to seize the first opportunity that offered for another attempt to recover their privileges, and punish the insolent and rapacious usurpers of their property and liberty. As the speech which this extraordinary monarch made upon this occasion is remarkable, we shall venture to transcribe it in the margin, upon the authority of Garcilasso de la Vega, who was personally acquainted with many of the nobility and officers who served in the inca's army at this time (B).

THE dispersion of the Indian army, and the inca's abdication, left the Spaniards at full liberty to display their animosity, and pursue their resentment. They were then in quiet possession of the empire; one commander affected to rule with despotic sway, and another prepared to disappoint him in the possession of that supreme power, while neither admitted a superior nor a rival. Almagro arriving before the walls of Cuzco, summoned Ferdinando Pizarro to surrender the city into his hands, as being included in the grant made to him by his catholic majesty. Pizarro answered, that he held the city in virtue of a commission from his brother the marquis, and that he could not deliver up his charge to any man without his instructions; besides, he affirmed, that Almagro had no kind of pretensions to it, as he knew it to be within the limits of his brother's government. However, as that was a point which he would have to be adjusted by the claimants, he was ready to obey the summons, provided it was founded upon the marquis's authority. To this Almagro replied; and several days were spent in altercation, while each side was making preparations to support his arguments by a more powerful logic. Pizarro was taking every measure to put the city in a posture of defence, and Almagro to seduce the garrison, in which he succeeded so happily, that his troops were introduced in the night, Ferdinando and Gonzalo Pizarro taken in their beds, all the Spanish forces in the city made prisoners, and the capital of the empire possessed without a drop of blood shed; besides which, Almagro was considerably reinforced, almost all the garrison having cheerfully entered into his service.

ALL this while the marquis Pizarro held no correspondence with Cuzco; and concluding, from the silence of his brothers, that all the succours he had detached were cut off, and the garrison actually destroyed, or closely blocked up, he determined upon sending so powerful a force as should bear down all opposition, cut open a path to Cuzco, and bring him certain accounts of what was transacting in the capital. With this view he assembled five hundred Spanish horse and foot, reinforced by a considerable body of Indians, gave the command of this army to Don Alonso de Alvarado, and ordered him to march with the utmost expedition to Cuzco. These forces he was enabled to raise by means of the Spaniards he had recalled from different quarters, and succours received from Panama and Nicaragua. Pedro de Lerma was appointed to command under Alvarado, who was an older officer; a slight which so disgusted him, that from that time he meditated the ruin of the enterprize. To this circumstance the Spanish writers ascribe all the subsequent misfortunes, although there appeared strong reasons for attributing it, in a great measure, to the misconduct of Alvarado. This general began his march with such celerity, and little precaution, that, unacquainted with the woods, and ill provided with guides, above four thousand Indians perished with fatigue and famine; which obliged him to halt, until an equivalent reinforcement could be pressed into the service. In this situ-

(1) Garcilasso de la Vega. lib. ii. cap. 29.

a ation he was, when Almagro receiving advice of his intentions, dispatched certain Spaniards of distinction to acquaint him that Cuzco was now in his hands; and as it belonged to his jurisdiction, according to the emperor's grant, he hoped he would make no difficulty about returning to Lima, until the controversy could be adjusted between him and the marquis. This message was roughly received by Alvarado, who, instead of listening to pacific measures, made the gentlemen prisoners who came with the proposal, and resolved to pursue his march, with intention to drive Almagro out of Cuzco. Notice of his violent proceedings no sooner reached Almagro, than he took the field, and advanced but a little way on his march, when he had the good fortune to seize a party of Alvarado's horse, that had been sent out to procure intelligence. From his prisoners he learned the posture
b of Alvarado's affairs, the disgust of Lerma, the murmurs of the soldiers and auxiliary Indians at the rigorous discipline of the general, and a variety of other circumstances, which he meditated how to convert to his own advantage. He advanced as far as the river Amancaes, and here encamped for a whole day within a little distance of the enemy, in hope of being joined by their deserters; and Garcilasso alleges that De Lerma, and several of his friends, embraced this opportunity of expressing their disgust, and ruining Alvarado. They came over to Almagro, and would certainly have seduced more than half the army, had not Almagro, upon some suspicious words, ordered Lerma to be seized, which obliged him to make his escape sooner than he had proposed. By this means, it is alleged, Almagro was perfectly informed of the enemies position, and enabled to fall upon c him in the night, with such advantages, as soon produced a complete victory, taking Alvarado prisoner, and incorporating most of his troops with his own soldiers.

Almagro defeats Alvarado, and takes him prisoner.

ALMAGRO returned triumphant to Cuzco, on the twelfth day of July, to project the means of extending his victorious arms, and securing his good fortune. He had yet the greatest difficulties remaining; he was to encounter the experienced marquis Pizarro, who, notwithstanding his losses, had still a considerable body of troops, which he would be augmenting every day with succours from Panama and other places, being in possession of the sea coast and shipping. Orgonez his lieutenant advised him to certain violent and unjustifiable measures; such as putting to death the two brothers of Pizarro in his custody, marching to Lima before the marquis could be reinforced, attacking that city with d all his power, and thence establishing an intercourse with the other settlements in different tracts of America. The latter part of this opinion was prudent; but Almagro was disposed to listen to the whole, from an apprehension that the Pizarros might execute a revolt at Cuzco, while he was absent in the expedition against their brother. He was, however, dissuaded from such a piece of barbarity by another of his officers, Jago de Almagro, who had contracted a friendship with Ferdinando Pizarro during his imprisonment, although the result evinced the necessity of this cruel policy, and the foresight of Orgonez. It was likewise doubted whether he could attack Lima, which was confessedly within the jurisdiction of his rival, without setting the emperor's grant at defiance, and declaring e himself a rebel to the government; however, the expediency of opening an intercourse with the sea, was so universally allowed to be expedient, that Almagro began his march at the head of five hundred Spanish horse and foot, and a large army of Indian auxiliaries, taking with him Ferdinando Pizarro, and leaving the other brother and Alvarado prisoners in Cuzco.

A. D. 1537.

He marches towards the coast.

MEAN time the marquis Pizarro, anxious about the situation of his brothers, and the fate of the capital, having received no advices either from them or Alvarado, and apprehending that the Indians had seized all the passes, resolved to march in person to Cuzco; and having seasonably received a reinforcement, he set out on this expedition, at the head of seven hundred horse and foot. He soon got intelligence that the siege of Cuzco was
f raised, next day followed the account of the proceeding of Almagro, and the imprisonment of his brothers, and advancing a little farther, he was informed of the defeat and imprisonment of Alvarado. Such a tide of misfortune had almost overwhelmed that spirit which had already resisted the most cruel strokes of fate. Revenge sometimes occupied his whole mind, he thought of nothing but punishing the perfidious Almagro; a notion that was soon laid aside for more cautious measures, when he reflected upon his own weakness. When he began his march, he thought only of combating Indians, and his troops were accordingly armed in the manner best calculated to answer that design; but now he had a skilful and powerful enemy to encounter, it was necessary to provide himself in a g different manner, and also to wait the junction of troops whom he hourly expected from Panama. On his return to Lima, he had notice that Almagro was advancing, which determined him to gain time, by setting on foot a negotiation. In consequence of this resolution, the licentiate Espinosa was dispatched with instructions to propose a compromise of

of their differences; and not long after several persons of distinction were sent to Almagro's camp, to enforce the licentiate's overtures, and at all events procrastinate matters until the arrival of the succours, and the necessary preparations were made to compel this rival commander by force of arms to abandon the capital. Garcilasso alledges that Espinosa reached Cuzco before Almagro began his march to the coast, and found him so elated with prosperity, that he was deaf to the proposed accommodation; although Diego de Alvarado, with great moderation and candor, remonstrated, that the conditions now offered were the very same he had lately demanded. Almagro haughtily replied, that he was not to be restrained from opening a communication with the sea, or, in the present flourishing state of his affairs, prescribed to as formerly by Pizarro, who had always usurped more authority than belonged to him, either by the king's grant, or the terms of the original contract. Still, however, Espinosa found means to protract the negotiation, until he was seized with a malady that carried him off; upon which Almagro immediately began his march, and proceeded to the valley of Chinca, leaving the government of Cuzco in the hands of Gravial de Rojas. So near an approach required all the address of Pizarro to prevent a rupture, and endeavour to procure the release of his brother Ferdinando. His commissaries waited upon Almagro in his camp, and were at first refused audience, from a suspicion that their proposals were fallacious. At length Almagro consented to send commissaries to treat with those of the marquis on the frontiers of their respective governments; but this had its difficulties, as both claimed different limits. When the objection was removed, and the place of negotiation adjusted, Almagro's commissioners were seized, and their dispatches examined, at which the marquis pretended to be greatly incensed. He denied that it was done by his authority, apologized to Almagro, dismissed the prisoners, and proposed a personal conference, at which each of the governors should be attended by twelve select friends.

Marquis
dissembles.

By this time Almagro was informed of the escape of Pizarro and Alvarado, with a hundred Spaniards, whom he had left in Cuzco; and Orgoñez seized this opportunity of pressing him to put Francisco Pizarro to death, while Jago de Alvarado urged it as a reason for dismissing him, and coming to a perfect agreement with the marquis. He was ballancing between these opinions, when he discovered a stratagem laid by Alonso de Pizarro for seizing him during the interview with the marquis, from which he escaped very narrowly; yet as the marquis disclaimed all knowledge of this perfidious attempt, Almagro still consented that the commissioners should endeavour to effect an accommodation so beneficial to both parties. Accordingly the arbitrators met; but differing in opinion, friar Francisco Bobadila was chosen umpire, all parties agreeing that he was a person of candor, sense, and integrity. However, when his determination was declared, Almagro refused to stand by his award, because he had assigned Cuzco, the city in debate, to his rival; he appealed to the council of the Indies, and resolved to maintain possession until their resolution was divulged. With this the marquis pretended to be well satisfied, desiring that matters might remain in the present posture, until the result of a final appeal to the catholic king should be known, and promising to furnish Almagro with a ship to convey his deputies into Spain, provided he would release his brother Ferdinando. This was the great object of his policy; for he dreaded the consequences to his brother of coming to an extremity, while he continued in the enemies power: but having now gained his liberty, and received a considerable reinforcement from North America, he threw off all disguise, and made vigorous preparations for retaliating all the injuries he had sustained (C). A herald was dispatched, requiring him to surrender Cuzco, and acquainting him that the marquis looked upon his jurisdiction to extend along the southern coast, quite to the straits of Magellan; by which means he entirely excluded Almagro from the grant made to him by the government. This message he enforced with a detachment of seven hundred Spanish horse and foot sent to Cuzco, under the conduct of his brothers Ferdinando and Gonzalo, while he marched with another army to Chinca, where Almagro had founded a little colony, at which he was then encamped. Advice of these measures obliged him to return with

(C) This was not the only deceit practised by the marquis in course of the altercation with Almagro, who neither adhered on his part to the exact dictates of equity or honour. The bishop of Panama, or Terra Firma Proper, had been appointed the preceding year to adjust the limits of their governments, and to assign Pizarro two hundred and seventy leagues beyond the equator, and to Almagro two hundred leagues more, by which division the marquis apprehended Cuzco would fall within the jurisdiction of his rival. To prevent his knowledge of this circumstance, it was that he persuaded Almagro to undertake the expedition to Chili; and when the bishop arrived at Lima, he dissuaded him from making that tedious journey to Cuzco to execute his commission, upon which he returned to Panama (1).

(1) Herrer. dec. iv. lib. iii.

- a all possible dispatch to the capital, in direct opposition to the sentiments of his lieutenant, who advised an attack on Lima, during the absence of the forces; affirming that the reduction of this place would secure in his interest not only the shipping, but all the recruits that were daily flocking from other parts of the continent. Almagro was sensible of the prudence of the measure; but he declined it, because he thought it a direct violation of the rights granted by the government to his adversary, and of consequence nothing less than disobedience to the commands of his sovereign. To this punctiliousness we may fairly ascribe his ruin, though another circumstance of misconduct equally contributed. He now marched back directly to Cuzco, and being better acquainted with the country, and his soldiers more seasoned to the climate, he got before Pizarro's detachment. Ad-
- b vice was brought him before he reached the capital, that the enemy were forced to halt in a very sickly condition in the mountains, and that, if he attacked them, the whole detachment might easily be destroyed. All his officers gave it as their opinion he ought to embrace so favourable an opportunity; but Almagro by some fatality discredited the intelligence, pursued his march, and believed he should be perfectly secure in accomplishing the ruin of so small a body of forces, if they presumed to lay siege to Cuzco. In fact, it appears that he was determined to act defensively, in order that his cause might carry the more favourable aspect to the government, when he could prove Pizarro to be the aggressor. Indeed his officers at length obliged him to break this resolution. When the enemy approached the capital, they insisted on his giving them battle in the open plain.
- c Almagro demonstrated almost to a certainty that he must destroy them effectually, by adhering to his defensive plan; but he was forced to yield to their impetuosity, for fear of giving them disgust; or creating suspicion of his want of courage. At this very time he was confined to his bed with the fatigue of so tedious and difficult a march, which proved too arduous an undertaking for his infirm constitution and advanced age; but roused with the clamours of his soldiers, he ordered himself to be carried in a litter, and marched out of Cuzco to meet the enemy, leaving the care of drawing up the troops in order of battle to his lieutenant. Ordonnez's plan was exceeding good, had he paid a proper regard to the nature of the ground, and avoided engaging himself personally so deeply in the engagement, that he could not give the proper attention to the execution of his orders, or seize those favourable opportunities which rise and vanish in a moment. The infantry was reduced to one battalion, formed in a kind of column in the center, each side being supported by arquebusiers, and a squadron of horse, in which Almagro was superior to the enemy. The artillery was disposed on the right wing, while the front was secured by a rivulet and marshy ground, that rendered all access laborious and hazardous. Pizarro drew up his army in a manner nearly similar, but with more regard to the ground; for he took care to place his horse on plain ground, where they could freely bear down upon the hostile infantry, while the cavalry of Almagro was entangled in the Salinas, or salt-pits, whence this battle took its name. This was the first oversight in Ordonnez's plan; for as to Almagro, he could do nothing besides animating the soldiers by his presence. He was besides greatly mistaken in the opinion he entertained of the enemy. He believed they chiefly consisted of raw undisciplined recruits, ill armed, and sickly; whereas in fact they were for the most part veterans trained up in the wars of Charles V. and musqueteers, of whom there were only a few in Almagro's army. Pizarro began the action by crossing the rivulet with his horse; and the first discharge proved favourable to Ordonnez, who plied his artillery vigorously, swept off the entire first rank of the enemy, and staggered the whole body of cavalry; but his courage destroyed the fruits of that advantage. He rushed with his horse against Pizarro, engaged him hand to hand, dismounted him, and bid fair for a complete victory, when he received a musket-shot in the forehead. By this time the infantry came to blows, and the battle raged with great fury; when a report suddenly spread among the troops that Ordonnez was killed, which infused so great a panic, that, disregarding Almagro's remonstrances, they fled in confusion to the city, carrying their general with the torrent. Pizarro entered Cuzco with the fugitives, made dreadful slaughter, and many prisoners, most of whom were killed after quarter was given, particularly Ordonnez and Pedro de Lerma, who were covered with wounds. Here private pique and resentment fully gratified themselves, every man taking this opportunity of wreaking his vengeance on the unfortunate prisoners. The Spanish writers themselves record such acts of cruelty as would disgrace a nation of savages, and even speak of them with applause or censure, just as they happen to side with one party or the other. Almagro's life was preserved at this juncture only to be more maliciously sacrificed by the tedious forms of what his enemies called a legal process. Having been closely imprisoned some months in the most excruciating suspense, at length a process was commenced, and an impeachment drawn up, in which he was charged with having seized upon Cuzco a by force of arms; with occasioning the effusion of much Spanish blood; with entering upon a clandestine correspondence and secret treaty with the inca Manco Capac; with infringing on the terms of the emperor's grant, and encroaching upon the limits of the marquis Pizarro's jurisdiction; with breach of all the articles of several contracts with the marquis; and with fighting two battles against his countrymen, contrary to the peace of the sovereign lord the king, one at Abancay, and another at Salinas. These and divers other crimes and misdemeanors of less moment were proved according to certain forms of law; upon which the old general was condemned to death, though he appealed to the emperor in the most pathetic manner, implored the clemency of Ferdinando Pizarro, reminding him of the regard he had shewn for his life, when he had him entirely in his b power, and of his constant refusal to put to death any of the friends or relations of Pizarro, although they had expressed the bitterest enmity to his person. He desired Ferdinando would consider how instrumental he had been in the success of the expedition, and the prosperity of the marquis; that he was an old infirm man, who, in course of nature, had not long to live, and that almost his whole life had been one continued series of toil, hardship, and misfortune; arguments which had no weight with Pizarro. He had the express orders of the marquis to remove Almagro, as the only obstacle to his ambition and glory, imagining he should then enjoy the whole dominion of Peru without a rival: the sentence was therefore executed in its utmost rigor; Almagro was privately strangled, publicly beheaded on a scaffold in the great square of Cuzco, his body stripped naked by c the executioner, and then left exposed for the greatest part of the day, without a friend to pay the last duties to his remains. These were all in custody, and their enemies were too much inflamed with resentment to listen to the dictates of humanity. At last the corpse was carried off by an old slave of the deceased, who wrapped it in a coarse cloth, and buried it in the most devout manner he could, at the hazard of his own life; disgracing, by this act of compassion, the more polished and civilized christians. Thus perished, by the malice of his enemies, the enterprising, vigilant, active, and publick-spirited Almagro, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, sincerely regretted by his friends, and especially the Indians, who regarded him as their parent and protector, against the rigor of the other Spanish commander, and honoured his ashes with the unfeigned tears of sorrow- d ful affection (D).

(D) We have already mentioned that Almagro was of obscure birth, and mean education, being ignorant of reading and writing; but he was an excellent officer and generous friend, an admirable citizen, seduced sometimes into unjustifiable acts, by the extent of his authority, by the opposition of Pizarro, or by ambition. He was the forger of his own fortune, and had by dint of merit alone ascended to a greater height of riches and power than any private person of the age, unless we except his colleague, and the conqueror of Mexico. His estate and power he left to an only son he had by an Indian woman; but young Almagro was not only dispossessed of his estate by the marquis, but sent a prisoner to Lima (1).

a THE barbarity of the Pizarro faction, far from producing the intended effect of gaining an unlimited authority, served only to augment the number of their enemies. After the victory, Ferdinando persecuted with unrelenting severity all the friends of Almagro, and drove them out of Cuzco, or confined them in dungeons, for fear they might endeavour to revenge the ignominious death of their leader. His friends, who had flattered themselves with sharing in the spoils of Almagro, and being appointed to the government of provinces, began to relax in their zeal, on finding their expectations disappointed. Almagro's treasures were retained in the hands of the Pizarros, under pretence that they must be accountable for them to the catholic king; and to obviate all inconveniences which might arise from their chagrin, Ferdinando was careful to employ them in distant conquests, which might gratify their ambition and avarice. Accordingly several of his own discontented officers, and also the most popular of Almagro's party, were sent with slender detachments upon different dangerous expeditions, to prevent their examining too curiously into his conduct. However, so general appeared the discontents, after the execution of Almagro, that Ferdinando found it necessary to visit the court of Spain in person; and, by a judicious application of the vast treasures which he now possessed, to screen himself against the bitter accusation of Jago de Alvarado, then guardian of young Almagro, who had lately gone over with a view of establishing the rights of the minor, and bringing the Pizarros to a severe account. He appeared at court with a brilliant retinue, distributed the gold and silver of Peru with the utmost liberality, pleaded the necessity of the measures he had taken, with great address; and was, notwithstanding, conducted to the prison of Medina dal Campo, in which he remained confined for the space of twenty-three years. It is generally believed that he must have atoned with his life for the injuries done to Almagro, had not the death of Alvarado stopped the prosecution; an event so sudden, that strong suspicions remained of his having been poisoned by the agents of Pizarro. Consequences of these cruel proceedings.

By the death of Almagro, and the imprisonment of Ferdinando Pizarro, the whole weight of the government of Peru fell upon the shoulders of the marquis, at a critical time, when he most required the assistance of faithful friends and able counsellors. The Indians had again recourse to arms, either to revenge the death of Almagro, or to profit by the divisions among the Spaniards, who now found themselves more hardly pressed, even when their numbers were greatly increased, than when they first entered upon the conquest with a handful of men only. The Indians were animated with revenge; and had besides overcome the consternation and terror which had seized them on the first sight of fire-arms and horses. What they formerly conceived to be the thunder of heaven, they were sensible was no more than a contrivance of human genius; and they had taken several horses, which they ventured to use against the Spaniards, demonstrating by this, and the improvements in the art of war they had made since the arrival of Pizarro in Peru, that they were extremely ingenious and imitative. In several encounters they defeated the Spaniards, fought them with their own weapons, and were not even afraid or ignorant of the use of muskets, some of which they had taken in different engagements. The relation given by the royal historian De la Vega, of an action between some Spanish cavaliers, of whom Gonzalo Pizarro was one, all well mounted, armed, and cased in armour, and seven naked Indians, sufficiently evince the strict courage and activity of the latter. The Peruvians were indeed defeated, but it was after a gallant resistance, and wounding three of the enemy. This happened in the province of Charcas, where Pizarro commanded a considerable body of troops, and fought several bloody undecisive battles, until he was at length reduced to the necessity of sending for succour to the marquis. When the invaluable mines of Potosi were discovered, then such crowds of adventurers flocked to this province, that the natives were at last compelled to submit, after a most obstinate defence.

In Chili the Spaniards were still less successful, that brave people disputing every inch of ground. All the provinces subject to the inca of Peru had submitted to Almagro, who had Expedition to Chili.

had likewise reduced some of the southern provinces, and was in a fair way of extending a his conquests, when circumstances obliged him to return to Cuzco. Valdivia, who had learned the rudiments of war in Italy, and was deemed one of the best Spanish officers in America, was now sent thither by Pizarro. All the provinces which owned the sovereignty of the incas, submitted with little difficulty to the Spaniards, who took upon themselves the authority of the emperor, and acted in all respects as a regular legislature. As Valdivia advanced, the obstruction was greater; the confederated caziques gave him frequent battle, and displayed great courage and resolution; but they could not prevent his penetrating as far as the valley of Mafiocho, which he found incredibly fruitful and populous. Here he founded the city of St. Jago, building a castle for the defence of the new colony and security of the gold mines in the neighbourhood, in which he forced the natives to labour. The Chilians, greatly exasperated at this work of servitude, determined upon revenge; to accomplish which, it was resolved to attack the fort when the horse were gone out to forage; but the conspiracy being discovered, the ringleaders were capitally punished. This suspended the design of the Chilians, but did not break their resolution of wreaking their vengeance the first opportunity that offered. Valdivia imagining himself perfectly secure, set out on his foraging expedition, and had scarce proceeded eight leagues when the Chilians took arms, attacked the castle commanded by Alonso de Menroy, with great impetuosity, and continued the assault from morning until night, fortifying themselves within the enclosures and yards made by the Spaniards to their houses. On this occasion a Spanish lady exerted an extraordinary degree of brutal courage. Apprehending c lest the Indian caziques imprisoned in the fort might recover their liberty, and render the insurrection more general, she seized a hatchet, and, with astonishing boldness and cruelty, hewed them in pieces with her own hand. Even this act of savage ferocity did not produce the effect; the Spaniards found themselves so hard pressed, that they were forced to abandon the fort, and march to a plain in the neighbourhood, skirted by a river. Here the few horses that remained had room to act, and performed wonders; altho' it was not possible to hinder the enemy from setting fire to all the out-works, by which the provisions and stores were consumed. Valdivia returned in the mean time, obtained a complete victory, began with the utmost diligence to repair his losses; but conceived so high an opinion of the free spirit and valour of the natives, that he immediately wrote to Peru for a d reinforcement, and was soon joined by a body of troops under Baptista Pastena.

Mines of Quilota.

WE shall pursue this subject, to avoid interruption in our account of the civil divisions in Peru. Valdivia had scarce reduced the enemy to obedience, when his life was endangered by his own troops, who murmured at the fatigue of rebuilding the outworks, and the scarcity that prevailed. A plan had been formed for the murder of the general; but some information of it coming to the ears of Valdivia, he banished the ringleaders, and suppressed the commotion. After this he assumed the title of governor of Chili, and behaved with such gallantry, that, after many bloody skirmishes, the Indians of the vale submitted. Immediately he set them to work in the mines of Quilotta; and they proved e so rich in gold, that for the security of the Spaniards, and to keep the Indian labourers in awe, he built a fort, in which he placed a strong garrison. Next he proposed to trade to Peru by sea, and likewise to open a communication by land; for which purpose he built a frigate on the river, and detached a party of horse to the vale of Guasco, under Menroy, and another to the vale of Copiapo, to proceed from thence to Peru, which was an extremely difficult and arduous undertaking. As Menroy was preparing to pass the desert of Atacama, the Indians fell suddenly upon him, defeated his party, and obliged him and Pedro de Meranda to escape on their unsaddled horses, covered with wounds. An entire ignorance of the country occasioned their afterwards falling into the hands of an Indian general, whose name was Coteo. They were carried prisoners to the chief cazique of the f vale, whose lady commiserating their misfortunes, had them unbound and taken into favour; by which means they soon escaped to Peru, after suffering incredible hardships in the tedious journey. From thence he returned with a reinforcement of sixty men, and thereby enabled Valdivia to pursue his conquests.

Divisions among the Spaniards.

MEAN time the fortune of war was changeable; in general the Spaniards were successful in their expeditions, but they also sustained a variety of defeats and losses. At last the disturbances in Peru occasioned Valdivia's being recalled, with some of his officers and soldiers, and the care of pursuing the conquest was committed to Francesco de Vellagea, who was constituted his lieutenant. During his absence misunderstandings arose between g his lieutenant and Pedro Sanchez de Hoz, who had procured a grant from the crown of Spain, of the government of the farther parts of Peru and Chili. De Hoz, in consequence of this grant, expected, with a good deal of reason, that he ought to succeed, to the command

a command of the forces, and have the chief direction in the absence of Valdivia. He had even a superior right to Valdivia himself; nor would he submit to this general, who held his commission only of Pizarro, except on condition that the richest provinces of Chili should be assigned to him; with which Valdivia was obliged to rest satisfied. However, upon his departure, Vellagea came to a rupture with De Hoz, seized, imprisoned, condemned, and put him to death, whether by his own authority or the orders of his superior, is uncertain. This only is related, that Valdivia appeared to be well pleased with the conduct of his lieutenant, and the removal of a person who could not help regarding him in the light of an usurper. The Chilians made their advantage of the civil divisions among the Spaniards, attacked the garrisons of Copiapo and Coquinbo, and after putting all the Spaniards to the sword, demolished the towns. Vellagea himself was extremely hard pressed in the town of St. Jago, and most probably have surrendered, had not Valdivia seasonably arrived to his assistance, with a strong reinforcement, attacked the Indians with great resolution, forced them to relinquish the siege, drove them out of the valleys of Copiapo and Coquinbo, rebuilt the towns they had destroyed, marched to the southward, and after crossing the river Maypo, obliged the warlike provinces to receive the yoke, after they had withstood all the attempts of the incas of Peru, and of Almagro, the first Spanish general who had penetrated their frontier.

VALDIVIA had activity, resolution, and a genius turned to projects. He now entered upon a scheme of great extent and hazard, crossed the large rivers Maulle and Hata, traversed a vast space of country, and founded the city La Concepcion, on the South-sea coast. He had likewise erected several other towns and fortresses in different parts of Chili, in order to bridle the natives, which so enraged this brave people, that they assembled in crowds, fell upon the new city, harrassed the garrison with perpetual attacks, and were very near destroying the whole Spanish army. However, in despite of all their endeavours, Valdivia completed the fortifications of La Concepcion, put it in a posture to resist all the power of the enemy, and then advanced with all his forces towards the plains of Angol, and crossing the great river Biobio, founded the city called Imperial, on a hill, at the confluence of two rivers, about forty leagues to the southward of Concepcion. The Spaniards alledge that the neighbouring fertile valley contained above fourscore thousand Indian inhabitants, who gave them no molestation in building, being of a peaceable disposition. They were even so tame as to suffer Valdivia to parcel out their lands among the Spaniards, remaining themselves like slaves attached to the glebe. Valdivia was indefatigable in establishing the Spanish power, by founding colonies. About sixteen leagues to the eastward of the city Imperial, he laid the foundation of Villa Rica, so called on account of the wealth of the gold mines found there; but he involved himself in difficulties, by extending his conquests beyond what his strength was capable of maintaining. By extending his forces over the face of so large a country, he weakened every part in such a manner as revived hope in a people who watched with the closest attention for the opportunity of recovering their liberties. However dreadful the fire-arms, horses, and armour of the Spaniards, appeared to naked, simple Indians, servitude proved still more intolerable; and the Chilefians resolved to put all to hazard, rather than endure fetters so galling to their free spirit. In the course of war they discovered that the Spaniards were vulnerable and mortal men like themselves, which helped to confirm their courage; they assembled in great numbers, and doubted not but they should be able, by dint of perseverance and superior strength, to expel the usurping insolent strangers. Had all the natives of Chili joined in this opinion, they must have infallibly executed their project; but amidst such a variety of nations of different customs and sentiments, it was impossible to find them all in the same disposition. Some were tame and pacific, preferring the yoke of the Spaniards to the tumults of war; others were warlike and brave, regarding subjection to a foreign power as the most dreadful of all calamities. Full of these generous sentiments, the latter took arms. The Aracceans in particular, the most intrepid people in Chili, and who had given Valdivia the greatest trouble, all rose to a man, exasperated at the treatment of the Spaniards. When this people had submitted before, Valdivia, in the distribution of the lands, had reserved this valley to himself, on account of its extraordinary wealth and fertility. The natives were set to dig in the mines, and subjected to the stripes and abuse of the Spaniards who superintended the labour. Sensible how intolerable this usage must seem to a people unaccustomed to subjection, he erected three castles in the valley, to keep them in awe, and garrisoned them strongly, while he went upon another expedition, in search of mines which had a still higher reputation. Of this circumstance the Aracceans availed themselves, engaged the whole country in the conspiracy, and elected the celebrated and valiant Capaulican for their leader and general.

The Chilians rise against the Spaniards.

The Aracceans revolt.

Capaulican's conduct.

Valdivia taken and put to death.

It is seldom that the Indians conduct their schemes with the necessary secrecy. Valdivia received notice of the intended rebellion, he returned suddenly to the valley of Araccea; but before he appeared, fourteen thousand of the natives were assembled in arms, determined to shed the last drop of their blood. He attacked them with his cavalry, obliged them to retreat to the woods, but could not obtain a victory, for they continued to sally out with fury, maintaining a kind of running fight, and harassing the Spaniards with perpetual fatigue and watching. The experience acquired from these skirmishes was improved by Capaulican in a manner which evinced his military genius. He observed that fighting with such a number of undisciplined troops, served only to disorder the whole, and contribute to his defeat, the confusion of the front communicating itself to the wings and rear, in such a manner that the first assault of the Spanish cavalry generally determined the fortune of the day. This inconvenience he determined to remedy, by dividing his forces into battalions of a thousand each, which should charge the enemy by turns, and thus support the engagement at pleasure, without fatigue or danger to the whole army. He represented to his countrymen, that the Spanish cavalry did not exceed a hundred and fifty men, against whom a battalion of the brave Chilefians would be able to make a considerable stand, notwithstanding the superiority of their arms and horses; and that this corps relieved by another, and that by a third, would necessarily, in the end, fatigue, dishearten, and exhaust the Spaniards. He desired they would make trial of this new method; and the issue proved answerable to his wish. Capaulican was too prudent too expect that a single battalion could defeat the enemy; and he only required, that when the soldiers found themselves hard pressed, they would retire leisurely into the rear, and rally themselves behind cover, without disordering the rest of the forces, in order to renew, in their turn, the charge. Every thing was executed to his order; the first battalion engaged with great resolution, and a calmness that greatly astonished the Spaniards. After suffering the whole weight of the battle as long as was thought necessary, they retired with great deliberation, and were succeeded by another body; which having discharged the required duty, retreated in the same order, and made room for a third, in this manner keeping up an unintermitting engagement, for the space of seven or eight hours, until the Spaniards grew quite faint for want of refreshment, and retired precipitately. Valdivia ordered them to possess a pass at some distance from the field, to stop the pursuit. The fruits of this order were blasted by the treachery of his page, a Chilefian, who took this opportunity of deserting to his countrymen, acquainted them with the Spanish general's design, and directed them to gain the pass before the arrival of the enemy. Make use, "said he, of the advantage which the gods have put into your hands to recover the liberties of your country, and to rescue it from destruction by shedding the blood of those thieves and traitors." When he had spoke these animating words, he took up a spear, placed himself at the head of a body of Chilefians, charged the Spaniards with great fury, while another detachment seized upon the pass, agreeable to his directions. Valdivia and his troops were now enclosed on every side, and too much exhausted to make any considerable resistance. The Indians put all to death without pity or remorse, except Valdivia and a priest, whom they took prisoners, and bound to a tree, until they had slaughtered all the rest of the Spaniards. When they had fully satiated their revenge, and destroyed both men and horses, they carried Valdivia bound before their general Capaulican, who cruelly ordered him to be put to death. Writers differ in the relation of this event. According to Garcilasso, some alledge, that his treacherous page Lauteru, having first reviled and reproached him, then slew him with his own hand; others say he was bound to a tree, and his brains dashed out with a club, by order of the Chilefian general; while others affirm, that the Indians poured melted gold down his throat, bidding him satiate himself with that metal, after which he thirsted so violently. Garcilasso speaks of the death of this brave and unfortunate commander in a manner still different, and more tragical. He relates, that Francisco de Rieros, who was at that time an officer in Chili, affirmed on his return to Peru that the Indians passed the night succeeding the victory, in mirth and festivity, dancing round a great fire, upon which they broiled pieces of Valdivia's flesh before his own eyes, and eat it luxuriously, until he at length expired with loss of blood, and the extremity of torture. All the Spanish writers agree, that they made flutes and other instruments of his bones, and preserved his skull as a monument of their victory, which they celebrated by an annual festival. As to Lauteru, his services were judged to be of such importance, that he was raised to the high station of lieutenant-general to Capaulican, in which capacity he displayed the vigour of his genius, and boldness of his courage, in divers engagements.

^b LA VEGA, lib. vii. cap. xxiii. p. 287.

Farther successes of the Chileans.

- a THE defeat and death of Valdivia spread consternation among all the Spaniards in Chili, who now apprehend that the revolt of the Aracceans would become general. His lieutenant Vellagea, who was then at Conception, no sooner heard the news, then he assembled the troops dispersed in different provinces, and being reinforced with several thousand of his Indian allies, set out for the valley of Araccea, to revenge the death of his general. Capaulican did not chuse to encounter so powerful an army in the open field; but he artfully retired by such gentle steps as convinced the Spaniards that he was too weak to support their weight, and drew them on gradually into rough, unequal ground, and a country covered with wood, and filled with defiles, where the horse was miserably entangled, and rendered entirely useless. Having occupied all the passes in such a manner as to
- b prevent the Spaniards from extricating themselves, he boldly faced about, attacked Vellagea, in front, flank, and rear, and ordered his people to come immediately to close battle, with a view of destroying the effects of the fire-arms. The event was similar to that of the preceeding engagement. The Spaniards were routed with the loss of near three thousand men, including the auxiliary Indians, and the victors bent all their strength against the Spanish colonies. Lauteru marched at the head of a great army to La Conception, which he destroyed upon finding it abandoned by the Spaniards. He then laid siege to the city Imperial; and after continuing for some weeks before the walls, was forced by the heavy rains to relinquish the enterprize; a fortunate accident, which the pious Spaniards ascribed to the interposition of the virgin Mary, who, they affirmed, made her
- c appearance to the whole garrison; an assertion which we have the same reason to believe, as that the tutelary Saint Jago fought their battles against the Indians on horseback.

UNDISMAYED by the unfortunate issue of this undertaking, and the miracles wrought before his eyes in favour of the Spaniards, if one may credit their writers, the Indian general Lauteru resolved to frustrate the design of the enemy to rebuild La Conception. With this view he marched directly to that city, drove the Spaniards from their works, and again reduced the whole to ashes. After which he laid siege to St. Jago, with intention to demolish all the Spanish settlements in Chili, as these were the greatest obstacle to the recovery of public liberty. Here he was killed by an arrow, after he brought the garrison to extremities; upon which the Chileans, disheartened by the loss of their general, raised the siege and withdrew. Several other hostilities were committed on both sides; and the natives were in general so fortunate in all their attempts, that the governor

d of Peru, fearing the loss of the whole conquest, unless the most vigorous measures were taken, determined upon sending his son Don Garcia de Mendoza, with a powerful army, to suppress the rebellion. From this circumstance we may judge of the tediousness of the war, and the difficulty of the conquest, it being now the space of ten years since Valdivia's first arrival in Chili. Mendoza pursued his instructions to reduce the Aracceans with the utmost vigilance; he encountered the Indians upon divers occasions with various success, and was at last so fortunate as to make Capaulican prisoner, whom he put to death, in order to strike terror into his adherents. However, all the abilities of Mendoza were e insufficient to bring the war to an issue. The Chileans, though repeatedly defeated, were never dispirited; on the contrary, misfortune drove them to despair, and they determined to gratify their revenge at the expence of the last drop of their blood. They raised fresh forces, mounted cavalry, which they had taken from the Spaniards, fought with disciplined valour, ruined almost all the Spanish settlements, and, at the end of fifty years, remained unconquered.

Garcia de Mendoza sent to Chili.

- As it would greatly exceed the limits of a general history to relate every minute circumstance of this long and bloody war, we shall touch only upon a few material particulars related by the royal historian De la Vega, which will convey a sufficient idea of the
- f misery which the Spaniards sustained, and the obstinacy with which the Chileans persisted in the defence of freedom. When Garcilasso was in Spain in the year 1600, he received the following advices from a correspondent then residing in the country: That, on the 29th day of November 1597, a body of Chileans, amounting to five thousand horse and foot, two hundred of whom were clothed in armour taken from the Spaniards, took the city Imperial by surprize, put all the Spaniards to the sword, and reduced the place to ashes. On this occasion, near four hundred Spaniards, men, women, and children, were sacrificed to the fury of the conquerors. The same writer acquaints us, that four years after he received a letter, informing him, that of the thirteen different towns and cities
- g built by the Spaniards in Chili, six were destroyed by the Indians; namely, Valdivia Imperial, Angol, Santa Cruz, Casteo in Chiloe, and La Conception. "They overthrew, consumed, and laid desolate the houses and habitations of the Spaniards, dishonoured and prophaned the temples, obscured the brightness of that faith and devotion which shone in those
- " parts,

“ parts, and so elated the spirits of the Indians by their success, that they grew bold and “ confident, omitting no opportunity of robbing and destroying the churches and mo“ nasteries with fire and sword! They also learned, adds the same writer, many arts and “ stratagems of war. When they besieged the city of Osarno, they so hemmed in the “ Spaniards with their works, that they could receive no sustenance, except a few bad “ vegetables, which they were obliged to procure at the expence of desperate sallies. In “ the last siege which the Indians laid to Osarno, they surprised and killed the centinels, “ entered the town, butchered the children, chained down the women, and exercised “ every act of barbarity; but while they were thus employed, the Spaniards recovered “ from their consternation, snatched the critical moment, fell upon the Indians, and “ obliged them to fly with great precipitation, leaving their booty behind.” These are the words of the jesuit Da Castro, quoted by La Vega, who likewise adds to the same purpose, that the last victory obtained by the Indians was at Villa Rica, with great effusion of Spanish blood. They set fire to the four-quarters of the town, and killed all the friars of Saint Dominique, Saint Francis, and the Marcedas, with all the other clergy, carrying the women into captivity, many of whom were ladies of distinction and high quality.
 “ These were judgments, says La Vega, which God permits in his secret providence for the chastisement of mankind;” and were it allowable to judge of the dispensations of the divine will, they might be called just punishments on the Spaniards, for the wanton oppressions, and unheard-of cruelties exercised upon the innocent and brave natives, whose country they invaded, whose treasures they plundered, and whose persons they enslaved, under the barefaced disguise of propagating the most humane and benevolent of all religious institutions.

Admiral Brewer's expedition to Chili.

BEFORE we quit this subject to return to the affairs of Peru, it may be proper we should mention the plan formed by the Hollanders for profiting by the losses of the Spa- niards, and establishing colonies in Chili, concluding they would be well received by the natives, if they declared themselves the foes of their inveterate and implacable enemies.
 In the year 1642, the Dutch West-India company equipped a squadron under admiral Brewer, which sailed from the Texel in the month of November, suffered considerably in doubling Cape Horn, and arrived in the month of May following on the coast of Chili.
 A party of fifty soldiers being landed, encountered a troop of Spanish horse, defeated them, and then took possession of the town of Cavelmappa. Afterwards the fleet steered for the island of Chiloe, and the appearance of the Dutch diffused such a panic among the inhabitants of Castro, that they removed their effects, and set fire to the city. From the relation given by some Spanish and Indian prisoners they made, all the particulars above related of the war were confirmed, with a thousand circumstances that aggravated the cruelty and insolence of the Spaniards. If we may credit the Dutch accounts, the Chile- sians, even at this time, expressed the utmost detestation of the Spaniards, and were contriving the means of throwing off the galling bondage. One of the natives came on board with the head of a Spaniard, whom he had just killed, and declared that his countrymen only waited the return of the dry season to gain their friends at Osarno and Baldivia, and begin a general insurrection. The Dutch commander Brewer died before any progress was made in the scheme concerted by the West-India company; and to this unfortunate event is the miscarriage of the expedition ascribed. He had formed an alliance with the Chileans, five hundred of whom he had on board the fleet, with whom his successor set sail for Baldivia, carrying with him the body of the deceased admiral, as he had desired to be interred in that city. At Baldivia the Dutch found only a few monuments of its former grandeur, the place where the city stood being over-grown with weeds and bushes; they were even disappointed in their hopes of meeting with treasure. Here they extended the treaty with the Chileans, a great number of caziques agreeing to join them against the Spaniards, on the promise made by the Dutch of supplying them with arms and military stores; but they refused to enter upon a written contract, declaring that a parole engagement and verbal promise was as obligatory as seals and written parchment.
 They suffered the Dutch to build a fort; but when a proposal was made of trafficking, and exchanging gold for arms, the caziques expressed their jealousy, and immediately declared there were no gold mines in their country. In a word, the Dutch found reason to apprehend, that whatever enmity the Chileans entertained against the Spaniards, they would join with them to expel the strangers; and therefore they very prudently withdrew, and returned disappointed to Europe.

WE left the marquis Pizarro deeply engaged in reducing the distant provinces, and in extending the dominion of the Spaniards over countries till now entirely unknown. By the number of detachments which he made, his army was so much weakened, that the Peruvians

- a Peruvians again ventured to have recourse to arms, and would certainly have recovered their liberties, but for the aid furnished the Spaniards by their Indian vassals, who discovered all the passes and strong posts, and supplied them with provision and intelligence. In the province of Los Charcas, the natives made violent struggles to preserve their liberties. Gonzalo Pizarro had been detached to reduce that province, and, after repeated battles, was surrounded, and so distressed by the Indians, that the marquis found it necessary to march in person to his relief, with all his forces. Garcilasso alledges that he only sent a reinforcement, giving out that he would go in person if necessary; but that Gonzalo was relieved by a miracle wrought in his favour by St. Jago before the arrival of the succours: certain it is, that the province was reduced after much bloodshed, and that Gonzalo was then detached to the province of Caneta, to enter upon still more perilous adventures. The difficulties which he combated in this expedition, surpass description. After sustaining the united efforts of famine, fatigue, disease, and other calamities, he arrived on the banks of the river Amazons, where he built a kind of ship, which he committed to the charge of Orellana, with intention to supply his forces with provision; but Orellana deserted his interest, and, to crown Gonzalo's misfortunes, not only left him destitute of every means of subsistence, but entertained the treacherous scheme of procuring a grant of the country for himself; with which purpose he set sail for Spain. Gonzalo having eat up all his provision and horses, was then reduced to feed upon roots, herbs, and the flesh of insects and reptiles, the very sight of which would nauseate a less craving appetite. Many of his people perished for hunger, all were almost starved with cold, the apparel with which they began the expedition being worn to tatters. The utmost difficulties were combated in marching along the side of the great river of Amazons, upon account of the impassable mountains and forests that fell in their way, and forced the Spaniards to make prodigious circuits, crossing marshes, bays, and rivers, with incredible fatigue and perseverance. The cheerful and undaunted resolution with which the general supported every misfortune, inspired his men with emulation and courage; and though they could not avoid feeling distress, they forbore repining. The Indian auxiliaries served them rather with the affection of children, and the nearest kindred, than the fidelity of allies; they even deprived themselves of the pittance of loathsome food, in order to supply the Spaniards soldiers. The distance of four hundred leagues of a country, barren, rough, and inhospitable, separated them from Quito; yet it was resolved to return thither, as the design of the expedition was frustrated by untoward and unforeseen accidents. Accordingly they kept on the north side of the river, began their march over the summits of high mountains, and cut their way by dint of labour through rocks and thick woods, which might have been tolerable, had the body been sustained and strengthened with a sufficient quantity of wholesome nutriment. The sick were carried on the shoulders of the healthy, in which charitable employment no one was more indefatigable than Gonzalo; until hunger at length pressed with such violence, that the Spaniards were ready to devour not only their dead, but even the infirm and diseased. All their cloathing consisted of leaves, just sufficient to cover those parts which modesty required should be concealed. Above four thousand Indians and two hundred Spaniards perished already, without encountering an enemy; and those who remained at length entered a more open and plentiful country, which they regarded as the land of promise, and beheld as a miracle wrought by the finger of Providence to save them from destruction. Here they found abundance of deer, and other wild beasts, of which they not only made food but raiment, cloathing themselves with the skins of those animals. On their arrival on the frontiers of Quito, they kissed the earth in a kind of ecstasy, returning thanks to the Almighty, who had preserved them amidst such perils, and extricated them from so many dangers and difficulties.
- f Notice was given to the inhabitants of Quito of their approach and needy situation, upon which all the apparel that could be collected in the city was sent to them; but this was far from answering the necessity of the sufferers. Quito had been so depopulated and impoverished by the civil wars, that not above six suits of cloaths could be spared by all the inhabitants of this great metropolis of a wealthy province, nor more than twelve horses sent to the relief of the exhausted and emaciated adventurers. There was something melancholy in the excessive joy expressed by Gonzalo, and his companions, at meeting with their countrymen, and the public entry they made into Quito, clad like savages, in the skins of deer and wild beasts, their feet bare, and covered with wounds and sores, their swords naked without scabbards, and eat up with rust, and their countenances fallen, emaciated, and the most expressive picture of hunger and keen distress.
- g Two years had now elapsed since Gonzalo entered upon this unfortunate expedition, during which extraordinary changes and revolutions happened in Peru. The marquis

Discontent of the Almagrians.

They form a conspiracy.

Pizarro was chiefly intent on suppressing the party of Almagro, as the only means of confirming his own authority, in the prosecution of which design he committed several violences that served only to increase the number of his enemies. La Vega is his professed apologist on this occasion; relating, contrary to the testimony of all other historians, that he suffered young Almagro to enjoy his paternal fortune at Lima, and relieve, by his bounty, all his distressed friends, whose estates had been confiscated, as if they were guilty of treason against his catholic majesty. Forgetting, a few lines after, that he admits this charge against the marquis^f, he affirms, that Pizarro used his utmost endeavours to gain the affections of the Almagrians, by considerable largesses and sums of money, procuring for them lucrative offices and honourable employments, which they obstinately refused, persevering in their malice and animosity, keeping up the breach, b filling the mind of young Almagro with the most rancorous enmity, and rejecting all assistance and kindness from the marquis, notwithstanding the urgent and extreme necessity to which they were reduced. To this conduct he ascribes the marquis's future severity; his friends advising him to compel those persons into duty and obedience, who were too obstinate to be won by presents and caresses. In consequence, Almagro's estate, by which his adherents were supported, was now confiscated. This inflamed his resentment, and he immediately wrote to all his friends dispersed over Peru, to repair to Lima, and assist him in revenging the injuries he sustained. The truth is, Almagro's estate was confiscated, as we have related, immediately upon his father's execution, and he was now detained a kind of prisoner in Lima, and supported wholly at the expence of the marquis, while all c those who bore any affection to his family were not only deprived of their estates, but excluded from all public employment, whereby they were reduced to extreme misery and wretchedness. A stigma was affixed on all who had served under Almagro^g; they were distinguished by the appellation of the Chilimen, and an edict was published, prohibiting any man to relieve them, under the severest penalties. Not satisfied with rendering their condition deplorable in Peru, effectual means were taken to prevent their return to their native country, lest their complaints might reach the ears of his Catholic majesty, and obtain compassion and redress. Necessity drove them into cabals and conspiracies; and being rendered quite desperate, they determined to revenge the murder of Almagro, the cruel usage of his son, and their own injuries, by spilling the blood of d Pizarro. The marquis, sensible he had justly provoked them, now kept close in the city, never stirred abroad without a strong guard; and watched with so strict an eye over his enemies, that they found it difficult to assemble in such numbers as to give any prospect of success to their designs. The greatest circumspection was necessary; they entered the city in the most formal manner, in small parties of two and three together, and were concealed in the houses of some persons who approved of the meditated revolution. Such was the necessity to which the proscribed faction, was reduced, that Almagro and seven of his friends possessed but one cloak, with which they made their appearance by turns, the rest staying half-naked at home, while one of their number was employed abroad in viewing the state of affairs, and forwarding their designs. This circumstance even Garcilasso e acknowledges.

WHEN the Almagrians in Lima amounted to near three hundred men, they began then to imagine their strength sufficient to carry their projects into execution. Among them were several experienced officers and veteran soldiers, who had frequently manifested their courage on occasions of the most signal danger. To these young Almagro resigned his own judgment, suffering them to conduct the conspiracy in the manner they believed most adviseable. The first scheme was to fall upon the marquis, as he went upon Midsummer day to hear mass in the cathedral church of Lima; but this design being either discovered or suspected, Pizarro, under pretence of some indisposition, confined himself, and assembled f his friends to consult on proper measures for recoiling the meditated blow on the heads of the conspirators. The disappointed conspirators now laid aside their hostile intentions, determining to wait the arrival of Vaca de Castro, who was sent over by the catholic king to adjust all differences among the Spaniards, and examine the truth of Alvarado's allegations, at that time soliciting the court that justice should be done to young Almagro, and the murderers of his father called to a severe account. This new resolution was again soon dropped, upon advice that the marquis, having received intelligence of their intentions, was now preparing measures of rigorous revenge. Fearing they might all be sacrificed to his fury, they now resumed their desperate designs, and rested all their future fortune g upon the success of one bold attempt against his life. To the number of thirteen, they

a assembled at mid-day at the lodging of young Almagro, and proceeded, with their swords drawn, through the market-place, directly to the marquis's palace, crying aloud, "Long live the king, but let the tyrant perish." They met with no opposition until they entered the palace, notwithstanding their menacing cries had drawn together a crowd of people in the great square. A page gave the marquis the first notice of the danger; upon which he ordered the hall-doors to be shut, and resolved to make a vigorous resistance; but his servants, terrified at the danger, deserted him, and made their escape over the windows, leaving him with his brother-in-law Martin, and two pages, who bravely resolved to share his fortune. Francis de Chaves had gone upon the stair-case, imagining it was some tumult among the servants, was met, and killed by the conspirators, who then forced themselves b to the door of the marquis's apartment. Here he had posted himself with his three faithful friends, determined to sell his life at a high price; though the time would not admit of his casing himself in armour. He fought with the most desperate fury, slew four of the conspirators, wounded several; but at last being left alone, his brother and pages having fallen by the hand of the enemy, he was surrounded and killed, by a wound in the throat, after he had given proof of the most heroic courage, of vigour and strength almost incredible at his advanced age. Thus fell Don Francisco Pizarro, in the capital city of that vast conquest, which he had made by courage, prudence, and unparalleled perseverance, by the hands of those brave soldiers, the instruments of his victories, and now the chastisers of his insolence, injustice, and cruelty. The Spanish writers drew a parallel c between his character, fortune, and tragical end, and those of his colleague and rival Almagro; and it must be confessed there was a striking resemblance, as the reader will perceive from what we have related of both. After so minutely specifying facts, it is almost unnecessary to draw a formal picture of this conqueror, who was liberal, undaunted, generous, until prosperity intoxicated his mind, and rendered him jealous, ambitious, and rapacious. We may date his misfortunes with the death of his colleague, from which time his character never shone with lustre; and, indeed, it never suffered an eclipse by the perfidious murder of the inca Atahualpa, although that action was rather permitted than promoted by Pizarro (A).

The marquis assassinated.
A. D. 1541.

As soon as the conspirators had effected their purpose in the palace, they sallied forth b into the market-place, declaring the tyrant was dead, and were saluted and congratulated by their friends and associates, who had taken care that no assistance should be carried to the marquis before their return. They also secured all the arms and horses in the city, commanding the inhabitants not to stir about without leave. They plundered the marquis's palace, and the houses of his brother-in-law Martin de Alcantara, and secretary Pizardo, in which they found immense treasures in gold and silver. As to the furniture of the palace, they left it untouched for the use of young Almagro, whom they now proclaimed governor of all Peru. Lima, Cuzco, and most of the principal cities and colonies, acknowledged his authority; some, however, resolved not to declare themselves before the arrival of Vaca de Castro. The joy of success rendered every thing tumultuous at e first in Lima; but the spirits of the people soon subsided into more regular measures. Almagro was sworn by the corporation of this city to govern Peru agreeable to the laws, and conform himself to the king's pleasure. The late ministers were all removed, others more attached to the new governor being appointed to their employments, as the reward of their services. The rich and powerful of Pizarro's faction were imprisoned, and their estates and goods confiscated, to make good the losses sustained by the Almagrians during the late proscription. Juan de Rada, who was chiefly instrumental in the death of the marquis, was raised to the high dignity of a general of the forces, on account of the spirit and activity he had exerted as a conspirator. Others were promoted to other offices and employ- f ments, according to the degree of their zeal for the new governor, and animosity to the opposite party, without regard to any other qualifications; whence it followed that these preferments could not possibly afford universal satisfaction. The insolence of Rada, intoxicated with his sudden prosperity, contributed to augment the public discontents. This officer issued out all commissions in the name of Almagro, without consulting his friends,

Almagro proclaimed governor of Peru.

(A) The marquis Pizarro had completed his sixty-third year, and in despite of the fatigues he had undergone in prosecution of this arduous conquest, was healthy and robust. No man ever pursued a project with more intense application, or better understood how to improve the advantages he gained, to his own and the public benefit; if we except errors owing to pride, avarice, and ambition. He was diligent in building towns, planting colonies, and introducing the fruits, the industry, and the manufactures of Europe, into Peru, as the only means of reconciling the natives to the Spanish government, by demonstrating its utility. To him the Spaniards owe their chief settlements in South America, Pizarro having either laid the foundation of their most flourishing cities, or at least rebuilt them in the European manner, and established a regular police, and settled administration.

or seeming to regard them as of any consequence. Here were laid the seeds of fresh civil divisions and cabals, against the life of the imperious and arbitrary minion. Francisco de Chaves, kinsman to the gentleman of that name, slain in the marquis's service, was at the bottom of the conspiracy, for which he suffered death upon the rack.

GARCIA de Alvarado, another officer high in Almagro's esteem, was no less cruel and insolent than Rada. Alvarado was employed by the governor to take possession of towns and plantations in his name, to seize treasures, levy soldiers, and disarm the Pizarrists, and all who expressed a dislike to the new government; which commission he executed with great severity. He went to Truxillo, and immediately dispossessed Diego de Thora of the office of judge of that place, notwithstanding he had been appointed by old Almagro, and reinstated by his son, on his first accession to the administration. At the city of St. Miguel he put several gentlemen to death upon frivolous pretences, only because he knew them averse to the present measures. Other officers employed in different provinces proceeded with equal rigour; but at Cuzco the commissioners were forced to some degree of moderation, knowing that the principal persons in that city were determined to acknowledge Vaca de Castro, if they were not gained over by lenity; and they were not only too numerous of themselves, but had too great sway with the Indians to suffer themselves to be used harshly. Gomez de Tortoya, a leading man in that capital, and the particular friend of the marquis Pizarro, had even declared his resolution of revenging his death; notwithstanding which, the majority of Spaniards and Indians submitted to the authority of young Almagro, merely because his interest happened to prevail. Tortoya dispatched messengers secretly to all his friends in the adjacent provinces who were attached to the Pizarro interest, acquainting them with the late tragical event, and requiring them to assemble the Spaniards in their neighbourhood in arms, to oppose the usurpation of the assassins, and revenge the death of their governor, and the king's representative. Nuno de Castro, Garcilasso de la Vega, and others, accordingly repaired to Cuzco, while Tortoya went in search of Alvarez Holguin, who, with a hundred men, had just set out upon an expedition to Callao before the late revolution. His application to this officer was successful. At his desire Holguin declared himself the enemy of the new administration, and took upon him, at the request of Tortoya, the dignity of captain-general of the league now forming against Almagro. He erected his standard, sent manifestos to Charcas and Arequibas, augmented his forces to two hundred men, directed his march to Cuzco, and so terrified the Almagrian party with the news of his approach, that they quitted the city with the utmost precipitation; but were pursued and brought back prisoners by Nuno de Castro, assisted by twenty harquebusiers. On Holguin's arrival at Cuzco, the party augmented astonishingly; the gentry flocked in from their plantations, and some of them aspired at the chief command; but were soon over-ruled by the sentiments of the majority, which declared in favour of Holguin, now confirmed in the post of captain-general by the suffrages of the party.

WAR was now openly declared against the Almagrians, the citizens of Cuzco obliging themselves to repay to the king whatever sums of money Holguin might expend from the royal treasury, in prosecution of the hostile measures intended. The news that Alonso de Alvarado had erected his standard in the same camp in the Cbachapuyas, arrived about this time, and augmented the confidence of the Pizarrists to such a degree, that they were very little disturbed with advice of Almagro's advancing at the head of eight hundred men to give them battle, though it was resolved in a council of war to march by the way of the mountains to join Alvarado. With this design they left Cuzco, using every possible precaution to avoid being surprised by parties of the enemy. In the mean time Almagro receiving minute intelligence of all that was transacting in Cuzco, determined by the advice of his officers to intercept Holguin, first securing his interest in Lima, and carrying off the children and friends of the late marquis, to prevent insurrections in his absence. One piece of barbarity exerted upon this occasion proved advantageous to the cause of his enemies. Almagro, out of personal pique, and in hopes of recovering the secreted treasures of Pizarro, ordered the secretary Picado to be tortured, and then put to death, because he resisted all the cruel measures to extort a confession.

Vaca de Castro arrives in Peru.

SUCH was the situation of the Spaniards in Peru, when Vaca de Castro arrived at Quito, with a commission from the king to succeed to the government of the kingdom, in case of the decease of Pizarro; otherwise his commission extended no farther than examining into the differences between the marquis and Almagro, and the circumstances of the death of the latter. From Quito he issued commissions to the different Spanish cities and settlements, constituting such magistrates as he thought proper, and in every respect exercising the prerogatives of governor; in which quality he was immediately received by a variety of provinces. He also received letters from Holguin and Alonso de Alvarado, who had now joined

- a joined forces, assuring him of their obedience to the king's pleasure, and requesting him to repair to take charge of the army at Truxillo. Among other exertions of power, he authorized Barionoro and Aliaga to take upon them the government of Lima; to whom the Indians immediately submitted, Almagro being at this time absent on his way to Cuzco. De Castro then set out for Truxillo, and was joined on the road by crowds of Spaniards and Indians, who determined upon implicit obedience to the royal mandate; and although they were no friends to the tyranny of Pizarro, detested the violent measures of the Almagrians. His army was now very considerable, all the officers bound themselves by a sealed instrument to obey his authority, and, as the first proof of their sincerity, resigned their commissions into his hands, either to be renewed or revoked at the governor's pleasure. From
- b hence he marched to Lima, where he was received with the honours due to the viceroy of Peru, and joined by all the inhabitants able to carry arms.

EVERY thing succeeded in this manner to the wish of Vaca de Castro; while Almagro, disappointed in his designs on Holguin, directed his march to Cuzco, took possession of that capital, and new-modelled the magistracy, replacing all those who had absented themselves on the declaration of the opposite party. His next care was to provide a train of artillery, in which he found no difficulty, copper being plentiful at Cuzco, and his troops furnished with persons skilled in casting cannon. He was busied in the most vigorous preparations, when the death of his general Rada, and certain appointments that took place in consequence, gave breath to the expiring embers of faction, and again lighted up the flames of c diffention, to the great prejudice of his affairs. Christopher de Sotelo, and Garcia de Alvarado, became now his chief counsellors, and had the whole direction of the army jointly, which each aspired to separately. Rivals in ambition and the favour of Almagro, their resentment was soon inflamed to the most rancorous animosity, which terminated in the death of Sotelo, slain in the market-place. The friends of the deceased resolved to revenge the injury; and every thing conspired to produce a civil war, when Almagro interposed his influence and authority, and effected a temporary reconciliation, dissembling his sentiments of the conduct of Alvarado to a more seasonable opportunity. However, it was not possible to remain long in this moderate and politic disposition; the violence of Alvarado's temper obliged him to come to extremities. That officer apprehending Almagro's vengeance, thought he could not render himself secure without shedding the blood of his general and benefactor; for which purpose he contrived to invite him to an entertainment, where he proposed executing his horrible project; but Almagro, who had some advice of the conspiracy, excused himself by pretending indisposition, and thus secured himself, and concealed the discovery, in order to draw Alvarado into his own snare. He confined himself in his bed, concealed some friends in the adjacent apartments, and feigned real illness with so much address, that Alvarado made him a visit, was seized, and immediately put to death.

- HAVING by this spirited and seasonable punishment quieted the tumult, he drew out his forces, amounting to seven hundred Spaniards and several thousand Indians, and began
- e his march, with intention either to give battle to the governor, or procure advantageous terms by treaty for himself and his friends. As his troops were almost all veterans, who had served under his father, and his train of artillery greatly superior to that of the enemy, he made himself pretty confident of victory, should it prove necessary to come to a hostile decision; but his intention was not to refuse the opportunity of compromising matters amicably. When he advanced within a few leagues of De Castro's army, he dispatched messengers with pacific proposals. They were ordered to represent to the governor, that Almagro's father had performed eminent services for the court of Spain, that he had always proved himself loyal and faithful to his sovereign, that he had been barbarously murdered
- f by the marquis Pizarro, that the revenge taken was just, and that his son now only demanded to be restored to the government of Cuzco and New Toledo, agreeable to the grant of the crown to his father. They also represented, that young Almagro resolved to obey his majesty's command implicitly; though he hoped the governor would not shew his partiality for the Pizarros, by approving of their notorious tyranny and oppression. Letters to a similar purpose were sent by the superior officers of the army, who complained that their services were rejected, as if they opposed the royal mandate, notwithstanding the king had not more faithful subjects in Peru. La Vega omits this circumstance, authenticated by the testimony of all other Spanish writers, and evidently shews himself prejudiced
- g in favour of De Castro. Nor does he take any notice of the governor's endeavours to seduce Almagro's officers to betray him at the very time they were negotiating a treaty; on the contrary, he affirms, that De Castro sent the first messengers to Almagro, with the most equitable overtures, and a promise of general pardon for himself and his associates,

if he would now lay down his arms; which the other refused, until he should be confirmed a in the government of Cuzco, and all the jurisdiction included in the grant to his father. Herrera asserts, that Castro sent a Spaniard, disguised like an Indian, to examine the posture of Almagro's camp, with intention to surprise him while his mind was occupied with the result of the negotiation; and that the spy was discovered and hanged. The same writer also asserts, that he found means to corrupt Pedro de Candia, who had charge of Almagro's artillery. Suspecting the governor's insincerity, Almagro resolved to come to action, and accordingly drew up his forces in the vale of Chapas, rousing their valour by an animating speech, in which he reminds them of the virtues of his father, the cruel murder of that brave officer, and all the injuries they had sustained from the tyranny, insolence, and oppression of the Pizarros. Both armies were composed of veterans; that of De Castro was superior in number, but Almagro's better supplied with musquetry and artillery. De Castro harrangued his army likewise, and thereby quieted some unseasonable discontentments expressed by the soldiers; which circumstance we have from La Vega, though he forgets to acquaint the reader with the occasion of those murmurs. Almagro's camp was well fortified, the cannon being every way pointed in such a manner as to render him inaccessible, had he been served with fidelity. It was likewise situated upon a hill, which determined him to wait the attack of the enemy, who appeared eager to engage: as they advanced up the ascent, he ordered his artillery to pour grape shot upon their ranks; but astonished to observe that several discharges produced no effect, he suspected the treachery of Candia, taxed him with infidelity, and receiving no satisfactory answer, slew him with his own hand. He then pointed a piece of cannon so judiciously, that he cut off a whole troop of De Castro's soldiers at a single discharge; but they were now approached too close to suffer him to play his artillery. Both sides had recourse to the musquetry, cross bows, lances, and swords: they fought with great bitterness for several hours; when at length Almagro, finding himself deserted by some of his troops, and overpowered by numbers, retired with the inca Manco Capac, and some general officers, out of the field, intending to seek a retreat in the mountains, until a more favourable opportunity offered for trying his fortune in the field, and recovering his government (A). Unhappily he thought of stopping at Cuzco to secure his treasure, where he no sooner arrived than those treacherous friends, whom he had replaced in the magistracy, hearing of his defeat, resolved to purchase the governor's favour by the most atrocious perfidy. They seized their benefactor, sent him to De Castro, and met with the contempt which their villainy merited. In this action more than half the troops on both sides were killed or wounded; the victors shedding the blood of those who had thrown down their arms, and implored mercy. Both sides fought with the utmost obstinacy and intrepidity; and Almagro, who was then but twenty years of age, distinguished himself in such a manner as gained the admiration of his adversary, although he entirely forgot his extraordinary merit as soon as he had it in his power to satiate his revenge. Upon advice that he was seized, he posted to Cuzco, and without scarce any formality of trial, ordered young Almagro to be executed agreeable to the sentence pronounced before the battle. These were the direful effects of the civil divisions of the Spaniards; neither youth, age, infirmity, nor valour, could excite compassion in the breasts of the unfeeling victors. All gratified the dictates of bloody resentment, as often as fortune furnished the opportunity, thereby exposing themselves to a similar fate, and cherishing the seeds of faction, which a prudent administration would try every expedient to suppress. The party of Almagro was entirely extirpated, those who escaped in the field being hanged up or tortured to death by order of the governor.

DE CASTRO having fully established himself in the government by acts of cruelty which disgrace his memory, however necessary they might appear to the tranquillity of Peru, applied his attention with the most intense diligence to the civil administration of his government. He began with public institutions, which equally regarded the welfare of Spaniards and natives. All perceived the utility of his reforms, and the Indians paid the same respect to his edicts, as if they had proceeded from the lips of their adored incas. Divisions of land were made, and colonies of Indians and Spaniards transplanted from barren spots to countries more fruitful, but unpeopled. That his laws might be agreeable to the genius of the nation, Castro informed himself from the caracas and caziques, concerning

(A) The Spanish writers relate the transaction in Peru, and the occurrences of this civil war, with so much partiality to one or other of the parties, that it is next to impossible to ascertain truth. We have therefore selected such circumstances from each as appeared to us the most probable, and the best attested; particularly with respect to the dispute between the Pizarrists and Almagrians.

the institutions of the incas, their method of administering justice, and other particulars; to which he conformed himself as nearly as the design he formed of establishing a more regular polity, and the doctrines of Christianity, would admit. He erected schools in several towns, ordering the children of the principal Indians to be educated in the principles of the Christian religion, and of rational morality. He restrained the Spaniards, by laws, from using the natives with their accustomed barbarity; he restored their lands to many of the caziques, and gave them a kind of civil limited jurisdiction. He imposed restraints on the licentiousness of the soldiers, and disposed their minds, by proper encouragement, to marriage, industry, and labour. Those who appeared dissatisfied with their lot, turbulent in their humour, or unfit to promote the ends of civil government, he sent into distant b unconquered provinces, in imitation of the policy of the marquis Pizarro. He inquired into the conduct of the king's officers, who amassed vast fortunes by rapine and oppression, whence he raised himself a great number of enemies among the Spaniards, while he engaged the affections and confidence of the Indians. In a word, he formed tombos, or places of refreshment, on all the roads, for the benefit of travellers, and the conveniency of commerce, and pursued every other measure which could render Peru great and flourishing in itself, and advantageous to the mother country (B).

ABOUT the time when De Castro arrived in Peru, Gonzalo Pizarro returned from the dangerous expedition we have related, to Quito. He thought himself injured by Castro's taking upon him a government which he claimed for himself, as the brother and legitimate successor of the marquis. The misfortunes he underwent in the conquest of Canela, instead of extinguishing the sparks of ambition in his mind, rather inflamed him to seize the opportunity of repairing all his losses, at the hazard of overturning the government, and throwing into confusion a kingdom, in which order was at length established, after a long series of bloody wars, rebellions, and conspiracies. The discontents of the officers and magistrates, over whom the governor kept a strict eye, furnished Gonzalo with the means of carrying on his designs. He improved their murmurs to his own views, and had actually formed a very considerable party, when the sagacity and vigilance of De Castro penetrating into his remotest secrets, frustrated all the effects of his machinations, without bloodshed, or any violent exertion of authority. He no sooner perceived what was d in agitation, and had undeniable evidence of the plot which was formed to assassinate him, and seize upon the government, than he sent privately to Gonzalo, and without betraying any symptoms of indignation, or even of the discovery he had made, ordered him to re-

Gonzalo Pizarro's conspiracy discovered.

(B) While Castro, in quality of governor, was passing such edicts, and establishing such ordinances, as he thought essential to the welfare of the people under his care, the friar Bartholomew de la Casas was laying before the court of Spain, a scheme of civil and ecclesiastical polity for the Indian colonies, which had been rejected as early as the year 1539, by the cardinal of Seville, then president of the supreme council of the Indies. The emperor now proposed this scheme to his council; and it was embraced, notwithstanding the cardinal, and several other members, protested against it, as no way congenial to the temper and disposition of the Indians. This scheme contained forty laws, the principal of which we shall relate, as they occasioned universal discontent in Peru and Mexico. It was ordained, that all estates should be held of the king, and revert to him after the decease of the possessors, without respect to the right of inheritance. That no Indian should pay taxes who gave an equivalent in personal labour, nor obliged to work in the mines or fish for pearls. That none of the king's officers should be allowed to keep Indian slaves. That all persons concerned in the late disputes between Almagro and Pizarro, should lose all jurisdiction over the Indians, by which the Spaniards in general, except a few new-comers, were divested of power and property, all having taken part on one side or the other. That a grant should be made in favour of the immediate conquerors, whereby they might enjoy their possessions for the space of two lives, then to revert to the king in the same manner as other estates, after making competent provision for the children and widow. That all persons arrived at a certain age, whether Spaniards or Indians, should marry. That, to encourage matrimony, the wife should have power to enter into possession of the estate, at the decease of her husband, in case no children survived, and to enjoy it with another husband during her natural life (1).

La Vega makes several judicious remarks upon these ordinances, which he very justly observes could not answer the ends proposed. With respect to that law which exempted the Indians from taxes, he says it was founded upon the presumption of their inability, owing to their not being paid for their labour by the Spaniards. If this was really the case, he thinks the grievance might be more effectually redressed, by ordaining that severe punishments should be inflicted on the Spaniards who refused payment to the Indians, after they had performed their engagements, and finished their labour. The law ordering that the Indians should not be compelled to labour in the mines, or fish for pearls, was really calculated, he alledges, to indulge their natural indolence, and deprive the crown of the immense revenues arising from the mines of Potosi, Huancabamba, and other places. It is, indeed, manifest, that all the other laws which we have quoted, had evidently the interest of the crown, rather than of the subject, in view; and as to this, its apparent tendency was to secure the natural liberty of the Indians, and restrain the tyranny of the Spaniards, although the effect was no other than cherishing a habit of indolence and laziness, more powerful among this people than any other. Upon the whole, we cannot think so hardly of this scheme of civil policy as our author would seem to insinuate; as it evidently had a humane tendency, notwithstanding it was attended with inconveniences, from which no human institutions are exempted.

(1) La Vega, lib. iii. cap. xx.

pair immediately to his estate in the province of Los Charcas, and to remain there until his farther pleasure was known: a punishment so mild, that we may infer, the governor's prosecution of the Almagrians arose from private pique, from necessity, and from a wrong system of policy, which he had then adopted, and not from the cruelty of his own disposition. Pizarro, who was in no condition to dispute the governor's commands, obeyed, with seeming chearfulness, in order to remove the suspicions De Castro probably entertained; and as he understood that rich silver mines had lately been discovered in that quarter, he employed himself in working and improving them, until a more favourable occasion should offer for pursuing the dictates of his ambition.

WHEN De Castro had broke this impending storm, he again turned his mind towards the civil policy of the country in his charge, and laboured chiefly to ease the natives from the galling yoke of oppression imposed on them by the Spaniards; but still his endeavours proved so ineffectual, that daily complaints were transmitted to the court of Spain of the severity with which the Indians were treated, of their being destroyed in the mines, of the death of thousands by their removal from their native air and climate, and of the misery and wretchedness of incredible numbers of women and children, whose husbands perished under the rigorous usage of the Spaniards, too great for human nature to support. This is confessed by Spanish writers in general, and therefore the truth of it cannot be questioned; especially as the laws, just quoted in the margin, had their origin in those complaints, and were calculated to redress the evils, which in time must necessarily tend to the ruin of the country, and perhaps the extirpation of the conquerors. To these we have specified, the following were added, in order to prevent all equivocation, and convince the Spaniards, that, by exempting the Indians from compulsive labour, his catholic majesty included every species of bodily labour, as well as digging in the mines. Accordingly it was enjoined, under severe penalties, that the Indians should not be compelled to carry burthens, or employed against their will in buildings, or removed from one province into another, even though they were born slaves. Particular privileges were bestowed on the Indian freemen. To prevent subjecting the Indians to unjust servitude, it was enacted, that all masters should be obliged to have their servants examined before a magistrate, in order to ascertain, whether they had been tied to the glebe, now become the property of the master. It was also ordained, that the Indians might be proprietors of gold and silver mines, as well as the Spaniards; and should have liberty to carry the produce to market, and dispose of it to the best advantage. Every Spanish proprietor of lands was obliged, under certain penalties, to see that the Indians, in his jurisdiction, were instructed in the christian religion: and it was farther enacted, that the visitors, appointed to redress the grievances of the natives, should perform their duty in person, repairing to the several towns appointed for their courts, without intrusting the business to deputies, except in cases of sickness, and extreme necessity.

Vela is sent in quality of viceroy to Peru.
A. D. 1543.

He enforces the new laws.

DE CASTRO had certainly acquitted himself like an able and honest minister, ever since the suppression of the Almagrian faction; nevertheless, his conduct was misrepresented to the emperor, by those persons who suffered by his strict integrity: it was therefore resolved at the court of Spain to appoint another governor, who should punctually enforce the new system of laws, to which he could have no reluctance, because they had no retrospect to his conduct, and could imply no restriction on his administration. Accordingly the emperor Charles V. nominated Blasco Nunez Vela, surveyor of the ports of Castile, to the dignity of president and viceroy of the kingdom and provinces of Peru. He had conceived the highest opinion of this gentleman's capacity, from the zeal and courage with which he had served him in divers inferior employments. In the month of November the viceroy embarked at St. Lucar, accompanied by Don Francisco Tello de Sandoval, with a fleet of fifty-two sail. Sandoval, with a part of the fleet, steered directly to Mexico, while the viceroy held on his course to Peru, arriving at Nombre de Dios on the 10th of January following, whence he travelled to Panama, where he released great numbers of Indians, and relieved them from the bondage imposed by the Spaniards, obliging their masters to send them back to Peru at their expence. Several remonstrances were made to him upon the injury which religion and the Spaniards must necessarily receive from this conduct. It was represented, that the lands would lie uncultivated, the mines unimproved, and that the Indians instructed in the principles of christianity, would relapse into their former errors, as soon as restraint was removed, and they returned to their caracas: but Vela's constant answer was, that the Spaniards had no right to encroach on their natural liberty; and the truth of christianity was not to be enforced by violence. After remaining twenty days in Panama, obliging those who had made great estates by the sale of Peruvian slaves to refund, and make several other alterations, he set out for his government, loaded with the execrations of the Spaniards.

a niards, and the blessings of the Indians. He set an example of the conduct which he required to be observed, ordering that his baggage might be carried by mules; and if any Indians were employed, that they should be men who voluntarily offered their service for hire, which he saw punctually paid. Carate, who was then governor of Panama, exhorted him, at his departure, to use less impetuosity in establishing a system of laws so odious to the Spaniards; alledging, that reformatations were to be wrought gradually and gently, in such a manner as to slide imperceptibly into practice: but Vela, disregarding this wholesome admonition, proceeded, on his arrival in Pera, to enforce them with the utmost rigour. Immediately the Spaniards took fire, and a spirit of mutiny appeared among all degrees of men. The report of the governor's proceeding diffused through every quarter b with great rapidity. He had promulgated the laws, and required their punctual execution on his journey from Tumbez, through Pinna and Truzillo; and was consequently received not only with coldness, but aversion, in all the cities. The manner in which he notified his arrival and commission, and superseded De Castro, likewise gave offence. The viceroy was taxed with insolence; and those who before exclaimed against De Castro, united against Vela, and offered their services to the late governor, in vindication of his honour; endeavouring, by all possible means, to effect a rupture between those two great personages, and throw into confusion the government which they determined not to obey. All was kindled into a flame, the humours of the people were raised to the highest degree of fermentation, by the artful practices of those persons who were interested in opposing the c new mode of legislation, and the viceroy's imprudent zeal. Vela had imposed taxes on all the Spaniards, as he advanced in the country, proportioned to their property; and they refused to pay them, on pretence that they held them upon a different tenure, from the governor De Castro, who enjoyed the same power with him, at the time he made the grants.

To apply a remedy to those evils, De Castro set out from Cuzco, attended by a numerous train of the citizens, and principal inhabitants, to meet the viceroy; and was presented, on his journey, with a letter from Vela, acquainting him, that from that instant his authority ceased; and all acts made by him, since the arrival of the new governor, were annulled. Castro obeyed, and resisted all temptations thrown in his way by the enemies of Vela, to disturb his government, and become the head of a faction. Immediately he dismissed the greater part of his attendants, and requested, that such as remained might go unarmed, in order to avoid every appearance of designing hostilities, notwithstanding he was admonished to the contrary. His arrival at Lima was celebrated with great demonstrations of joy, which all the endeavours of Castro could not suppress: however, to prevent their giving offence, he dispatched his secretary to the viceroy, to congratulate him on his safe arrival, and assure him of his perfect obedience to the will of his sovereign. His message was well received; he was invited to meet the viceroy at Kimac; he accepted d the invitation, was caressed for some time, and then imprisoned, on occasion of a tumult, which Vela ascribed to his intrigues. This augmented the public discontents. The inhabitants of Kimac, who had before resented the viceroy's refusal to confirm them in all the rights and privileges they enjoyed, became now outrageous. It was here, and not at Lima, as some writers alledge, that a piece of writing was found under a dish, upon the viceroy's table, to the following purpose: "He who deprives me of my property, I will deprive of life." Nor did Vela's behaviour to the incendiary at all quiet the clamours of the people. He pardoned the criminal, and they ascribed his lenity to his fears, which rendered them more daring and insolent. On the viceroy's coming to Lima, the prisoner was removed thither, and committed to the common jail. Upon which the inhabitants went in a body to Vela, and petitioned with great boldness against such an insult upon a person of Castro's rank; desiring that he might be removed to the town-house, and they would bail his appearance at the risque of a hundred thousand pieces of eight: a request with which the governor complied, from the apprehension of a general insurrection. Still, however, Vela persisted in his vigorous measures, and the people continued to plot and cabal. The judges and magistrates interfered. They advised Vela to a more moderate conduct; but he was inflexible, and treated their admonitions with so much contempt, that they began to enter into the sentiments of the malcontents. In a short time the resentment of both parties broke out in open violence, the judges setting at liberty one Antonio Sobr, whom the viceroy had imprisoned and condemned to death, after he had before granted him a pardon for the same crime.

THESE disturbances were not confined to Lima, where the viceroy resided; they extended g themselves over all the towns in Peru, inhabited by Spaniards. This was a fit opportunity for Gonzalo Pizarro to resume his ambitious projects; accordingly he practised secretly with the malcontents with so much address, that he soon was invited to protect his his countrymen against the tyranny of the viceroy. To give sanction to his measures, ^a and the appearance of moderation to his designs, he artfully exhorted the malcontents to reflect on the consequences of opposing regal authority; and pretending to be convinced by their arguments, accepted of the dignity of procurator and agent general of Peru; a title that intimated his being a mediator between the viceroy and people. His intentions, however, were quite different. Gonzalo's great scheme was to procure the government into his own hands, without regard to the means. With this view he amassed all the treasure he could find in Potosi, assembled his friends, and set out for Cuzco, where he erected his standard, was joined by two or three hundred Spanish volunteers, and regarded as the head of the party forming against the viceroy. Under pretence of petitioning Vela, in behalf of the colonies, to suspend the execution of the new laws, he directed ^b his march towards Lima, after constituting Francisco de Caraval his major-general, and being proclaimed by the magistrates of Cuzco chief justice, and supreme in civil affairs.

GONZALO was aware that he was now in a direct state of rebellion against his sovereign, by opposing his ordinances, and taking up arms against his representative. He resolved, therefore, to give some colour to his proceeding, by alledging, he took arms against the inca, who, he pretended was assembling an army to besiege Cuzco. This pretext, however false, was specious at this juncture, as Manco Capac, the inveterate enemy of the Pizarroi, sent to acquaint the viceroy, that he was ready to take the field against Gonzalo, and to serve the court of Spain with the last drop of his blood. The inca was actually assembling forces, ^c when an accident put an end to his life, and the wretched subjection in which he was held by the Spaniards. A quarrel arose between him and a refugee Spaniard, who had sought his protection in the mountains, as they were playing at bowls. In the heat of passion, the Spaniard forgot his obligations to the inca, and the respect due to his character. He seized the bowl, and flung it with such violence, as fractured the skull of this unfortunate prince, and laid him dead on the spot^b; by which accident, all the viceroy's sanguine expectations, from so powerful an ally, were disappointed, and Gonzalo's hopes elated. To this unlucky circumstance was superadded, the unseasonable progress of the mutual animosity subsisting between Vela and the judges; who, in a manner, openly espoused the interest of Pizarro; or at least obstructed, by every method in their power, all his ^d measures, whether offensive or defensive.

^e Such was the state of the viceroy's affairs, while Gonzalo, with an army of five hundred well armed Spaniards, twenty thousand Indians, and a train of artillery, set out for Lima; having first stopped all intercourse between Cuzco and the principal cities, seized upon the king's treasures, a train of artillery sent from Huamanga, and also the estates and effects of persons deceased, appropriated by the magistrates to the crown. The inca's death was the occasion of those open declarations; for he could now pretend danger from the Indians no longer, and was compelled, in some degree, to avow the motives of his conduct. It was some time before the viceroy had intelligence of these proceedings. When advices arrived that Gonzalo was at the head of a formidable army, he was thrown ^e into great perplexity, on account of the bad terms upon which he stood with the inhabitants of Lima. However, he resolved not to be wanting in his duty, and accordingly set on foot the most vigorous preparations for suppressing this bold and unexpected rebellion. He beat up for recruits, seized upon a large sum of money belonging to De Castro, and shipped it for Spain, nominated officers in whom he believed he could repose confidence, and assembled an army, composed of six hundred Spaniards, and several thousand Indians. Orders were given to make fire-arms of iron and bell-metal; to which purpose he appropriated all the bells in the churches. To try the affections of the people, he directed that several false alarms should be raised; and to prevent any danger from Castro, whose fidelity he suspected, notwithstanding he had lately consented to his being ^f set at liberty, he seized and confined him on board a ship that lay in the harbour.

^g MEAN time Pizarro was not idle; while he was marching in a hostile manner to Lima, he was taking measures to justify his conduct to the court of Spain; for which purpose he commissioned Tedeja, the judge most devoted to his interest, to pass immediately to Europe, and represent to the emperor, the necessity he was under of seizing upon the government, to prevent the general desertion of the natives and Spaniards, in consequence of the viceroy's mal-administration. He proceeded also to seize upon all the shipping on the coast, whereby he commanded the navigation of the South-sea; to appoint new governors and magistrates in the towns; to punish with death all the friends of the government, and to exert every other prerogative of absolute dominion, obliging the civil to bend to the military power. That he might be able to maintain his army, he exacted from the Spaniards a third of all the rents or tributes they received from the natives; seized every thing belonging to the crown, and, by his conduct, evidently demonstrated his intention of throwing off his dependence on Spain, and rendering himself the absolute sovereign of Peru; a scheme by no means difficult in the execution at that juncture, had Gonzalo acted with more prudence and discretion, had his punishments been less rigorous, and his behaviour more affable and popular. Had he made the proper use of the universal dislike to the new regulations, and convinced the people, that he sought their good more than the gratification of his own ambition, he might, undoubtedly, have become the greatest Spaniard in America. We may rest satisfied of this truth, from the

b detestation in which these ordinances were held. Pedro de Puelles, who had been deputy-governor for Vaca de Castro, in the town of Gucuno, was a person of considerable influence, and of consequence well received by the viceroy, when he came to Lima to pay his compliments. His commission was now renewed, and he was desired to have all his friends in readiness to take the field, completely armed, at an hour's warning. Pedro exerted himself, upon this occasion, with diligence, and assembled a considerable body of forces, with which he was marching, in obedience to fresh orders, against Pizarro; but they had not advanced far, when some discourse arising about the consequences of the viceroy's being successful, it was unanimously agreed, that, if he proved victorious, he would endeavour, with all his power, to establish the new scheme of legislation; whence it was c inferred, that their most politic course would be to join Pizarro, in order to preserve their liberties and property, and oppose the dangerous innovations intended. This resolution was no sooner formed than it was executed, Puelles, and all his people, marching directly to reinforce the rebels. The same resolution was taken by a body of horse detached by the governor, under Vela Nunez, to intercept Puelles, upon the advice he had received of his defection. The soldiers had conspired to kill their commander, and follow the fortune of Pizarro. Their intention was discovered to Nunez; he made his escape in the night, and all his troops went over to Pizarro, whom he joined at Guamanga. From these instances it appears, how general was the dislike to Vela, and what Gonzalo might have effected, had he known how to profit by circumstances.

Revolt of the viceroy's troops to Gonzalo.

b BESIDES the land-forces which Pizarro had collected, he was absolute master of the ocean, in consequence of the seizure of the shipping. His admiral Hernando Bachicao had a powerful squadron, with which he distressed the enemy by every possible method. He attacked the city of Panama, and took all the ships in the bay; by this means augmenting his fleet to twenty-six sail. He had also a number of land-forces which he debarked occasionally, plundering and harrassing the coast, although the governor had assembled a little army for their protection. From Panama he steered for the island of Pearls, where he broke his faith to the inhabitants, committed dreadful ravages, imposed tributes, and levied contributions, rather agreeable to the measure of his wants and avarice, than the ability of the people. This naval armament, therefore, upon the whole, injured the cause of Pizarro, more than it promoted it. Provisions, money, and warlike stores, were procured indeed by means of the fleet in great abundance; but the tyranny of the admiral raised a great number of enemies to his party.

NOTWITHSTANDING the misconduct of the Pizarrists, such was the dread conceived by the bulk of the Spaniards of the new regulations, that the viceroy's affairs wore a very unpromising aspect. All the method he had tried to pacify the jealousies of the people, contributed only to inflame them, and the troops he assembled deserted as fast as they were raised. He had fortified Lima in the best manner suggested by his knowledge in the art of war; but still he did not chuse to trust to walls, when the people and garrison f were disaffected. It was his intention to retreat to Truxillo, which he communicated to the magistrates, after he had first fully digested his plan of operations. The judges opposed his designs with heat, and every thing was again thrown into confusion, just as Vela imagined that he had conciliated the minds of the inhabitants, by the proofs he had exhibited of his vigilance and care for their preservation. A council was held, it broke up in disorder; and the viceroy determined to embark in some vessels in the harbour, with the children of the marquis Pizarro, while his brother Vela Nunez conducted the forces by land. This measure occasioned fresh disputes; the citizens remonstrated against putting the lady Francisca in the hands of rude sailors, and the judges gave orders to g one Robles to seize the person of the viceroy. They granted a warrant for this purpose, and Robles executed it with punctuality, though with some difficulty, as Vela had assembled a body of soldiers, to the number of four hundred men; who, however, laid down their arms, when they perceived the citizens in open rebellion. The judges now required the king's admiral to surrender the fleet, and the children of Pizarro, into their hands; threatened, threatened, in case of refusal, to put the viceroy to death. Geronimo Curbano complied with the latter part of the demand; but he determined to run all hazards, rather than resign the only means of defence now remaining. Disappointed in the expected effects of these menaces, the judges contrived divers stratagems to surprise the fleet, and succeeded so well, that they made Vela Nunez, the viceroy's brother, prisoner; and then repeated their demand, with the most positive assurances, that neither brother should meet with mercy, in case the admiral continued obstinate. Nevertheless Curbano persevered in his sentiments: but he was deserted by the vice-admiral, and all the rest of the shipping, who went over to the judges, obliging Curbano to put to sea with the single vessel he commanded in person.

Pizarro reduces Lima.

THESE circumstances tended evidently to promote the interest of Pizarro. Thus far the judges and he seemed to act in concert against the viceroy; tho' it now appeared, that this was the single point in which they were agreed. The judges were no sooner in possession of the viceroy's person and the fleet, than they prepared a process against Vela, whom they intended to send back to Spain, to receive sentence, and sent orders to Pizarro to disband his forces; telling him, that the viceroy's misconduct had devolved the whole power upon them, by virtue of the king's commission. Augustine Carate was deputed with this message; which proved so unwelcome to Pizarro, that he seized Carate, and treated him with great severity. The answer returned to the judges was, that Gonzalo Pizarro was now constituted governor-general; in which quality, if they refused to obey, the city of Lima should be destroyed with fire and sword. To give weight to this answer, he proceeded on his march towards that capital of the Spanish colonies, and encamped within a quarter of a league of the city. A fresh summons was sent to the judges; and finding it was disregarded, Gonzalo began to erect batteries, with intention of laying siege to Lima, which produced the desired effect, the whole city declaring against the judges, and most of the inhabitants deserting to the camp. A party of twenty men, sent out to reconnoitre the works of the besiegers, was taken; and Gonzalo's army now became so numerous, that he dispatched Carvajal with a summons, declaring, if any farther delay was made, the city must suffer all the consequences of his vengeance, and the judges ascribe to their obstinacy the bloodshed of their fellow citizens. Even this menace could not move them, until Carvajal ordered some of the chief prisoners he had taken the preceding day to be hanged up in sight of the besieged. This staggered the judges; who at length yielded to the remonstrances of the citizens, and their dread of the consequences of their refusal to admit Pizarro. Accordingly his army was drawn up in order of battle; and he made his entry in triumph in the month of October. Festivals were appointed to celebrate this event, and Lima blazed with bonfires, and rung with rejoicings. From this period Gonzalo dated his authority, in virtue of the royal commission granted to his brother, which he declared was intended to descend to his heirs. Besides, this commission was corroborated by the authority of the judges, whom he forced into a compliance with all the new appointments and alterations he made in the government. Gonzalo procured their countenance to letters he thought fit to dispatch into Spain, to solicit the emperor, that he might be confirmed in the government which he had so boldly usurped, as the only means of restoring the public tranquillity.

The viceroy assembles an army.

THIS flow of prosperity was interrupted by some accidents that gave great disquiet to Gonzalo. Vaca de Castro, though the person most injured by the viceroy, not only declared his resolution of implicitly obeying the royal mandate, but escaped from Panama, on advice that the rebel admiral Bachicao was on his way thither. He intimated his design of opposing Gonzalo; and this accident became of more importance, because the viceroy had found means to effect his escape, and was now raising an army with great diligence. Before his arrival at Quito, he had collected above one hundred and fifty men, and was there joined by two hundred more, who had not yet been infected with the contagious spirit of rebellion. He took courage from the misconduct of his adversary, and entertained hopes that Gonzalo's insolence would soon turn the stream of popular affection, and once more reduce the humours of the people into their natural channel. He dispatched his son-in-law into Spain, to acquaint his imperial majesty with the state of affairs in Peru, and request that speedy succours might be sent against the rebels. A party of his men had been defeated in a skirmish with some of Pizarro's marauders; but he soon revenged this disgrace in person, by falling suddenly upon the victorious enemy, whom he entirely overthrew; however, the loss on the side of Pizarro was inconsiderable, and the effects of these skirmishes were only to animate the combatants to more bloody hostilities.

GONZALO had now determined to attack the viceroy with all his forces, before he should become more formidable. In consequence of this resolution, he bent his march to

- a Quito, and sustained great hardships in crossing the deserts; but his soldiers being veterans, inured to action, they conquered all difficulties, and advanced so near the enemy, that Vela thought proper to decline a battle, and retire to Quito. Pizarro had found means to excite disturbances in his camp, by transmitting letters to his principal officers, with promises not only of pardon, but of great rewards. The viceroy imprudently suspected all who had received those offers, and punished them as if they had actually embraced the proposals. Hence arose a mutinous spirit, which, united to the fatigue and hunger sustained in his retreat, brought his affairs to the greatest extremity. Vexation and trouble had soured his temper, and he now added to unavoidable evils, by venting that indignation against his own people, which he was unable to pour down upon the heads of his
- b enemies. Some of his best officers he put to death on the most groundless suspicion of treachery; by which means he again alienated the minds of all the Spaniards in Peru, just as they were coming to a proper sense of their duty.

MEAN time Pizarro kept up the pursuit from St. Miguel to Quito so hotly, that the armies were frequently in sight of each other, and the royalists forced to keep constantly in arms, during a journey of one hundred and fifty leagues, in the course of which they were chiefly nourished by herbs, roots, and other vegetables. The approach of the rebels to Quito obliged the viceroy to quit that defenceless city, and retreat forty leagues beyond it; hoping that Pizarro would stop the pursuit, in order to refresh his men in a place abounding with necessaries: but he was mistaken; the rebels scarce halted at Quito, but

c pushed on with so much ardor and perseverance, as drove Vela to despair. When he saw a party of rebels descending a hill near his camp, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and exclaimed, "Shall it be credited in future ages, that Spaniards can pursue the standard of "their king with such obstinacy, as to endure every possible hardship for the space of four "hundred leagues?" meaning from Lima to the place where he was then encamped, on the farther extremity of Peru. Still, however, he proceeded on his retreat; which at length determined Gonzalo to return to Quito, where he employed his time in mirth and festivity, as if the viceroy was already conquered.

He is pursued
by Pizarro

VELA being thus suffered to rest in quiet in the province of Popayan, he set to work in procuring more complete arms for his troops, and calling in all the detachments employed

d in distant conquests. It recovered his spirits considerably, that Diego Centeno had revolted from Pizarro, and was now making a powerful diversion on the opposite side of Peru: and notwithstanding his brother Nunez was taken prisoner in his passage to Panama, after having once escaped out of the hands of his enemies, he entertained hopes of a favourable issue to the war. He was joined about this time by Juan Catreras, with an hundred men; which reinforcement encouraged him to face the enemy, weakened by the detachment sent against Centeno; however, all his expectations were blasted by a stratagem of Pizarro's. That officer gave out, that he would go in person, with the greater part of his army, to Charcas, against Centeno, who was plundering his lands in that country, and leave Puelles with three hundred men for the defence of the frontier. He appointed his

e captains, begun his journey to Quito, corrupted a spy maintained by the viceroy in the city, whom he had discovered, and charged with false intelligence for his master, procuring from him the cypher used in his letters to Vela. At the same time he ordered Puelles to write an invitation to his friends in the viceroy's army in a cypher, which he took care to have explained to the spy, that they would spend some time at Quito in the absence of Gonzalo, where they might depend on being treated with the utmost cordiality, notwithstanding any difference of opinion in matters relating to the government; but care was taken to have these letters fall into the viceroy's hands, without affording suspicion of design. So many circumstances, the public report, the intelligence of his spy, and the inf tercepted letters, all convinced Vela of what Gonzalo desired to have believed. Immediately he assembled his troops on the first advices that Gonzalo had set out for Los Charcas, and began his march for Quito with the utmost privacy and celerity. His forces amounted to eight hundred men, but raw, undisciplined, and very indifferently accoutred; while Gonzalo had notice of every motion, directed his measures accordingly, privately joined Puelles, and upon a general muster found his troops to consist of two hundred musqueteers, three hundred pike-men, and an hundred and fifty horse, all approved hardy veterans. He encamped without the city in such narrow bounds as carried all the appearance of very slender numbers. Vela approached within two leagues of the entrenchments, g without entertaining the slightest suspicion, upon advice of which Gonzalo decamped in the night without beat of drum, intending to surprise him; but the viceroy had taken the resolution of gaining possession of Quito before he hazarded a battle, and had on purpose begun his march in the middle of the night, over steep mountains and rugged precipices. He entered the city without opposition, and there first had intimation of the stratagem, which threw him into the utmost consternation. He communicated this piece of intelligence; the necessary measures were debated in a council of war, and it was resolved, that as a retreat was now become impracticable, that the whole should rest upon the fortune of a battle, for which all the officers made the most vigorous preparations.

ON the other hand, Gonzalo was no less surprised and disappointed to find that the viceroy had quitted his course; but when he was told by the Indians that he had taken the road of Quito, he pursued him with great rapidity, and soon came within sight of the royal army, drawn up in battalia before the city. A skirmishing immediately commenced between the advanced posts, which terminated to the advantage of the rebels, and brought on a more general and bloody engagement between the horse, who fought with great courage and obstinacy. The infantry had not yet come to blows, and seemed to wait with anxious expectation in what manner victory would declare on the side of the cavalry; when at length the impetuosity and stubborn valour of Gonzalo's veterans turned the scale, and made room for the foot to join in close engagement; for such was the extraordinary disposition of both armies, that the horse occupied almost the entire front. The royal infantry in the rear were somewhat disconcerted by the precipitate tumultuous retreat of the vanquished cavalry; but they soon rallied, and sustained the attack of the enemy with firmness and intrepidity, until perceiving the superior strength of Gonzalo's powder, and execution of his musquetry, they were seized with a panic, and routed with great slaughter. The viceroy fought like a private soldier, at the same time that he displayed all the qualities of an excellent general, animating, exhorting, soothing, and menacing his troops to perform their duty. He engaged Montalto, a brave rebel officer, hand to hand, and dismounted him, after an obstinate contest. He might now have escaped, had not his own courage carried him into the midst of the enemy, as an Indian coat which he wore over his armour hindered his being known. A soldier fell upon him with great fury, and laid him dead with the stroke of a battle-axe, little imagining that he was spilling the blood of the king's representative. It is affirmed by La Vega^c, that his intention was not to survive his power and honour, or subject himself to the mortification of becoming the prisoner of the conqueror. His head was cut off, and sent in triumph to Quito, to induce the inhabitants to receive Gonzalo as governor, while his body was interred with all the honours due to his quality.

IN consequence of this decisive victory, Gonzalo came into immediate possession of the whole authority. He disposed of every thing at his pleasure, punished his enemies, and promoted his friends without controul. Whatever his insolence might have been on former occasions, he certainly acted upon this with prudence and discretion. Assembling the prisoners, he represented the power which heaven had put into his hands, the designs he had to support and protect public liberty, the necessary consequences which must have resulted from the establishment of the new regulations, and the crimes committed by those persons who supported Vela's tyranny; after which he dismissed them with a general pardon, except a few of the ringleaders, whom he banished to Chili and the distant provinces, admonishing them not to incur his indignation by any attempts against his authority, or opposition to his measures. Vera Nunez, brother to the deceased viceroy, was permitted to live in Quito, on his promise to submit quietly to the present government, and to avoid all plots, cabals, and intrigues. He even allowed Nunez afterwards to accompany him to Lima, and treated him in the whole journey with the utmost familiarity; more perhaps than was justifiable in strict policy to a person who must certainly entertain a private animosity, however carefully he might disguise his behaviour^f.

The royalists entirely defeated.

WHEN the troops were sufficiently refreshed after the fatigues of a long march and a bloody engagement, Gonzalo dispatched his lieutenant Carvajal with a strong party to the southward against Centeno, who commanded a little army of royalists, after having slain Almeadras, and eluded all the endeavours of Alonso de Toro, who opposed him with superior forces, both gentlemen of influence, and strenuous friends of the viceroy. Near Callao an attempt was made by Centeno to surprise Carvajal in his quarters; but he was disappointed, having found that officer ready to receive him, at the head of a superior army. Carvajal even pursued Centeno over mountains and deserts, but could never bring him to a general action, notwithstanding every day was productive of bloody skirmishes. At length he seized upon a pass, where he was of opinion the enemy must necessarily be surrounded, and forced to lay down their arms; but Centeno's vigilance extricated him out of this difficulty likewise, and forced Carvajal to confess, that in the course of forty campaigns made in Italy and other countries, he had never beheld so extraordinary a retreat as that performed by Centeno, over a desert country of two hundred leagues in extent, in the face of a superior enemy. It was impossible, however, he could long maintain himself in this distressed condition. He directed his march to Arequaba, where a he determined to embark his troops, and proceed to Chili, if shipping could be provided, for which purpose he sent an officer before him. A vessel bound to Chili, was hired: but just as he was ready to embark Carvajal appeared; upon which Centeno told his men that Providence was against them, that they must now disperse in small bodies, and shift for themselves, until some change happened; after which he took an affectionate leave, retired into the mountains, and concealed himself until the arrival of a new viceroy from Spain.

^c LA VEGA. lib. iv. cap. 24.

ALL opposition being now removed by the reduction of this last army of the royalists, the rebels used all their endeavours to persuade Gonzalo to assume the titles and honours of sovereign of Peru, independent of the emperor and court of Spain. Carvajal wrote him a letter, in which he observes, that, after having opposed the royal edict, cut off the head of the king's representative, and waged open war against his forces, there remained no other means of security than persevering in rebellion, assuming the crown, gaining the affections of the Spaniards by the most liberal actions, and conciliating himself in the best manner possible with the Indians; by which means he might bid defiance to all the power of Spain, it being improbable that his imperial majesty could transport a number of forces to so distant a region sufficient to conquer Peru. Whether it was that the vastness of the project struck Gonzalo, or that he deferred gratifying his ambition until he had first established the government, and tried the effects of his remonstrances to the court, we cannot determine; but certain it is, that he resisted all the temptations thrown in his way by his flattering officers. ^c La Vega ascribes this moderation to the firm belief he entertained that he would be confirmed in the government from a principle of policy, and restored by the court to all the employments held by his brother. His public entry into Truxillo and Lima was triumphant; but he assumed no regal honours, and even refused to walk under a canopy, as had been proposed. He entirely altered his conduct, and proceeded from insolence and pride, to the other extreme of affability, in order, by this means, probably to lay a foundation for the great designs projected by his adherents. He made Nonojosa high admiral of the seas, ordering him to sail to Panama, and detach Ferdinando Mexia across the Isthmus to surprise Nombre de Dios, which he accomplished without scarce any resistance; so that he now commanded the North and South seas, and could obstruct any supplies ^d from being sent either from Old or New Spain to the assistance of those who might prove inclinable to join the royal party, and again light up the sparks of dissention. Nor did he think these measures altogether sufficient for his security. Apprehensive of some turn of fortune, he resolved to use his utmost endeavours to conciliate the court of Spain to his conduct, which he pretended only to justify by the extreme necessity of affairs. Accordingly Aldano was commissioned to go to Old Spain, relate all the late transactions in the most favourable light, assure his majesty of the zeal and loyalty of Gonzalo, and solicit the government for him, rather with a seeming view to promote the public interest, than recompense his services, or gratify his ambition. Aldano was further directed to promise repaying whatever had been expended of the king's treasure, provided Gonzalo's request and a general pardon were granted. ^e To enforce this application, it was intimated that a considerable sum of money should immediately be remitted from Peru, which it was expected would produce a good effect in the present necessitous circumstances of the Spanish court.

THE disturbances in Peru had now been of so long a duration, that every thing was known in Spain before Aldano's arrival, and that conquest given up as lost. It had been proposed in council to reduce Gonzalo by force of arms, and bring the bold usurper to condign punishment; yet the difficulty of transporting an army sufficient for that purpose, to so distant a quarter, occasioned the ministry to regard the enterprise as impracticable, until the misconduct of Pizarro brought about some favourable turn for assisting the royalists. ^f However, the solicitations of Aldano now ushered a gleam of hope: the ministry perceived that the usurper thought his situation ticklish before he would stoop to make concessions, or require any ratification and sanction of his conduct. A person who had ventured upon such gross violation of law, and evident rebellion, must have been disconcerted in his schemes, before he would throw himself upon the mercy of a prince whom he had so heinously offended. In this manner the Spanish ministry reasoned; in consequence of which they resolved to send the licenciado Pedro Gasca, a man of sense and probity, to take upon him the government of Peru, with the title of president only. A commission to this purpose was signed at Vienna, where the emperor then resided, in the year 1546, and ^g Gasca was dispatched with a slender convoy, both to save charges to the court, and avoid all appearance of pomp and ostentation to the inhabitants of Peru, which it was apprehended might give disgust. On his arrival at Nombre de Dios, he concealed the real purport of his commission, giving out that he had a message from the emperor to Pizarro, with which, if he refused to comply, he was to return directly to Spain, as he formed no pretentions to be a warrior, and consequently had no design of enforcing obedience by dint a of arms. He farther intimated, that his chief business was to revoke the new regulations which had created such uneasiness, and to preside in the council. In fact, Gasca's power was unlimited; but this he prudently concealed, until he had sounded the affections of the Peruvians: and it is alledged, that in case he found matters could not be otherwise adjusted, he was empowered to grant the pardon required, recal the new ordinances, and constitute Pizarro viceroy of Peru, it being less culpable, as was observed in council, to allow the devil should be governor, than for Spain to lose the inestimable mines of Potosi, so much value did the court of Spain place on the silver of Peru, which experience hath evinced to be a ruinous and fatal acquisition.

THE first action which confirmed the opinion entertained of Gasca's policy, was the artful b manner in which he insinuated himself into the esteem of Mexia, who had been appointed governor of Nombré de Dios by Pizarro. To this gentleman the president addressed himself with such irresistible blandishments, that, with his whole garrison, he deserted the usurper, and soon after assisted Gasca in prevailing upon the admiral Nonojosa to declare with his whole fleet for his imperial majesty.

He gains the fleet.

The emperor's letter to Pizarro.

THESE important negotiations succeeding happily, Gasca determined to know how Gonzalo relished the news of his arrival; for which purpose he dispatched Paniagua, a gentleman of great penetration and address, to Lima, with a letter from the emperor, and another from himself, to Pizarro. In the former of these his imperial majesty condescended to cajole this usurper, acquainting him, that, being informed of the disturbances excited in c Peru by the viceroy's too rigorous execution of the new regulations, and persuading himself that whatever Pizarro and his party had done, was intended to promote the public benefit, and support the honour and interest of the crown, he had dispatched the licenciado Gasca, in quality of president, with full powers and instructions to terminate all differences, redress all grievances, and do whatever might contribute to the improvement of this valuable conquest, and the welfare of his subjects, whether Spaniards or natives; in which he required Pizarro to assist him with his advice and influence, assuring him, that the important services performed by himself and his family should be held in grateful remembrance. Nor was the president's letter less respectful. He blamed the severity and inflexibility of the viceroy for all the disturbances and effusion of blood. He declared his belief, that d his imperial majesty did not ascribe the late civil commotions to their disobedience or disloyalty, but to the necessity of circumstances which obliged Pizarro and his friends to act on a principle of self-preservation. He appeared to be not at all surprised at their opposition to the new laws, on account of the rigour with which the viceroy required they should be executed. "The most wholesome nourishment, said he, may be converted to "poison, by being improperly administered. His majesty hath now sent me to quiet "the minds of the people, by a revocation of those laws, according to the prayer of your "petition, with power to publish a general pardon of all crimes and misdemeanors already committed. I am enjoined to consult the people, and be guided by their opinion, with respect to the proper measures for promoting the interests of religion, and e "the welfare of the inhabitants." He then exhorted Pizarro to take these matters into serious consideration, and shew his gratitude to his sovereign for restoring him to the enjoyment of all his estates and possessions, after an act which another prince would have thought deserving of severe punishment. So favourable an interpretation of a conduct which would have admitted of a different construction, demonstrated the clemency of the monarch, and ought to insure the loyalty of the subject; a duty incumbent not only by the laws of nature, but explicitly enforced by those of revelation. "Your ancestors, "said the president, have distinguished themselves by their services, they have rendered "themselves illustrious by their loyalty; it will be your part to imitate this example in f "the largest characters, and not tarnish their lustre and lineage by your defection from "their virtues. Next to the salvation of our souls, our next care ought to be the preservation of our honour, the smallest blemish on which is perceivable in lucid bodies, moving in your sphere, and reflecting light on all things around them. The foulest spot, "next to disobedience to the God of heaven, is treason against your country, and "rebellion against your earthly sovereign. He is God's vicerent, and appointed by "him to preserve order and good government in society. Let me advise you, therefore, "to weigh those things with impartiality and prudence, and reflect upon the power of "your king, whose forces you are very unable to withstand; but lest your inexperience in g "his court, not having viewed the strength and numbers of his armies, should betray you "into an unjust estimate of your comparative powers, figure to yourself the puissance of "the Great Turk, who marched in person at the head of three hundred thousand fighting "men, came within sight of the imperial army, and retreated with precipitation, without "daring to give battle."

THESE letters occasioned warm debates in Gonzalo's councils. They were read several times, and still the hearers were divided about the answer which ought to be returned. Carcenal was for accepting the offers of his majesty, and returning to their duty and obedience. Capeda was of a directly contrary opinion; alledging, that all the promises were insidious, in order to prevail on them to lay down their arms, and then fall upon them defenceless. He represented, that if the president were once admitted, he would insinuate himself into the affections of the people, and dispose of them and their fortunes at pleasure. Pizarro declined giving his opinion until he had maturely deliberated a point of such importance; and in the mean time Paniagua, the president's agent, practised so artfully with the principal citizens of Lima, that they were ready to desert the usurper when the first opportunity offered, and they were sure of being protected from his vengeance. Although his late conduct had been unexceptionable, they ripped up old grievances, and complained that he had put several persons of distinction to death; that he had usurped their property, and violated their wives and children, as if these crimes had been recently committed. They embraced the general pardon offered, and Paniagua persevered in alienating their affections from Pizarro, and reclaiming them to their duty, in contempt of the menaces of the usurper, to put him to death if he discovered him tampering with the citizens. He was now encouraged to proceed with boldness by the declaration of the fleet; and this likewise contributed to make the inhabitants of Lima lend a more willing ear to his persuasions. However, all possible care was taken to keep their designs secret; and yet it was universally known, except to Pizarro, who had just resolved upon embracing the opinion of Capeda, not to admit the president, with which view he had dispatched orders to his admiral to provide a ship for his return to Spain. He had not yet received advice of that officer's defection, which had also been kept private, the more to disconcert the usurper, who would thereby be deprived of helps on which he depended. Having formed these measures, he thought proper to give Paniagua his final answer, in a letter directed to the president. Here he complimented the president's learning and good sense. He besought him to consider him as a person extremely devoted to his majesty, and to remember the incessant labours of the Pizarro family for the space of sixteen years to augment the territories and revenues of the crown of Spain. They had subdued countries of vast extent, abounding with more gold and silver than the united kingdoms of the world, at their own private risque, without putting the king to the expence of a single crown, and without any other reward than the consciousness of having served their prince and country with fidelity and success. They had indeed acquired treasures, but these were liberally expended in settling colonies, and supporting their conquests. They had not the inheritance of a single acre of land, the court of Spain granting only a kind of leases during life to the adventurers, which reverted to the crown upon their decease; and notwithstanding these cruel neglects, they remained fixed in their loyalty, and required no arguments to remind them of their duty, by setting forth his majesty's power, and the success of his arms, against his enemies. Towards the close of his letter he endeavours to demonstrate, that, to the imprudence and inflexibility of the viceroy, ought to be ascribed all those unhappy commotions sincerely lamented by every friend to society; and justifies his own usurpation, by observing, that he was chosen agent-general by all the cities and corporations of Peru, and empowered by them to oppose the violences of the viceroy, having transacted nothing without their concurrence.

THIS was the varnish with which Pizarro coloured over his own rebellious conduct, although it was known to the whole world that he had used violence in obliging the judges to surrender Lima, which alone evinced that he had not acted by their authority. To shew the proper respect to the imperial letter, with which he had been honoured, he dispatched several agents, men of quality and consideration, to represent his conduct in the most favourable light, and procure a ratification of the authority he had usurped; but these deserted him, went to Panama, and accepted employments, to which they were appointed by the president. This encouraged the royalists more and more to appear. Centeno and divers others descended from the mountains, and emerged out of those caves in which they had been long concealed. A party was forming against Pizarro, and every thing boded the revival of the civil war. The president, after issuing orders to the governors of St. Martha, Carthagena, Granada, and Papayan, to levy forces with all expedition, ventured to leave Panama, and set sail for the frontiers of Peru, arriving safely at Tumbez. The vice-admiral Aldena sailing to the coast of Peru with a squadron of four men of war, was joined by a great number of deserters, whom he immediately formed into companies, appointing officers agreeable to the powers vested in him by Gasca. Jago de Nara was induced, by the presence of the vice-admiral, the persuasion of Centeno, and suspicions which he entertained of Pizarro's farther designs, to declare for the president, after he had assembled a corps of five hundred men, and appointed the general rendezvous of the king's forces at Caxamalca.

Gonzalo
raises an army.

ADVICE of these transactions soon reaching Pizarro, he saw the necessity of taking vigorous measures for his own defence. The revolt of his fleet, the constant desertion of those he had deemed his friends, and the daily increase of his enemies, filled him with reasonable apprehensions that his usurpation would meet with farther opposition, and set him upon levying troops with the utmost diligence. In the space of a few days, he mustered near a thousand men in the city of Lima, all veterans, well armed, and provided with horses and slaves for conveying the baggage; so that this body might be regarded either as cavalry or infantry, just as occasion required, and had the advantage of marching with great celerity, without fatigue, to whatever part they were destined. Nor was this his whole strength; he sent detachments to Cuzco, La Plata, and other places, ordering it to be published in all places, that the president had exceeded the king's orders in raising forces against him, and attempting to embroil in civil war a country which had just begun to taste the blessings of peace and tranquillity. He affirmed that the royal commission did not extend so far as to empower Casca to supplant him in his authority; it only constituted him president of the council, with instructions to pursue the most pacific measures. As he had exceeded the bounds of his authority, Gonzalo alledged that the people were no less concerned than himself to check a growing ambition; for if the president came off successful in his undertakings, they must expect to be plundered and dispossessed of those riches they had acquired with so much toil and bloodshed, and perhaps meet imprisonment, tortures, and capital punishments, as the rewards of their services.

He commences a process against the president and others.

To give sanction to those hostile preparations, it was thought necessary to have recourse to reason and arguments; for which purpose the lieutenant Capeda drew up a formal indictment, and began process against the president in the courts of law. The same was done against the admiral Nanojosa for betraying the fleet, and all the other officers who had deserted from Pizarro. To give the appearance of rigid justice to these proceedings, evidences were examined, and the crimes of treachery, breach of the peace, and robbery, were proved on oath against the captains. It was also proved, that Casca had received these effects illegally, knowing them to have been Pizarro's, and appropriated them to his own use; upon which the president and all the officers were condemned to death, and declared traitors by the judges at Lima. This sentence, however, was ridiculed even by the parties concerned, as it was well known that the sword, and not the forms and judgment of courts, must determine the fate of the supposed criminals. In effect, the desertion continued, numbers went over daily to Casca, the people were sufficiently sensible of the legality of his powers, they were weary of the usurpation of Gonzalo, and, like the multitude in every country, they embraced with eagerness whatever carried the appearance of change and novelty. Casca's conduct besides was full of affability, lenity, and complacency; he won their affections by the most insinuating carriage. Without seeming to cajole, he caressed, as proceeding rather from the friendship of his nature than policy. He was continually expressing his dislike to those regulations which had given offence, and expressing his satisfaction at the power vested in him of obliging the people by a revocation of the ordinances, and general pardon of offences.

Desertion in
army.

MEAN time the arrival of Aldana in the port of Callao greatly alarmed Pizarro, and obliged him to encamp in the fields, not only for the preservation of Lima, but to prevent desertion, which would become more difficult when the soldiers were exposed to public view. A message was sent from the fleet to acquaint Pizarro of the extent of the president's commission, and request him to resign an usurped authority, which he could no longer claim without direct rebellion and effusion of blood. Panna, one of the naval captains, had brought this unwelcome message, which he endeavoured to enforce by all his eloquence; but could procure no other answer than violent exclamations against the treachery of Nanojosa and Aldana. However, he performed excellent services to the royal interest, by making known in the camp the tenor of the president's commission, the revocation of the new laws, and the general pardon granted; in consequence of which desertion became so frequent, that Pizarro was soon reduced to six hundred men, the rest having enlisted with Aldana. Among these were the licenciado Carvajal, and several persons of considerable property, which persuaded Gonzalo of the disaffection of the city of Lima, and determined him to march to the southward as far as Arequaba. This march was not performed without great losses and disappointments. The soldiers found such frequent opportunities to desert, that the whole army was reduced to two hundred men, upon half of whom there could be no dependance. Antonio Ribera was left behind in quality of governor; but the usurper had scarce marched fifteen leagues, before the magistrates declared for the king, displayed the city-standard, assembled the people, published the revocation of the late edicts, the general pardon granted, and obedience to the president. Upon this Aldana debarked his troops, took possession of the city in the king's name, and was received with great demonstrations of joy. Not long after the president advancing farther along the coast with the remainder of the fleet, and a considerable body of land-forces, constituted a constituted Norojosa general by land; but he did not think it adviseable to take the field until he had assembled an army so much superior to the enemy as to insure success, and render certain the reduction of the empire. Indeed he chiefly relied upon policy, which he thought in the present juncture of affairs not only more secure, but also more serviceable to the general interest, although it dazzled with inferior lustre in the eyes of the people.

AFTER Pizarro had quitted Lima, he received intelligence that Diego Centeno had raised eight hundred men for the crown in the province of Charcas, and possessed himself of the cities of La Plata and Cuzco. Upon this the resolution was formed of attacking him, and recovering those cities; with provision, that, if the enterprize failed, the army should march into Chili, assist in the reduction of that obstinate warlike people, and by so important a service induce the court to grant a pardon for all past transgressions. This was the plan of operations settled upon leaving Arequeba. Centeno heard of his motions, and suspecting his design, advanced to give battle, burning the bridge over the channel of the lake Titicaca to stop the enemy, and prevent their taking another course. Upon this Gonzalo wrote to him, reminding him of their ancient friendship, and endeavouring, by the most soothing expressions, to gain him to his interest. He proposed a treaty, in which they would adjust all differences to their mutual advantage, Gonzalo declaring that he would accede to any reasonable propositions with as much satisfaction as if the parties had been brothers. Centeno answered the letter in similar terms; but, instead of complying with the contents, earnestly exhorted Pizarro to embrace the general pardon offered, promising to use all his influence with the president to bury in oblivion all past transactions, and secure to him not only his life, but his estates and honours, which he held legally, and by the authority of his sovereign; more he would not undertake, and resistance might render even this impossible. He delivered himself with so specious an air, that even Pizarro's messenger deserted him, and offered his service to carry some letters from Centeno to the president, which he performed with great fidelity. In these Centeno gave an account of the flourishing state of his own affairs, the decline of Pizarro, the continual desertion of his troops, his march towards Cuzco, and lastly of the proposals which he made to him, together with the answer he returned; intelligence which gave the highest delight to the president, and encouraged him to proceed boldly from Truxillo to Lima. But the scene was soon changed on this side. Pizarro and his officers, incensed, not only that their proposals were rejected, but their messenger corrupted, determined to give Centeno battle, and either force a passage to Cuzco, or perish in the attempt. He directed his march directly to Huerina, giving out that he had other intentions; but Centeno, by means of the Indians, was informed of his true course, and took his measures accordingly. Pizarro determined to avoid battle until he had advanced farther, Centeno resolved to come to action immediately; and with such diligence did both pursue their designs, that the armies came very unexpectedly in fight, and were in danger of joining battle before either had made the necessary preparations. Pizarro no sooner received intelligence of the enemy by his scouts, than he projected a scheme to alarm them; and as Centeno was no stranger to his activity, he exerted himself to prevent being surprised. Centinels were placed in all the proper stations; notwithstanding which, Acosta with a detachment of twenty musqueteers beat up one of the quarters, and spread consternation over the whole camp; had his efforts being seconded, a complete victory might have ensued. Next day the two armies advanced within three hundred yards of each other in the plain of Huerina, and then halted. They were drawn up with great military skill, especially Pizarro's, that important business devolving upon Francisco de Carvajal, one of the best and most experienced officers in America. His orders were to stand the enemy's attack firmly, until they advanced within sure reach of his shot, and then to pour in his fire with the utmost vigour.

f To provoke the enemy, he sent Acosta with a party of musqueteers to insult their front, and gave orders that he should keep up a retreating fight; which was executed so punctually, that Centeno was drawn into an engagement, and seduced to expend his shot before it could take effect. It was this finesse that more than counterbalanced the difference of numbers. Centeno's army consisted of near twelve hundred men fit to bear arms, that of Pizarro's did not exceed one third of the number: but the soldiers timed their fire so judiciously, that near a hundred and fifty of the enemy fell at the first discharge. The second put all in confusion and dismay, most of Centeno's officers were killed or wounded, and the infantry was in less than half an hour entirely defeated. It was otherwise with the cavalry.

g Here the weight and superiority of numbers proved more than an equivalent to good order and discipline. Pizarro's horse were borne down with the torrent, and himself in imminent danger of being killed or taken prisoner, had not the victorious infantry come speedily to his assistance, attacked the enemy in front and both flanks, and destroyed them almost to a man. We may venture to affirm, that in this battle was exhibited one of the first instances of the superiority of foot over horse, although it is passed over by writers as a mere mere skirmish that could prove nothing decisive with respect to large armies; whereas we are of opinion, that the skill of a general, the judgment of disposition, and the power of arms, are as conspicuous in small as in great bodies, and frequently more so, because the fortune of the day depends less on unforeseen accidents.

Pizarro enters Cuzco.

PIZARRO did not obtain this victory without bloodshed; near one hundred of his men were killed upon the spot; nevertheless, it was of the utmost consequence, as the hostile army was almost entirely destroyed, those who escaped the sword having been taken, and then incorporated with the other troops. Besides, a road was now opened to the heart of the empire, a happy turn was given to the spirits of his people, and he had a wide field opened, not only for recruiting his army, but amassing prodigious treasures. He now advanced to Cuzco, made his triumphal entry into that city, detachments were sent upon different expeditions, the king's treasures to an immense value were seized at La Plata; while the unfortunate Centeno was making the best of his way to Lima, over rugged mountains and barren deserts, attended only by a priest, who had faithfully shared in his calamities, and assisted in his escape.

The president goes in quest of Pizarro.

THE president was encamped with his army in the valley of Sausa, rejoicing at the advices sent him by Centeno, when intelligence arrived of this sudden turn of fortune, and cast a gloom upon the festivity and mirth of the royalists, though, from their great superiority of numbers, it could not throw them into despair. A few days only before, most of the officers were of opinion that Gasca had no occasion to increase his forces, since those under Centeno were quite sufficient to bring matters to a happy issue; fortunately, however, for the royal party, this opinion was not embraced, the president thinking it advisable to provide against all possible accidents. Some went even so far as to advise him to disband the army; but Gasca always replied, that the point in dispute was of too much consequence to leave any doubt upon the mind with respect to the issue, only to save the court a little money, and himself and friends some trouble. The event shewed how justly he determined. Had this army been disbanded, it would have been impossible to have raised another with the requisite dispatch; the people would have embraced the prosperous side, and then Pizarro would have poured down from Cuzco upon the lower settlements with an irresistible torrent. Gasca now exerted all his powers to animate the drooping spirits of his people. He told them, that Centeno's defeat was the mere fortune of war, and a ray of prosperity darded upon the usurper's affairs, only to render his adversity more insupportable. He exhorted both officers and soldiers to the punctual discharge of their duty, and, with a kind of prophetic spirit, gave them the strongest assurances of speedy victory. Next he called in his detachments, collected a fine train of artillery, and then began his march to Cuzco, at the head of nineteen hundred men, on the 29th day of December. On his march he was joined by great numbers of officers and soldiers, among whom was Valdivia, whose actions in Chili we have already related. The appearance of this officer diffused universal satisfaction. His valour was acknowledged, and now the royalists doubted not but they had a captain whom they might safely oppose to Carvajal. Many difficulties occurred on the march, which were conquered by the courage of the soldiers, and the good conduct and perseverance of Gasca, who displayed great genius in the different contrivances for crossing rivers. The passage of the river Amancaes was the most celebrated, as here the enemy opposed him, and he had to combat not only with the natural difficulty of the attempt, but to disconcert all the schemes to disappoint him, formed by the celebrated Carvajal; which he at last effected by the mere dint of superior fertility of invention.

Pizarro's infatuated conduct.

MEAN time Pizarro remained with the main army at Cuzco, felicitating himself on his late victory, and seeming to regard it as a decisive blow. Carvajal perceived the bad effects which security must necessarily produce, and laboured with all his influence to prevail upon him to seize on the strong posts in the enemy's way, evacuate Cuzco, and take the field with spirit and activity. When advices arrived of the president's approach, he redoubled his instances; but the infatuated Pizarro was wrapped in a fatal security, and rejected almost every proposal made to him by this prudent and discerning officer. However, he permitted Carvajal with a detachment to attempt the defence of the river, and then triumphed in his disappointment, as if it were a proof of the rectitude of his own opinion. Carvajal still insisted upon his taking the field, upon his dismissing the prisoners he had incorporated in his army, and relying rather upon a handful of certain friends, than a number of doubtful soldiers, upon distressing the enemy by marches and countermarches, dividing their forces, and then attacking them separately, when no opportunity offered of assisting each other. This proposal evinced the military knowledge of Carvajal; but it was rejected by Gonzalo, as injurious to his honour. He thought that avoiding battle with a defeated army would tarnish the glory of his late victory, without reflecting that it was the issue of the operations that must establish his character. He resolved to come to an engagement, and for that purpose gave orders that the army should be ready to march

- a march at beat of drum to the valley of Sacsabuanuah, about four leagues from the city. Carvajal's remonstrances were fruitless; that if he was determined to hazard a battle, he would wait at Oracs, on the opposite side of the city, for the enemy, in order to fatigue them the more, or at least introduce confusion in their army as they passed through Cuzco. When he quitted this city, his army amounted to nine hundred men, a third of whom were persons in whose fidelity Carvajal had no reliance, which made him the more averse to the general's resolution; however, he complied, and endeavoured all he could to conciliate the minds of the soldiers to a measure now unavoidable. When he reached the valley, Pizarro drew up the forces in a place inaccessible in the flanks and rear, an attack on the front being likewise attended with difficulties. Hither the enemy arrived in three days after, the
- b three following days passing in slight skirmishes, until the main body of the royalists had occupied the proper posts, when they faced about, and offered an engagement. It was now only that Pizarro began to distrust his soldiers; the vicinity of the danger made him inspect their conduct more narrowly: but it was too late; desertion had already begun, several were seized in the attempt to escape, they were put to death, and their punishment appeared to have no other effect than to alienate the minds of the remainder.

The armies meet in the valley of Sacsabuanuah.

- In this situation was Pizarro, when it was determined in a council of war held by the president, to give battle next day, on account of the scarcity of water that prevailed, and the incommodioussness of the situation. Different reasons prevailed on Pizarro to come to the same resolution, after he had first sent to the president to demand a sight of his commission, and the powers whereby he insisted upon his resigning the government, declaring that his refusal would be regarded as a signal for hostilities, and that he must be answerable for all the consequences. Two priests had been sent with this commission, and instructions to try all in their power to alienate the minds of Gasca's soldiers; which being discovered, the president ordered them to be seized, then published the general pardon granted to all who should now quit the interest of Pizarro, gained their affections, and sent them back to cherish the seeds of disaffection in the usurper's army.
- c

- MEAN time Pizarro had given orders to Acosta to alarm the enemy's camp in the night; and he was preparing to execute his instructions, when the desertion of a soldier ruined the design, by carrying intelligence to the president; however, it was attended with this advantage, that the royal army stood upon their arms the whole night, and suffered so much from the cold as almost rendered them unfit for action the next day when they were drawn out in the plain in order of battle. To Capeda was entrusted the care of ranging the troops, Carvajal being so much offended that his advice had been rejected upon so many occasions, as to refuse taking any concern, protesting that he gave all up for lost. As the armies were fronting each other, Garcilasso, father to the historian, deserted, and was received with open arms by the president. His example was followed by Capeda, the very officer in whose fidelity Pizarro reposed his chief confidence. Under pretence of examining a more convenient ground for drawing up the army, he gave spur to his horse, and joined the enemy, after he had been pursued and wounded by another of the rebel officers, who
- d
- e suspected his design. The desertion of two persons so considerable gave birth to a shoal of imitators; the royal camp was crowded with Pizarro's soldiers, all of whom declared they had seized the first opportunity of escaping and testifying their loyalty. The whole left wing of musqueteers, pretending to more fidelity than the rest, desired to be posted in such a manner as to obstruct the deserters, and embraced that opportunity of going over to the president. So uncommon a desertion rendered fighting unnecessary; the president therefore laid aside the design of giving battle, either because he had no great confidence in troops that had already betrayed their general, that he expected all Pizarro's forces to come over, or that he did not chuse to risque a battle with a handful of men now driven to despair, whose resistance might at least occasion considerable confusion of blood.

April 9, 1548. Pizarro deserted by his troops.

- f WITH Pizarro there now only remained the pike-men, who had likewise given symptoms of their inconstancy. Carvajal seeing the desperate state of the usurper's affairs, exerted his utmost diligence to retrieve them, but in vain; all the soldiers deserted, and left him almost alone with his general. The pike-men finding there was no possibility of eluding Carvajal's vigilance, threw down their arms, declared their resolution not to fight against the king, and then made off for the royal camp; upon which Pizarro resolved to surrender himself. He went up to Pedro Villavicencio, who commanded one of the enemy's out posts, and told him his name and intention, at the same time delivering his sword as a mark of his submission. Pedro, rejoiced at the importance of his prisoner, returned
- g
- Gonzalo* thanks for the honour done him, returned his sword, and offered to conduct him to the president's quarters; on their way to which Pizarro was met by Centeno, who con-doling with him on his change of fortune, was answered by the prisoner, “ Captain Centeno, a “ to-day there is nothing to be said upon this subject, but to-morrow you and the rest “ who have occasioned my fate will have reason to repent your conduct.” Even in his adversity he maintained his spirit and dignity. When brought into Gasca’s presence, he vindicated his measures with becoming boldness, claimed all that he aspired to as his undoubted right, hinted at the ingratitude of the court to his family, and the conquerors of Peru; but never dropped a disrespectful expression of his imperial majesty. His freedom, however, highly offended Gasca, who ordered him to be removed and taken into custody.

At the same time Carvajal was taken prisoner, as he was endeavouring, at the age of eighty-four, to make his escape by the swiftness of his horse, and used with great insolence and cruelty by the soldiers, who ought to have respected his advanced age, and extraordinary b military talents. They applied lighted matches to his neck, threw squibs in his face, and were severely punished for insulting the unfortunate, by the generous Centeno, the prisoner’s bitterest enemy, who, upon this occasion, displayed the greatest magnanimity. He conducted him in person to Gasca’s presence, where Carvajal maintained a contemptuous silence, and then brought him back to his own tent, where he treated this old warrior with the most profound respect and humanity. Nothing could be more extraordinary than the whole carriage of this hoary soldier, from the time of his imprisonment to his execution. He was visited by all degrees of people; some came from motives of curiosity, others to demand restitution of what they alledged his soldiers had plundered them of;
while others visited him merely to turn him into derision, and insult his misfortunes: but c Carvajal was superior to their dastardly triumph; he beheld them with scorn, and, by the severity of his replies, dismissed them in admiration of his wit and fortitude.

Both are executed.

NEXT day Gonzalo Pizarro, Carvajal, and other captains, were formally tried and condemned to be executed as traitors to their king and country. The sentence passed on the former was, that he should be beheaded, his head fixed in the most public place in the empire, his house demolished, the ground strewed with salt, and a pillar erected with the following inscription, “ These were the dwellings of the traitorous Pizarro.” He was carried by a mule to the place of execution; where he spoke to the soldiers and other spectators in these terms, “ Gentlemen, you are no strangers to the services performed by “ our family. My brothers and myself were the conquerors of this country. Many of d “ you are possessed of estates and lands confirmed to you by the marquiss and myself.
“ Many of you likewise owe me pecuniary and other obligations, which I need not specify.
“ For my part, I die poor and destitute; even the cloaths I wear are not mine, they are “ the perquisite of the executioner for his bloody service, and his reward for depriving “ me of life: I beseech you therefore, gentlemen, that you will shew the gratitude you “ owe me, to the Almighty, the author of all good things, that you will pray for my soul,
“ and shew that mercy to the spirit, which is denied to the flesh. I have strong assurances,
“ that, through the mediation of my Redeemer, and the intercession of your prayers, “ my sins shall be forgiven, and myself made a partaker in that felicity in heaven,
“ which I could never obtain on earth.” Saying this, he laid his head with great compo- e sure on the block, and the executioner severed it with one stroke from his body. His faults were forgot, and his virtues recited, when popularity could do him no farther service; and compassion soon turned the stream of violent hatred to respect and admiration of himself and family, who were considered only as the conquerors of Peru, and the authors of those immense riches which flowed in upon the Spaniards. As to Carvajal, he was executed in the same manner, and to the last gasp sustained that heroism which had distinguished his whole life. Garcilasso employs several pages in describing his behaviour and witty sayings in adversity; but as many of these favour of levity, we shall omit them in honour to his memory, and as unfit to be inserted in a general history: f

S E C T. XI.

Containing a Relation of the Rebellions of Sebastian Godinez and Giron, with other Transactions.

WHEN the chiefs of this rebellion were removed, and the due punishment was inflicted on the delinquents, the president began to make regulations for restoring the public tranquility, rewarding those who had assisted him in suppressing the rebellion, and making divisions of lands, with all possible regard to equity and expectation. On Valdivia he bestowed the government of Chili, which he before possessed without a formal commission. Others who had signally distinguished their valour and loyalty, were gratified with other preferments; and all had the thanks of the governor, and a promise to be rewarded as soon as opportunity offered. The point which gave the greatest uneasiness was the distribution of lands. It was impossible to answer the expectations of every man, who rated his services far beyond his merit; the following letter was calculated, therefore, to silence the murmurs of disappointment. In this the president declared the number of estates which he had already bestowed upon the faithful subjects of his majesty.

"I have," said he, "made repartition of an hundred and fifty commanderies, agreeable to the justest notions I could acquire of merit and long faithful services; and I shall, in the same manner, bestow whatever shall become vacant, during my government, upon the inhabitants of the country, taking special care that no interlopers shall run away with the rewards of your toil and blood. Those that are not now gratified, may depend on my favour. I beseech you, therefore, to consider not what you or I would wish to enjoy, but what I have in my power to bestow. I have omitted nothing to serve you, immense donations have been made, many more will fall to my lot to make; rest satisfied, therefore, in my gratitude, and believe that I am sensible it is the duty of a christian to repay obligations, and the interest of a governor to secure the affections of the people by acts of justice and liberality." The distribution of lands was then published in Cuzco, agreeable to the governor's appointment; and, to avoid importunity, he quitted the city, and retired to Guayana, where he waited to observe the effects it would produce. Estates, to the yearly value of 150,000 pistoles, were already given away; yet the large promises made to the officers and soldiers, who had just assisted to resist Pizarro, were not yet fulfilled. It was expected that the estates of Gonzalo and his officers would now be confiscated, and assigned to them who had always firmly adhered to the government; but as secret promises were made to those who should desert the usurper, it was found impracticable to gratify both parties. The one insisted on the promise of maintaining what they already possessed; the other was no less positive in being rewarded at the expence of those whose rebellion rendered their services needful. In consequence, murmurs and factions arose; which Gasca, with all his prudence, could not appease, because they were fomented by certain persons who meditated their own elevation on the ruins of their country.

lands, and consequent discontents.*

Of all the malcontents, the most bold and dangerous was Francisco Hernandez Giron, notwithstanding he enjoyed to the yearly value of ten thousand pieces of eight out of the estate of Gonzalo Pizarro. This he deemed a very inadequate reward of his services; and highly resented, that any other should have received a superior gratification. He spoke with disrespect of the president's candor and discernment in the most public manner; and was reprov'd for his seditious behaviour by the archbishop of Cuzco, which served rather to irritate than amend Giron. He now set out for Lima, in order, as he pretended, to avoid the seditious storm which he saw impended over Gasca's injudicious measures, and keep aloof from the solicitations of the soldiers and people to head their factions. This very apology was in itself of such dangerous tendency, that Giron was committed to prison; but afterwards released, upon his making submission, and promising to proceed directly to Lima, where Gasca now resided, to implore his pardon. Here he insinuated himself so far with Gasca, that he permitted him to levy forces in Lima and Cuzco, in order to reduce the province of Charcas, and suppress a band of robbers, who daily infested the kingdom of Peru, and rendered travelling upon the highways extremely dangerous. Some writers alledge, that the president was compelled to this measure, to gratify the ambition of a person whose influence he found very considerable among the discontented Spaniards; but certainly the remedy was inconsistent with his former caution and prudence.

The

The effects soon appeared; all the malcontents flocked immediately to the standard erected by Giron, and before he reached Cuzco his army was considerable; when he left it, it was formidable. He had published his commission to make new conquests with great solemnity; and was no sooner at the head of his army, than he artfully accused, in every conversation, the late measures of the president, which obliged some of the more moderate persons in the magistracy to signify to him the necessity of quitting the city. The soldiers behaved with the greatest insolence, and refused all submission to the civil power; affirming, that they acknowledged only the authority of their leader. When it was known that the magistrates had warned Giron of the necessity of leaving Cuzco, they assembled at his quarters in a tumultuous manner; and, on the other side, the citizens began to arm in their own defence. Just as matters were ripe for hostilities, both sides began to reflect on the consequences; and a treaty was concluded between the citizens and soldiers, whereby Giron consented to remove his forces, and deliver up six of the most insolent of his followers to be reprimanded.

Gasca resigns.

In this situation was Peru, when the president, perceiving that new troubles were raising, and the orders which he received from Spain to release all the Indians from bondage, would serve only to aggravate the evil, determined to resign his government, for which he had provided some months before, by desiring to be recalled. His petition was granted by the ministry, and Don Antonio de Mendoza appointed to govern in his room, with the title and ensigns of viceroy. This intention was no sooner known in Peru, than all the discontented drew up complaints to the administration against Gasca; who thought the most effectual method of eluding their clamors, would be to return with a large sum of money for the use of the necessitous Spanish government. For this purpose he enforced heavy taxes, fleeced the people without mercy; and having amassed the sum of three millions, he set sail for Panama, on the first notice that the new viceroy had touched the American coast. Here he made scarce any stay, setting out across the isthmus to Nombre de Dios, and ordering the treasure to be brought after, under a guard. At this time Pedro and Ferdinando de Centinos had taken arms, to revenge the injustice done them, in being dispossessed of the province of Veragua, subdued by their father, and granted to him and his posterity. This action they ascribed to Gasca forming the resolution to invade Peru before he quitted that government, and for this purpose seizing upon several ships in the South Sea, and assembling a body of forces. When they heard of the president's departure for Nombre de Dios, they fell upon Panama, took the city, and seized the royal treasure; with which not resting satisfied, they detached a party after Gasca to take him prisoner, and in the mean time lost all their booty. In the absence of this party, the inhabitants of Panama recovered from their consternation; and finding themselves more numerous than the rebels, took to arms, fell upon the rebels, drove them out of the town, and recovered all the treasure. The party sent after Gasca receiving intelligence of the misfortune of their associates, dispersed themselves; but many of them were taken and executed, together with the two Centenos, their leaders, who were hanged upon a gibbet of extraordinary height. Nothing could be more fortunate than this event, which suppressed, in embryo, a conspiracy that threatened the loss of all Peru and Terra Firma; for it was the scheme of the rebels, after they had made themselves masters of both sides the isthmus, to obstruct all relief from Old Spain, or the West Indies; to join the malcontents of Peru, whereby they might easily have reduced that kingdom, and possibly laid the foundation of a new and independent empire.

Insurrection at Panama; that city taken, and Gasca's treasure seized and again recovered.

As soon as Gasca retired to Panama, the judges published the second partition of lands which he had made; but deferred making known, for political reasons, before his departure. In their hands the administration was lodged till the arrival of Mendoza; they determined to make the full use of their short-lived power; they put in execution the new edict, which the president had prudently suppressed, with respect to releasing the Indians from personal service, and that rigid bondage in which they were held by the Spaniards. They required that the natives should no longer be compelled to work in the mines, to carry burdens, or do any laborious work; and insisted that their service should not only be voluntary, but that they should be paid a daily stated price. This edict, though undoubtedly humane and necessary, was, however, unseasonable at a juncture when the bulk of the Spaniards wanted only a specious pretext to rebel against the government. An insurrection immediately appeared in Cuzco; the disaffected immediately chose Giron for their leader, and augmented his numbers to so extraordinary a pitch, that the tumult was suppressed with the utmost difficulty. Giron being taken prisoner, was sent to receive judgment at Lima; but the judges knowing his popularity, and the universality of the discontents, would not presume to pass sentence, or even to call him to his trial. He was therefore a therefore dismissed, and rendered more insolent by this proof of their fear to correct him. The admiral Nonjosa appeared in his favour; and was supposed to foment these disorders, because the new regulations, with respect to the Indians, affected him deeply. His estate in the Charcas, where Potosi and the richest silver mines are, amounting to the annual sum of two hundred thousand crowns, would be reduced to half that value, were wages paid to the labourers. It was private interest, therefore, and not any other dislike to the edict, or the measures of the government, that stirred this officer up to faction and sedition. The rebellion of the Centeno's in Panama contributed to blow up the embers of discontent in different parts of Peru, and that country began again to groan under all the miseries of civil dissension. Although the intelligence of the defeat of the two brothers arrived b soon after the news of their being in arms, yet were the humours of the people in too great agitation to be appeased, except by evacuation. The soldiers boldly declared their sentiments of the weakness of the government, for which they had of late years been taught, by numberless insurrections, to entertain but little respect. They had chosen leaders out of their own number, Giron not having yet returned from Lima; and their outrageousness proceeded to so great a length, that the magistrates of Cuzco applied to the royal court, but could obtain no redress, the corregidor, Juan de Saavedra, being of opinion, that gentle means alone ought to be tried, where the effects of force were doubtful. Hence the disturbances rose daily to a greater height. Some were terrified with the apprehensions of the dreadful consequences of civil commotions; others wished for rebellion, c in hopes of gaining some private advantage from the public confusion. With this view they propagated false news, slandered the government, hinted that the principal persons in the kingdom encouraged the insurrection, and affirmed, that only the spirit of the people could prevent their being reduced to indigence and misery, by the various practices of the judges to raise taxes and tributes. Those who still remained well affected to the government, pressed the corregidor to exert himself with spirit, and make examples of some of the most seditious; but he excused himself, saying, that the sentence he had passed on Giron was reversed by the royal court, and an injury by that means done to his honour, and the prerogative of his office.

In this situation of affairs the viceroy Mendoza arrived at Lima, where he was received
d with great rejoicing, and extraordinary marks of esteem. The archbishop and magistrates endeavoured to prevail on him to make a triumphal entry under a canopy of state; but this he constantly refused. His bad state of health preventing his visiting the different cities of his government, he charged his son, don Francisco, with that business; who accordingly set out for Cuzco, to examine into the discontents which prevailed in that city, and proceed from thence to Charcas, and the more distant provinces. By his vigilance, and the activity of the magistrates, the tumult was at that time suppressed, and Peru delivered from one of the greatest dangers which had threatened it since the establishment of the Spanish government. After this he set out for Charcas, where he examined every thing with the most curious eye, took plans of the towns, made draughts of the mines of e Potosi, in which all the silver mines were accurately delineated, established several necessary regulations in the different provinces, formed an exact estimate of the revenue deducible from the new conquest, and returned to his father at Lima, with an account of his progress and transactions. Thence he was dispatched in the month of May 1552, with all his draughts and plans, to give a relation to his imperial majesty of the present state of Peru; and soon after his absence the viceroy died, exceedingly regretted by all who regarded the interest of their country, and knew the value of a moderate, wise, and honest governor. By this unfortunate accident, the government devolved on the judges of the royal court; who no sooner were in possession of power, than they revived the decree for f releasing the Indians from personal service, which was rather suspended than abolished during the late administration. However unpopular this regulation appeared, the judges always endeavoured to enforce it, as often as the administration came into their hands. They now required the execution with unusual rigor; which raised a ferment in all the provinces, especially in Charcas, where the service of the Indians was indispensable. To pay them would greatly diminish the profits of the proprietors of land, and private interest affected them more nearly than any impulse of humanity. Crowds of discontented Spanish inhabitants, and disbanded soldiers, assembled, upon a supposition they would receive countenance from the governor Nonjosa, who they imagined intended to act independently, and claim the power formerly usurped by Gonzalo Pizarro. There were some reasons for this opinion, founded upon certain dubious expressions which he had dropt at Lima; but Nonjosa's ambition being now gratified by the government of Charcas, where he possessed an immense estate, he altered his sentiments, and determined to support the government, agreeable to the duty of his employment, without risking so large a fortune in pursuit of dangerous ideal projects. The malcontents soon discovered they would be disappointed in their sanguine expectations from the governor; they resolved, therefore, to turn their plot into another channel, and execute their schemes without his assistance. To obviate any difficulties he might throw in their way, it was agreed to put him to death, and set up Don Sebastian de Castilla, the most popular person in the province, for their commander. The malcontents spoke publicly of their designs; but Nonojosa obstinately refused to listen to the informations daily lodged, of a conspiracy against his life. His friends exhorted him to provide for his security; but Nonojosa could not persuade himself that soldiers, among whom he was so popular, and who had hitherto appeared devoted to his service, could so suddenly alter their affections, as to assassinate the leader they had lately adored. His temper was open and unsuspicious, and this deluded him into a fatal carelessness; or perhaps he thought, like Julius Cæsar, that it was better to die once, than live in perpetual terror; and that when a man was deserted by his friends, life was of no longer value. Certain it is, that he never provided guards, or in the least altered his former conduct with respect to himself, tho' he was extremely industrious in what regarded the public. The conspirators went on without interruption, and entered Nonojosa's palace without resistance, rushed into his chamber, and loaded him with wounds^a; after which they run into the streets, called out that the tyrant was dead, and wished long life to the king, to testify they were enemies only to the governors of the country, and not traitors to their sovereign.

HAVING finished this important business, the conspirators fell upon some of the principal citizens, whom they massacred, then plundering their houses, and committing the most shocking barbarities. The success which attended their measures rendered them fearless; by beat of drum they assembled all the inhabitants in the market-place, proclaimed their leader Don Sebastian governor, and chief justice of the province, appointed officers both civil and military, and disguised their treason under the thin varnish of doing every thing for the public good, and in the name of the sovereign. In a few days they gained possession of the town and mines of Potosi, where they found near two millions of pieces of eight, the property of the king, of the late governor, or of private persons. They also detached a party to seize upon Vera Paz, and murder the marshal Alvarado, who commanded in that city; but before their scheme was accomplished, fortune took a sudden turn, and divided the conspirators against themselves. Part of Nonojosa's soldiers began to reflect on the consequences of such violent proceedings, and even to repent of the murder of their general; a horrible action, which they resolved to expiate by shedding the blood of Don Sebastian, to whose ambition they now ascribed their own villainy. They were besides in hopes, that this action would prove so acceptable to the government, as to cancel all their former offences. They set about their bloody work, therefore, with the utmost confidence; chose Basco Godinez for their leader, and assassinated the general whom they had so lately proclaimed with much ostentation, appointing Godinez to all his employments.

A MILITARY government now prevailed in this part of the empire. The soldiers massacred and set up leaders at pleasure, imitating the example of the Romans towards the decline of the constitution, when the same person was invested with the purple, and torn in pieces by the mob in the space of a week; now the idol of the army, next day their detestation; just as fancy, caprice, ambition, and interest happened to prevail. Godinez obliged the magistrates to give sanction to the appointment of the soldiers, and confirm him not only in the dignity of general, but chief justice of the province of Charcas. By virtue of this authority, he acted with uncontrouled power; put all to death who were the objects of his resentment, or jealousy; caused several of the conspirators, engaged in the murder of Nonojosa, to be executed; and put on the appearance of extraordinary zeal for the king's service, as if he had been forced into the rebellion, and thrust into those employments, which he held with no other view than serving his imperial majesty. Even his intimate acquaintance, his accomplices in the death of Sebastian, and dearest friends, felt the rod of power, and were assassinated, to prevent their discovering his complicated treasons, and disappointing him of those rewards which he expected for his vigilance in behalf of the government. He seized upon the estate of Don Sebastian, feared lest his accomplices might demand a share, and expected the government would confirm this usurpation, in consideration of the service he had performed in removing that tyrant and traitor. The inability of the royal court to cope with Godinez in the field, obliged the a judges to have recourse to artifice, and seize the usurper by his own machinations. Pretending that they were convinced of his services, in taking off the rebellious Sebastian, and declaring for the king, they caused it to be signified to him, that they designed constituting him general of their forces, and assigning him a large estate in the province, which his public spirit had rescued from destruction; advising him to unite his forces with the marshal Alvarado, in order strenuously to subdue the rebels, and suppress the intrigues of the discontented. When they had sufficiently deceived him, they privately appointed Alvarado governor of Charcas, ordering him to march with all his forces into the province, and surprize Godinez, who expected him as an auxiliary. Every thing succeeded to their wish; the deluded Godinez received Alvarado as his friend, and was seized, condemned, and executed, with most of his officers. As he was led to the place of execution, the following proclamation was made by the hangman: "This man, for treason to his God, his king and his country, is condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered."

Godinez executed.

So many persons were involved in the rebellion of Godinez, that scarce a day passed without the dreadful spectacle of men executed, and severed limb from limb. The justices enforced the laws with more regard to justice than policy and prudence. This severity raised many enemies to the government, and gave birth to the revolt of Cuzco, headed by Francisco Hernandez Giron, which put a stop to executions, and obliged the royal court to apply their whole attention to the means of suppressing so dangerous an insurrection. The Indians prognosticated the consequences of such rigorous punishments, and openly declared their apprehensions that another rebellion would rise out of the ruins of the former, and real cause of disaffection be given by the excessive severity of the judges. Every corner of Peru was filled with discontents, and resounded with clamours, of the cruel proceedings against the rebels. No man thought himself secure, because the same laws by which the accomplices of Sebastian and Godinez were punished, might be extended to all who had served under Gonzalo Pizarro, or been engaged in the factions of Almagro, and the marquis Pizarro. The two last rebellions had been formed by the principal citizens of Cuzco, who possessed large shares in the mines of Potosi, now lying unwrought on account of the new edict, which required that no compulsion should be used with the Indians. They resented the strict obedience required to this law, the violent proceedings against the rebels, and also feared, lest, in course of the processes and punishments every day set on foot, their own secret practices might be discovered. To anticipate the event they dreaded, fourscore citizens drew up a petition to the governor, requesting that the edict might be recalled, and a stop put to those violent criminal processes, which were seen with horror by every man who felt for humanity: When this petition was presented, the governor perused it, and then tore it in pieces with indignation; which gave so much offence to the persons concerned, that they immediately laid the foundation of a general revolt. They engaged Giron in their schemes; and he soon became the most active, and, indeed, the leading person of the conspiracy. He had, for some time, watched the opportunity of gratifying an insatiable ambition, not at all impaired by repeated disappointment, and waited, before he declared himself, the issue of the revolt in the province of Charcas. Informed that Alvarado maintained a correspondence with Ramirez, the governor of Cuzco, and was concerting measures for destroying him and his friends, he resolved to anticipate their designs, and break out into open rebellion. For this purpose Giron assembled his friends, acquainted them with the danger, revealed all the intelligence he received concerning the schemes carried on by Alvarado and Ramirez, aggravated every circumstance, and affirmed that Alvarado's design was to strike at Cuzco, the root of all the evils of which he complained, as soon as he had lopped off the branches of Charcas. He exhorted them, therefore, to enter upon vigorous measures for their own preservation, and not tamely suffer unjust punishments like their friends in Charcas, under colour of law. The cause was general to all the Spanish planters; all were interested in opposing an edict which rendered their mines useless, and their estates a mere incumbrance, if they were deprived of the services of the Indians; and he assured them, they would soon be joined by great numbers as soon as it was known they had taken up arms to redress a grievance so general and important.

Giron's rebellion, its origin.

This assembly consisted chiefly of citizens, who were proprietors of mines or estates, or of soldiers of desperate fortune, whose only resource was in some new disturbance, was not difficult of belief; little persuasion was necessary to engage them to what they were before disposed. They closed with Giron's proposal, and offered their services in executing any plan for the preservation of liberty, which he should think fit to offer. A happy occasion now presented itself for putting their desperate schemes in practice. The daughter ter of a rich Spaniard was to be married at Cuzco, on the 15th day of November, and the nuptials were to be celebrated with great magnificence. The crouds flocking to this exhibition would render easy their project to seize on the governor and principal magistrates, who were invited to the wedding. When the day came, Giron, with twelve of the most desperate of the conspirators, rushed into the bridegroom's house, while the company were at supper. Observing some of them were making off, he desired they would fear nothing, for they were all engaged in the same measures; upon which he seized upon the governor and magistrates, killing two of three of the number who offered to make resistance, and suffering the rest of the company to go away unmolested. This gave suspicion that all were concerned; and it was a refined stroke of policy in Giron, who, by this means, drew to his party several persons, before ignorant of the plot, who thought their being suspected would be equally punishable with the actual commission of the crime. They joined in, therefore, with Giron, hoping to increase the conspirators to such a number, as would be able to subvert the government; and, by getting the laws into their own hands, obviate the punishments inflicted on rebellion, and even the suspicion of disloyalty.

When Giron accomplished his designs on the governor and magistrates, he committed them to prison, and then joined his party drawn up in the market-place, making proclamation for all the friends of liberty to assemble in arms. He then seized upon the royal treasure and the arsenal, beat up for recruits in the most public manner, and declared that all he had undertaken was for the service of his king and country. He complained, that all remonstrances made to the royal court were contemptuously rejected, and that nothing remained but to seize upon the supreme authority, until the situation of affairs could be properly presented to his catholic majesty. When he had assembled a considerable force, he required of the magistrates to constitute him chief justice; and such was his influence, or their pusillanimity, that his demand met with no refusal. The magistrates nominated him not only chief justice, but captain-general; and several other towns congratulated him on his elevation, and offered to support him in his measures with all their power.

ADVICE of this revolt no sooner reached the royal court, than orders were issued immediately to suspend the execution of the new ordinance, to which they chiefly attributed the commotion. At the same time Alvarado was constituted general of the forces in the southern provinces, who were ordered to march towards Cuzco; and a resolution was taken to assemble an army in the neighbourhood of Lima, which was to join that of Alvarado. To prevent those who dreaded punishment for being engaged in the late rebellion, from throwing themselves into the arms of the malcontents, pardon was proclaimed to all who had fought under the ensigns of Pizarro, Sebastian, and Godinez, provided they would immediately enlist in the royal army, and serve against the enemies of their king and country; but by this time Giron was so strong, that he marched to Rachabamac, on his way to Lima, to give battle to the royalists. Here he received intelligence that the enemy was approaching, and was making preparations to bring matters to a speedy issue, when the desertion in his army constrained him to retire to a greater distance. In his retreat he was pursued by Paolo de Meneses, who had orders to harass his rear with a considerable detachment; but this officer was drawn into a snare, and defeated with great loss, before the main body of the royal army could come to his relief.

THIS victory was no way decisive; but it was of the utmost consequence to Giron, giving him not only leisure to augment his army, but enabling him to put a stop to the desertion, by infusing new spirits into his soldiers. He formed a complete regiment of well disciplined negroes, besides a number of Spaniards, who embraced his cause, the moment it appeared that fortune declared herself in his favour, although they were ready to join the opposite party. With this force he advanced to the plains of Nasca, on the sea-coast, about threescore leagues to the northward of Lima; while Alvarado, having assembled a thousand Spaniards, and ten thousand Indians, began his march from Charcas, and took possession of Cuzco, for the king, in the absence of Giron. Here, being joined by several detachments, he thought himself in a condition to cope with the rebels; he set out in quest of Giron, who then seemed to despise the enemy. Flushed with their late victory, so easily obtained, they imagined every thing must yield to them; but Giron judged otherwise, recommended caution as well as valour, and bid them fight as men whose future happiness depended on their courage, and who had their fortunes to shape with their swords. He assured them, that, besides a numerous body of Indians, there were a thousand well-disciplined Spaniards, veterans inured to fatigue and action, advancing against them from Lima, besides the still more powerful forces marching from Cuzco, under the conduct

- a conduct of Alvarado: "However, added he, if I had but four hundred men, on whose " fidelity I could depend, I should make no doubt of victory; since the battle is not to " the strong and numerous, but to the unanimous and valiant, to them who obey their " general, and not to those who each of them aspire at commanding." When he had taken off the rash confidence of his soldiers, without damping their spirits, or blunt-ing the edge of their courage, he marched and took possession of an advantageous post near Chuguinca, on the road the enemy must pass, wishing for nothing more than to be attacked, in this situation, by the royalists. Rocks, woods, and precipices, made his army inaccessible on every side; but Giron artfully concealed the strength of the post, the more readily to seduce Alvarado into an engagement: however, the stratagem failed, Alva-
 b rado knew the ground, and surrounded it with intention to cut off all supplies of provision from the rebels, and reduce them to the necessity of engaging on less advantageous terms, or surrendering at discretion to avoid being famished. This measure was conducted with so much address, that Giron's troops were soon brought to great extremity, of which Alvarado received notice by an officer who deserted to him, and gave him further information, that the rebels intended to decamp in the night, and force their way through his lines. The deserter further alledged, that Giron's camp might easily be forced, as all his troops were discontented with the hardships they suffered, and so sickly as scarce to be able to bear arms; upon which Alvarado, changing his resolution, gave orders to prepare for an attack. This was precisely what Giron wished for. He drew up his men to receive c the enemy, and animated them with the certain prospect of victory, and a speedy issue to their sufferings. There were only two accessible posts in his camp, and for their defence he chose those soldiers in whom he had the greatest confidence. Here the assault began.
 In one place the royalists were obliged to cross a river, up to the neck; and, in another, to march along a defile encumbered with rocks and bushes, and so narrow, that scarce three men could walk a-breast. They were cut off as fast as they advanced, by repeated well directed discharges of fire-arms. The cannon made dreadful havoc; yet the marshal persevered, leading his men on to successive assaults, and renewing the charge with such obstinacy, that had not a panic seized the soldiers, the whole army must have infallibly perished. Already two-thirds of his men were killed or taken prisoners; and Al- d varado, in despair, was marching up with the last division, when the soldiers, perceiving the fate of their companions, and the dreadful carnage made by the rebel artillery, turned their backs, fled with great precipitation, and carried off Alvarado in the croud of fugitives, in despite of his utmost endeavours rather to perish than survive the shame of his disgrace. Above four hundred and fifty of the royalists were killed or taken; while this important victory cost Giron no more than seventeen of his soldiers, who were soon replaced by the prisoners, who enlisted themselves, and embraced the side for which fortune seemed to declare. The booty was immense, and exceeding any thing ever before seen even in that rich country. The richest planters in Peru served in Alvarado's army, and had arms and equipages suitable to their wealth and overgrown fortunes. Every thing was e adorned with gold, silver, and precious stones; the horse furniture and arms were particularly splendid; and so certain were they of victory, that some preparations had actually been made for a magnificent triumphal entry into Lima.

THE confusion occasioned by this defeat among the royalists would have given the enemy
 the greatest advantages, had Giron known as well how to pursue as to gain a victory.
 Many insisted that the marshal was betrayed, without which he could not possibly have been defeated; and so far had this opinion prevailed, that suspicion fell upon particular persons. The judges met in council to pass judgment on the supposed criminals; and they were just preparing to consign to capital punishment the justice Santillon, when letters f arrived from Alvarado, and his officers, which fully cleared that gentleman, by reciting the real causes of this misfortune. The marshal laid the blame on the disobedience of his soldiers; but his officers charged him with rashness, and injudiciously attacking the enemy in an impregnable situation, when he might have forced them to surrender without shedding a drop of blood. Lorenzo de Aldena even ventures to reflect on his courage; for he adds at the close of his letter, "They say the marshal is wounded, but I am sure it was " neither with fighting, or giving encouragement to his soldiers." Whereas the enemy, and almost all the rest of his own officers, do him ample justice in this respect, and affirm, that the impetuosity of his courage must have occasioned the entire destruction of his sol-g diers, but for the reasons we have mentioned. Nothing was wanting to complete Giron's success, but to improve the advantage he obtained by his valour, and pursue the enemy with vigour, while they were disheartened and divided. The bench of judges fell into warm disputes, whether they ought to accompany the army, to give the general more authority, and prevent the murmurings of the soldiers? And this affair was warmly debated in the town-house of Lima, while the army ought to be employed in the field, to prevent such consequences as might naturally have been expected from a defeat. Happily for the royalists, Giron remained five or six weeks inactive in his impregnable camp; contenting himself with sending detachments to Cuzco, Arequipa, La Paz, and other cities, to plunder and despoil without limitation or restriction. Endeavours at the same time were used to augment the army, which, by means of the prisoners that inlisted, and the volunteers that every day flocked to Giron's victorious banners, soon increased to a thousand Spaniards, exclusive of the detachments, Indians and Negroes. To complete his train of artillery, which was much inferior to that of the enemy, he ordered the great bells of Cuzco to be cast into cannon, and inscribed with the motto, "Liberty;" the cant term used by all seditious persons to conceal ambition, and disguise rebellion against their king and country. The royalists made a proper use of this circumstance; they exclaimed against it as a piece of impiety and sacrilege, which the Almighty would not fail to punish. The citizens of Cuzco echoed the cry, because they resented the cruel pillage made by Giron's detachment, which had entirely alienated their minds from his interest.

WRETCHED was the condition of both parties; Spaniards and Indians were equally sufferers by these dreadful civil wars and frequent rebellions. It was but lately that the royalists were shedding the blood of their countrymen by the legal forms of courts, and plundering and massacring the adherents of Giron, who now retaliated the injury with a vengeance on the heads of all those who had declared themselves enemies to his cause, or even kept aloof with design of joining the stronger side. Many citizens in Cuzco were not only stripped of their estates, but deprived of their lives. Scarce a house escaped the fury of the soldiers, and the citizens were no less incensed at Giron's avarice than the clergy at his sacrilege. Both united against him, and composed so formidable a body, that he was forced to send for his wife and children, not chusing to trust his family in a city which had now openly declared its enmity. All this we may ascribe to Giron's own imprudence, for he might easily have secured the friendship of the capital, could he only have moderated his revenge and avarice. The inhabitants of Cuzco favoured his cause, were enemies to the new edict, and strongly prejudiced against the judges for the severe punishments inflicted on all who opposed its establishment; but now they perceived that Giron's aim was not to defend the property and rights of the Spaniards, but to acquire the power of plundering and executing his countrymen with impunity. It was this change in the sentiments of the citizens, which determined Giron to march to the pleasant vale of Yuca, where he refreshed his troops, and gave himself up to rural sports, until advice arrived that the royalists augmented to two thousand men, were marching directly to Cuzco, with a fine train of artillery, and numerous army of confederate Indians. He then retired to a strong pass, about forty leagues south of the capital, where he posted his army in such a manner as rendered an attack extremely dangerous, if not impracticable. This was the peculiar province of Giron; no general was ever more judicious or fortunate in the choice of ground for encampments. His wings and front were inaccessible by rivers, woods, rocks, or morasses, and behind he was secured by a deep rapid stream, which, however, did not obstruct his communication with the adjacent country. Besides, he commanded the province of Charcas by this pass, and thereby rendered himself absolutely master of the treasures of Potosi. His troops were not only regularly paid, but such a fund was laid up as might enable him to prosecute the war for a series of years, were money the only requisite.

Is pursued by the royal army.

MEAN time the royal army passed the rivers Amencay and Aperimac, in their way to Cuzco, and met with considerable resistance from parties detached by Giron to dispute their passage. The artillery was carried with great labour, and employed no less than ten thousand Indians, every piece of cannon being fixed to a long beam, longitudinally supported by transverse beams laid upon the shoulders of the natives. In this manner the royalists arrived within a few leagues of Cuzco, when they received the unfortunate news, that a detachment of their forces, under Gomez da Solis, was defeated at Arequipa by Piedrabita; immediately they pursued their march to Pacava, the strong post in which Giron was encamped. Giron was in hopes the enemy's superiority in numbers would prompt them to attack him as they had done at Chuquenca; but they prudently resisted all the baits he threw out, and plainly evinced that they were grown wiser by experience. They encamped within sight of the rebels, in an open plain, where the cavalry might act with freedom, and maintained perpetual skirmishes, in which it was observable the enemy had generally the advantage; notwithstanding Garcilasso affirms their artillery was of no use, "Providence forbidding that the sacred metal, of which the churches were despoiled, should be employed in the destruction of mankind." For several days the two armies watched each other, without any attempts on either side to come to a general engagement; however, Giron was at length

- a length encouraged to attack the royalists by the constant superiority he had in skirmishing, and certain reports that the caution of the judges proceeded from their apprehensions with respect to the fidelity of their soldiers. It was, besides, rumoured, that the enemy were in great want of powder, matches, and all kinds of ammunition; and this report, tho' artfully propagated by the judges, was so easily credited by Giron, that he laid aside his usual caution, and resolved to act offensively. He called a council of his officers, in which it was resolved to make an assault in the night, upon a certain quarter of the enemy's camp. His officers had in a manner been forced into a concession by the earnestness with which he urged the proposal; for it was the unanimous opinion, that he should hold himself close in his quarters, maintain all the advantages of his situation, and thereby compel
- b the enemy to decamp for want of necessaries, or fight at a great disadvantage. In compliance, however, to him, they submitted, and Giron regarded their obedience as a proof of their being convinced by the force of his arguments, which served to confirm him the more in his resolution. Accordingly a muster of his army was made in the evening, whence it appeared that several had deserted, and probably apprised the royalists of his intention. Yet could not this unfortunate circumstance divert his resolution; on the contrary, fearing lest the desertion might continue, and thinking it probable that the enemy would soon be reinforced, he hastened to put his project in execution, and concerted his plan with so much prudence and ability as merited success. About two o'clock in the morning, when the moon was down, he sallied out of his camp at the head of six hundred musqueteers, two hundred pikemen, a regiment of negroes, and about thirty horse.
- c' The black regiment had orders to advance with all possible silence to the front of the enemy, and there to make a diversion; while, with the bulk of his army, he fell upon the rear. That his men should be able to distinguish each other in the dark, they were clothed in white; and had, besides, a word of battle, to prevent confusion, and enable them to rally, in case they should happen to fall in disorder: every thing was executed with the utmost punctuality; but the enemy had entirely altered their position upon the intelligence of the deserters, and marching out of the intrenchments, drew up in order of battle on the plain, planting their artillery in such a manner as to take the assailants in flank, according to the advices they heard of their intended disposition. The negroe regiment, meeting with no resistance on the front, entered the camp, killed several Indians and mules, and were returning in astonishment at what had become of the enemy, when they were saluted by a volley of grape-shot, poured from the mouths of eleven pieces of cannon, which almost cut off the whole corps. Giron, at this time, was firing with great fury upon the rear of the enemy's camp; when, to his great surprize, a shower of bullets came upon him from another quarter, which gave him the first notice of his disappointment, and determined him to make the best retreat in his power, although he sustained but little damage. Yet he could not prevent two hundred of his men from deserting him, notwithstanding his disposition was so good that he regained his camp without any loss from the enemy. The conduct of the justices was no less admirable. When they
- d observed the rebels retiring, an attempt was made to pursue, lest Giron might face about, and by this sudden motion alarm the troops, as if they had been drawn into an ambuscade. Every man was ordered to keep within the works, on pain of death, and the pursuit wholly entrusted to a detachment of horse, that made some unsuccessful attacks on the enemy's rear.

Is repulsed,

and deserted.

- Such was the issue of the battle of Pucera, in which not above twenty men were slain on both sides, unless we except the loss sustained by the negroe regiment, of which the Spaniards never made any account, regarding the death of a slave and of a brute, in much the same light. Giron found himself still in a condition to maintain his post against all the power of the royalists. The three following days he kept the judges in perpetual alarm, obliging them every night to draw up in battalia. Next day he drew out his army, as if to decide matters by an equal battle in the open field, or rather to draw the enemy on to attack him in his strong situation; but this motion was attended with a consequence very unfortunate to him, by furnishing Vasquez, with twelve more officers, in whom Giron had great confidence, with an opportunity of deserting. Vasquez had brought with him a silver helmet belonging to the lieutenant-general Piedrabita, in token of his resolution to come over to the judges, as soon as a fair occasion offered. The intelligence was extremely acceptable to the judges, who, till now, entertained only faint hopes of reducing Giron with his handful of soldiers; they, therefore, issued immediate orders for the troops to keep within their quarters, and avoid skirmishing, only sending out parties to facilitate the
- f desertion.

- g GIRON was confounded with the infidelity of Vasquez; still, however, he did not despair. He endeavoured, by the most soothing and animating expressions, to secure the affections affections, and sustain the spirits of his soldiers. To prevent their being affected with the departure of the treacherous Vasquez, he laid before them the reasons that induced him to enter upon the enterprize, which was nothing less than the defence of their rights, properties, and lives, and acquainted them with what they must expect, if they followed the example of their perfidious companions. “ Be not troubled, said he, for the loss of Vasquez; he is but a man, and we can do without his assistance. Let me dissuade you from trusting to the pardon which he imagines he has secured by his treachery. No enemy ever yet rewarded a traitor, or encouraged him longer than while he was necessary to their purposes. You may rest satisfied, that, however they may care for Vasquez for the present, his life will be the price of his treachery, the moment I am subdued, and that he at present owes his safety to our resistance, and not to their esteem or regard. I have no value for my own life, but as it may contribute to your safety; for I am confident of the punishment in wait for all those who trust to the promises of the judges, who will make no scruple of hanging up a deserter with his pardon about his neck. It is valour alone that can place you beyond the power of our enemies, and secure you against an ignominious death. Our situation is by no means desperate; if we are unanimous, we shall still be victorious; at least we still have this satisfaction, that we die with our swords in our hands, in the defence of freedom, and have escaped that ignominious punishment due to the credulity and perfidy of our associates.”

A RAY of hope seemed to dart into the soul of Giron from the effect this speech produced on his soldiers. Every sentence was echoed with applause; but scarce had the day passed before a third of the whole number deserted. This threw him into despair; he every moment expected to be betrayed into the hands of his enemies, and could devise no other means of warding off the danger, than by taking refuge in the mountains; which resolution he put in practice the same night, without communicating his design to one individual, leaving the few remaining troops to shift for themselves. Giron's flight was no sooner known in his camp, than Alvarado, who acted in quality of lieutenant-general, went in search of him, with a hundred men devoted to his service; but taking a different rout, were all surprised and taken by one of the king's generals, detached by the judges in pursuit of the rebels, of whose flight they were informed by several deserters. Nine of the principal officers were executed on the spot, and the rest of the prisoners sent to Cuzco under a strong guard, there to receive, agreeable to legal forms, the punishment due to their crimes. Another of the rebel generals had the good fortune to go over to the royal army, with great part of the forces, before Giron's flight was known, and for some time enjoyed the benefit of the pardon that was published; but he was hanged up afterwards for this rebellion, by order of the next viceroy, who paid no regard to the pardon granted by the judges. As for the unhappy Giron, he wandered alone for several days through pathless, desert mountains, hiding himself in woods and caverns. At last he was discovered by some of his faithful soldiers, who resolved to participate in his misfortunes. They comforted each other for some days in their affliction, and then fell into the hands laid by their enemies. Giron was taken prisoner, sent to Lima, and publicly executed, his head being fixed up over those of Gonzalo Pizarro, and Francisco Carvajal. Thus ended the rebellion and life of Francisco Hernandez Giron, who had distinguished himself by actions truly glorious, had they been performed in the service of his king and country.

ON the arrival of the marquis Canneta, who was appointed by Philip II. to succeed Mendoza, most of the rebel officers, even those who had deserted before their affairs became desperate, were executed. The viceroy made his public entry into Lima, in the month of July 1557, and was received with all the respect due to his exalted dignity and high quality. Immediately he placed guards on all the roads leading to the great cities, with orders strictly to examine all passengers, and seize any papers found upon them, the better to discover the plots and conspiracies which might be in agitation. Even Spaniards were required to make use of passports in travelling from one town or province to another. All the cannon, small arms, and ammunition, in the different cities, were carefully collected, and lodged in magazines and arsenals, to be opened only with leave from the viceroy, and every possible step was taken to suppress any forming rebellions, and extinguish the latent sparks of the late conspiracy. Several of the principal officers engaged in the revolts of Pizarro, Sebastian, Godinez, and now of Giron, were banished, and their estates confiscated, or sent into the galleys. All the commissions granted by the judges were revoked, and new appointments made. To silence at one stroke all murmurs against these arbitrary proceedings, he ordered several persons, who had expressed their disapprobation of his measures, to be seized and sent to Spain, under pretence of recommending them to the king for rewards which he could not bestow. These were the steps taken by the new viceroy

- a to enforce obedience to the laws, and impress a favourable opinion of the vigour of his administration. Hitherto only the Spaniards were considered as objects of his policy; he now turned his attention towards the natives, and laboured to attach them to the government by acts of mildness and liberality. His first endeavour was to prevail on Sayri Tapac, a prince the nearest in blood to the late inca Manco Capac, and regarded by the Indians as the legitimate sovereign of the empire, to quit the woods and mountains in which he concealed himself, accept of the friendly offers of the Spaniards, and a yearly appointment sufficient to maintain the splendor of his exalted rank and quality. To render the negotiation less difficult, he applied to Donna Beatriz Corja, aunt to the young prince, to use her influence with his guardians, and assure them that no deceit was intended, the proposal resulting entirely from the viceroy's sincere desire of seeing Spaniards and Indians united in the strongest bonds of amity, and all enjoying equal happiness under his government. Accordingly this lady dispatched a messenger of the blood-royal to the mountains of Vilca Pompa, where the court resided. After encountering manifold difficulties, the messenger was admitted into the presence of the prince, his guardians, counsellors, and captains, who directed his affairs during his minority, and the viceroy's proposal was taken into consideration. Though it was brought by a kinsman from a lady, whom they knew to be strongly attached to the royal family; yet they could not help suspecting the sincerity of the Spaniards, and regarding the overture as a stratagem to get the young prince into their hands, possibly to treat him in the same manner they had done the inca Atabualapa. That no precaution might be omitted, this little fugitive court dispatched an express to Cuzco, with instructions to sound the real sentiments of the Spaniards, and examine narrowly whether they had not deluded Donna Beatriz by specious appearances. As these mutual embassies took up more time than the viceroy expected, he grew impatient; and thinking to accelerate matters, he charged a friar, who had gained some reputation as a politician, with a commission immediately to the prince; but so cautious were the Indians, that they seized all the passes, and forbid the friar access to the court. However, Donna Beatriz at last finished the business, by going in person to the mountains of Vilca Pompa, presenting the prince with certain proofs of the sincerity of the Spaniards, and demonstrating that the proposals made by the marquis were perfectly consistent with policy, and that rule of administration which he adopted, of uniting the Indians and Spaniards in one common interest. After warm debates in the council, the proposal was at length accepted, and an instrument made out, whereby the inca consented to quit the mountains, and live among the Spaniards, in consideration of the annual revenue of seventeen thousand pieces of eight; to secure the payment of which the estate of Francisco Hernandez, part of the valley of Yuy, together with lands and Indians in the jurisdiction of Cuzco, were settled upon him for life, and during his peaceable conduct. He, besides, enjoyed the title of lord of the valley of Yuy; a poor equivalent for his empire, which he, however, willingly accepted, as soon as he was made sensible that the viceroy was serious in the offer. Garcilasso, indeed, alledges, that when the instrument was presented to him in gilt paper by the archbishop, he took up the fringed velvet covering upon the table, and folding a corner of it in his hands, exclaimed, "All this table and fringe formerly belonged to me; but now the Spaniards repay me with a single thread for the support of my dignity, my household, friends, and family."

One of the inca princes prevailed on to accept a pension.

- The reconciling the inca to the Spanish government was certainly a masterly stroke; but the marquis Canneta punished those who had ever appeared in arms against the king with so much rigour, that he raised a great number of enemies to his administration. Complaints were daily pouring in upon the ministry of king Philip, which rendered it necessary to appoint a new viceroy, as the only means of appeasing the murmurs. Accordingly Don Diego Azevado was nominated to that quality; but he dying on his voyage, the government devolved on the Conde de Nueva; and he again was in a little time succeeded by Don Francisco de Toledo, under whom the persecution of the royal blood of the incas was revived. It was now discovered that Sayri Tapac had an elder brother, the grandson of Manco Capac, who also kept his court in the mountains, in order to avoid the slavish bondage imposed on the rest of the Indians. The title to sovereignty, it would appear, was disputed by the friends of the young princes, and each of them maintained a little court, which just served to remind them of their birth-right. By this time Sayri Tapac was dead; and indeed removed, as some imagine, by poison, to ease the Spanish government of the load of his maintenance; so that Tapac Amaru had an undisputed claim to the throne of his ancestors. The viceroy was desirous of drawing this prince from his retirement, either upon the same principle with his predecessor the marquis Canneta, or to prevent the disturbances which might possibly arise from his pretensions. With this intention he sent messengers to him, and offered to support his royal dignity with the same revenue settled upon his brother, if he would consent like him to live among the Spaniards,^a and acknowledge the sovereignty of the catholic king. The proposal met with many difficulties, either upon account of the suspicions entertained of the viceroy's real intention, or the reports propagated of the violent death of the prince's brother. His friends strongly admonished him to continue rather in his present retirement, where he enjoyed freedom and independency; till a proper opportunity offered of asserting his right, than to trust his life and liberty in the hands of such perfidious allies, whose generosity was only a masque to their ambition and avarice. This advice the prince followed, and returned a suitable answer to the viceroy's message; upon which a council was held at Lima, to deliberate upon the means of reducing the inca to the terms required. The result was, that as the prince refused to accept the equitable conditions offered him, he should be regarded^b as an enemy, and compelled into such measures as were necessary for the security of the Spaniards. It was added, as an additional reason for taking up arms, that he had posted himself in such a manner, as to obstruct all intercourse between Cuzco, Humanca, and Rimac, on the roads to which his Indian subjects pillaged and robbed all the Spanish travellers. What truth there might be in this allegation, we cannot positively determine; certain we are, that the grievance was never mentioned before the Spaniards found it their interest to quarrel with the inca; and the truth is rendered very suspicious by the following argument, which was urged in council for coming to hostilities; namely, that insurrections might be raised in this empire by the claimant to the imperial dignity, countenanced and supported both by Indians and Spaniards descended from Indian mothers, unless timely precautions were^c used. Garcilasso, indeed, positively denies the fact of the robberies, affirming that the inca's friends supplied him with provision brought from the flat country; but never once used violence to a Spaniard or even to an Indian, unless carrying off some cattle to answer the necessities of nature, to which, however, the inca had a just title, could be construed into rapine and plunder.

The inca Ta-pac Amaru
taken,

THE viceroy, swayed by the opinion of his council, and in great expectation of recovering the hidden treasures of the late incas, ordered a body of troops to be raised under pretence of completing the conquest of Chili. Garcia Loyola had the command of this corps, which was no sooner formed than he began his march to the mountains of Vilca Pompa. Upon the news of his approach, the prince, with his court, fled twenty leagues^d farther into this desert country, and was closely pursued by the Spaniards. Upon this he began to reflect, that being neither able to resist their power by open force of arms, nor to elude their search for any considerable time, his best method would be to surrender himself before they were too much irritated, as he was conscious to himself of no crime which should make him dread their vengeance. Accordingly he put himself into the hands of Loyola, in full confidence that the Spaniards would take pity on a prince whom they found naked and half famished: little did he imagine the cruel persecution that was intended. The attorney-general was immediately directed to make out an impeachment, in which was set forth a number of the most notorious falsities. He was accused of having ordered his servants to plunder the Spanish merchants and travellers; of entering into a confederacy^e with the caziques, who lived under the protection of the Spaniards, and had lands and lordships assigned them; and of forming a conspiracy to overthrow the present government, and expel the conquerors of Peru. Similar processes were formed against divers caziques, and Spaniards born of Indian mothers, as if they were concerned in the inca's designs of recovering the imperial dignity. In consequence they were all closely imprisoned, many were put to the torture to confess crimes of which they had never been guilty, and give false evidence against their friends and relations, and the most shocking spectacles of tyranny and barbarity were daily exhibited. All the kindred of the inca were banished to Lima, where, in the space of two years, they all perished with famine, hard^f labour, or diseases incident to the moisture of that climate; while the unhappy prince himself was condemned to suffer an ignominious death, merely to remove the fears, quiet the suspicions, and gratify the avarice or ambition of the oppressive conquerors. When sentence was passed, his supposed crimes were proclaimed by the common crier, to give the colour of justice to the most iniquitous proceedings. When his fate was signified to the inca, his reply was, that he knew of no crime he had committed. If the viceroy entertained any jealousy of him or his people, he might easily quiet those apprehensions by sending him to Spain, where he should rejoice to kiss the hands of the king: but it was impossible, he said, that the viceroy could harbour any jealousy; for if his ancestors, with an army of two hundred thousand men, could not resist two hundred Spaniards, entire strangers in the country, how could it be conceived that he would attempt recovering his^g dominions with a handful of men against the conquerors, now so greatly multiplied and dispersed in all the provinces? He urged the improbability of his surrendering himself, had he and condemned to death.

- a he been conscious of any guilt : he was sensible of his innocence ; and he, therefore, gave himself up to the Spaniards, in hopes they would settle upon him the same revenue assigned to his brother. He appealed to the king, and the great Pachacamac, from the sentence passed by the viceroy, who, not content with enjoying his empire, must likewise deprive him of his life, without the least colour of offence. “ This, said he, is the price which the perfidious Spaniard pays for my empire ; this is the return for my confidence. I am injured, and am therefore to suffer an ignominious death ; but the gods cannot behold such injustice with impunity ; remorse at least will torture the breast of the tyrant !” A prediction which was verified soon after. In such pathetic terms did this unfortunate prince bewail his situation, and exclaim against the cruelty of the viceroy, that all who heard him were deeply affected. The Spaniards themselves presented a petition to the viceroy in his behalf, exhorting him not to fally his administration with so inhuman an action, as the murder of a prince deprived of his inheritance, and thrown upon his compassion ; but Don Francisco de Toledo was inflexible. He either believed that the inca’s death was essential to the security of the empire, or he had proceeded to such a length that he was ashamed to retract. A scaffold was therefore erected in the most public part of the city, the prince was brought forth from his dungeon, mounted upon a mule, a halter round his neck, with a cryer before him, proclaiming that he was a traitor and rebel to the catholic king. When he ascended the scaffold, he desired to know what the cryer said ; and being informed, he exclaimed in a kind of phrenzy, “ Let it be published to all the world that I am falsely accused, and that I now die, only because it is the pleasure of the tyrant.” With these words he stretched forth his neck to the executioner, his head was severed with one stroke from his body, and the air was immediately filled with the lamentable cries of the Indians, and the groans of Spaniards themselves, who could not behold this act of barbarity unmoved. Thus ended the male race of the royal blood, and the troubles of Peru. Toledo was recalled soon after, severely reprimanded by the king for his cruelty, his estate sequestered to the crown, and himself confined to his house, where he died of grief, remorse, and chagrin.
- The inca put to death.

S E C T. XII.

In which the Reader will meet with an Account of the Origin, Kings, Laws, Religion, Learning, &c. of the ancient Mexicans.

WE proceed now to give a concise view of the ancient history of Mexico, which, according to the order observed in the preceding volumes of our labours, should have gone before the conquest, but we presumed to make this alteration in the disposition of the work, for reasons extremely obvious. America was discovered gradually, in consequence of a series of expeditions made by the Spaniards. It would have been improper to enter upon the history and description of the country, before we recited those expeditions, the natural order being to give first an account of the means by which the Europeans acquired their knowledge of the Indians, and then relate the effects. Had we presented these particulars to our readers, after the manner of the Spanish writers, in the order in which they became known to the Spaniards, the ancient history must not only have interrupted our narrative of the conquest, but the description of the customs, manners, and provinces of the several kingdoms, would have been dispersed in broken unconnected scraps, which for want of method would afford neither pleasure nor instruction. Yet such is the disposition of Herrera, and the best Spanish authors; the bad effects of which we experienced in course of the numberless occasions we had to consult these writers. Agreeable to this plan, it is proper we should enquire into the ancient history and manners of the Mexicans, before we describe the modern government of that people, or enter upon the description of the country.

Mexicans.*

If we may give any credit to the Mexican tradition, that empire was first inhabited by a savage and barbarous people, who lived naked upon fruits, roots, and the game they took in hunting, at which they were very dexterous. They had no idea of assisting nature, or cultivating the earth; caves, or hollow trees, were their dwellings and houses; laws, and all the acts of civil society, were utterly unknown to them; whence, says Herrera, they were called Chichimecas, or Otonnies, signifying in the language of the country, barbarians. Some of these nations remained unconquered and uncivilized in the mountains in the days of Cortez; and we find that general forming alliances with them, and making them subservient to his purpose, in consequence of the information he had of their love of liberty, and detestation of the Mexican government. Like the Tartars of the northern parts of Asia, they migrated from one province to another, just as it answered their convenience; and when they went upon their hunting expeditions, they were attended by their women, the children being left suspended upon the boughs of trees until their return.

THE Chichimecas either removed voluntarily from the plains of Mexico, or were driven from thence by another people, equally savage, whom the Spanish writers call Navatlacas, without giving any other account of their origin, than their emerging into light from the seven caves, according to their own tradition, and as the name imports; but where these caves were situated, or what was directly meant by the word, we have no information. Acosta indeed relates in general terms, that the Navatlacas were composed of seven tribes, who anciently dwelt in those countries, lying between the thirtieth and fortieth degrees of northern latitude; and about the year 820 began to remove to the country denominated Mexico, spending eighty years in their progress. This migration was effected by single tribes, who set out on their journey in search of new habitations, and moved on gradually without regard to the rest of the nation, if a people unconnected by laws, or any kind of civil policy, can with propriety be called a nation. Colonies were planted by the way so leisurely, that, according to the christian computation, it was not before the beginning of the tenth century the first tribe called Suchimilcans, or gardeners of flowers, established themselves on the south-side of the great lake of Mexico, where they built a city, after the name of its founders.

1st Tribe.

THE next tribe that removed from the northern continent, in quest of more comfortable habitations, were the people called Chalci, or the race of Chalcas. Their migration was several years subsequent to that of the Suchimilcans. They likewise arrived on the banks of the Mexican lake, were pleased with the situation, and resolving to settle themselves, laid the foundation of the city, called by their name Chalcas, signifying, according to the interpretation of Herrera, the people of the mouths.

2d Tribe.

THE people called Tepeacans were the third tribe that removed from their own country, and fixed themselves on the fertile banks, of this beautiful piece of water. The city

3d Tribe.

a which they founded was called Azapuzalco, or ant's nest, a term given to express the extraordinary increase and industry of the first inhabitants.

THE people of the adjoining mountains, termed Calhua, composed the fourth tribe, 4th Tribe, colonized the eastern banks of the lake, built the city Texcuco, and were much admired for the politeness of their manners, and the sweetness of their language, which, according to the Spanish writers, greatly excelled all the other dialects of the Mexican tongue; whence it appears that all those tribes had one original fundamental language, from which arose the different dialects.

BEFORE the arrival of the tribe called Tlatleucans, the four sides of the lake were occupied, which obliged the people to continue their journey across the mountains, and possess themselves of the spot called Eagle's Valley, or Quahunabunac, now known by the name of the Marquisate. Here they built the city Quahunabunac, which some writers call Queruvaca, in a fruitful, flat, and pleasant valley. 5th Tribe.

THE tribe denominated Tlascaltecs, advanced still farther, and seized upon the country called Tlascala, or the Land of Corn, from its exceeding fertility in grain. They combated the utmost difficulties, not only from the roughness of the countries over which they passed, especially the inhospitable snowy-mountain, but the natives, who are reported to be of gigantic stature, and to have obstinately defeated the pretensions of the strangers. At last, after many bloody battles, they were forced to yield to superior numbers, and retreat, like the rest of the Chichimecas and Otomies, to inaccessible mountains, where they preserved their liberties against all the power of the Mexican empire, until the invasion of the Spaniards. 6th Tribe.

AT last arrived the seventh tribe, about three centuries after the migration of the Suchimilcans. Some alledged they were called Mexicans from their leader Mexi. They advanced southwards to seek out new habitations, being told by their god Vitzliputzli, that they should obtain the dominion over all the tribes who preceded them, and possess a country abounding in fine feathers, precious mantles, gold, silver, and the most valuable jewels. Relying implicitly on the completion of this prophecy, they began their tedious journey, carrying the image of their god inclosed in a chest, supported by the shoulders of four priests to whom the deity, according to their tradition, revealed the course they should take, and the accidents that would occur in the journey. From these priests, who found means to persuade this simple people that they were inspired, the Mexicans received laws, religious rites and all the regulations of civil society. They never pitched or removed their camp but by the advice of these sacred impostors; the priests directed when they should decamp, and when settle, probably as it answered their own convenience, and contributed to support their influence. Whenever they halted, an altar was erected in the midst of the camp, under the auspices of the priests, upon which the idol rested, who was supposed to issue directions with respect to sowing, reaping, and building. Many years were consumed in this migration, before the Mexicans reached the promised land. Colonies were left behind, and the course of their journey was marked with instances of their ignorance, superstition, and industry. At length they arrived at Mechoacan where they proposed terminating their labours: but the god was displeased with their design; he thundered down his vengeance, and in one night a multitude of the Mexicans perished. Probably disputes arose about the place they should chuse for their abode, and the bloodshed which followed was ascribed to the anger of the divinity. For this reason the Mexicans again began their peregrinations, but with such reluctance, that they poured out their complaints in the bosom of a sorceress among them; which coming to the ears of the priests, they declared it was the will of the deity, she and her family should be left behind. The sorceress finding herself abandoned, founded a town called Malinalco, ever since reputed famous for witchcraft, assigned for the residence of the magicians employed in the service of the emperors, as appears by what we have reported of Moteczuma's ordering the necromancers to stop the progress of Cortez. Acosta relates a number of fabulous particulars from the Mexican tradition, which we will not stop to transcribe; sufficient it is that all the lands round the lake being already occupied, this tribe was forced to have recourse to arms and intrigue, to procure a settlement in the spot fixed upon by their deity. At last they obtained a little establishment on certain islands in the lake, on condition of paying a tribute to their countrymen, who founded an exclusive right in conquest and possession. This proving irksome to the free spirit of the people, the priests gave out, that Vitzliputzli appeared to them in a dream, and commanded the Mexicans to fix their abode in that part of the lake where they should find an eagle perching on a fig-tree, rising out of a rock. Immediately they set out in search of this habitation, and found a most beautiful eagle sitting, as had been described, on the fig-tree, the wings expanded, the eyes fixed upon the sun, and a little bird struggling to get out of her talons. All fell down and worshipped the object; Herrera alledges, that they offered offered human sacrifices, and sprinkled the tree with the blood of one of the children of the sorcerers, 1-It behind at Malinalco. It was on this very spot the Mexicans built the city of Tecuhitlan, or the Tuna tree on a rock. Hence were taken the Mexican arms, of an eagle with her wings displayed, gazing intensely upon the sun, a snake in her talons, and one foot resting on the branch of a fig tree, to which the emperor Charles V. made some additions after the conquest of the empire by the Mexicans. Gratitude to the god was the first care of the Mexicans. Accordingly they erected an altar in the midst of the island, in which they reposed the idol of their god, and then fell to work in building a city, which they divided into four quarters, now called the wards of St. John, St. Mary, Rotunda, St. Paul, and St. Sebastian. They exchanged fish, hogs, and wild fowl, caught in the lake, with their neighbours for timber, stone, and other materials for building; they joined several islands by bridges, filled up great part of the lake with timber and stone-work, and thus raised the foundation of the famous city of Mexico, by very early proofs of their genius, invention, and industry. The inhabitants being distributed into the several wards, the great god Vitzliputzli, or rather his priests, directed that each should have its tutelary deity to preside over the ward in a subordinate capacity to the supreme divinity. To these the priests gave names, and assigned places of worship; which was no impolitic method of encreasing the number of the sacerdotal tribe, and extending their influence.

8th Tribe.

HERERA mentions an eighth tribe, which migrated from the north, after the building of Mexico; and notwithstanding this circumstance is omitted by other historians, it seems to be as well founded as the rest, every one of which is replete with fable and absurdity. This tribe was distinguished by long hoods, which were afterwards adopted by the Mexicans in their dances. They first settled at Tula, and were ever afterwards distinguished by the appellation of Tulaticans, although their last abode was at Guaxaca. They were charitable, devout, ingenious, and excellent husbandmen. They contributed greatly to civilize the barbarous inhabitants of the lake, and were held in such high esteem that when any man was complimented on his genius, wisdom, and justice, it was usual to say he was a Tulotican.

The Mexicans elect a king.

THE above partition of the city of Mexico could not prevent the inhabitants from falling into parties and factions that threatened the destruction of the infant state. Colonies were therefore sent abroad in search of new habitations, that sufficient room might be made for those who remained. Most of the swarms sent off in this manner united, and settling themselves at Tlatelulco, soon forgot all respect for the mother-country, grew turbulent, and waged perpetual cruel wars with the Mexicans. These foreign attacks, together with the civil commotions which still continued, brought the Mexicans to the brink of despair, and obliged them to deliberate upon some method of establishing the harmony and tranquillity of the city. Several proposals were made; but all were attended with some inconvenience, being calculated to elevate one faction upon the ruins of another. The project most universally received was, that a king should be elected, with full power to execute whatever he thought conducive to the safety and interest of his people; but so many of the chiefs put in their claim for this distinguishing proof of superior merit, that in the end it was resolved to chuse a savage out of some of the surrounding nations. The Mexicans had been long at variance with the monarch of Culuacan, and it was hoped that, by chusing his grandson, the two cities might be united in one common interest, and connected, by a perpetual alliance. The overture was made to the sovereign of Culuacan, and accepted. His grandfather married the prince to a young lady of the first quality in his dominions, and then sent the youthful monarch with his consort to govern the Mexicans, by whom he was received as a guardian angel. On his arrival he was addressed by a long instructive speech, made by one of the oldest men in the city, giving him to understand, that he was raised to that exalted dignity, not to gratify his appetites, and tyrannize over his subjects, but to watch over their welfare, labour to promote their happiness, undergo much fatigue, and take upon him the whole burden of public affairs. Acamapixtli promised all that was enjoined, and confirmed it with an oath; after which a crown was placed on his head, and his hand filled with arrows, to express that he was the defender of the city.

1st King.

FOR a series of years the Mexicans were torn in pieces by civil broils and foreign wars; now they became a moderate people, obedient to their sovereign, and sensible of the benefits they deduced from this change in their political system. They not only enjoyed felicity at home, but rose daily in reputation abroad, which excited the jealousy of the neighbouring princes and states; whence followed wars and tumults, that for a time disturbed their peaceful tranquillity. Among other princes with whom they were at variance, was the king of Azaafzalco, to whom they were forced to make submission, and pay a yearly tribute; which mark of their inferiority so elated that tyrant, that he soon became capricious and

- a and whimsical in his demands, insisting that the Mexicans should not only supply him with timber, but sow corn in the water, and pay him the annual produce. The Mexicans murmured at the unreasonableness of the imposition; but their God Vitzliputzli comforted them with assurances, that this insolence of the Tepeacans would be recoiled upon their own heads, with directions how to comply with the absurd demand, and with promises of future rewards, should they persevere in the task without murmuring. He brought them to make floating baskets of reeds, which they filled with earth, and where they sowed corn, the produce of which they paid by way of tribute to the proud tyrant. Azcapotzalco was astonished at their ingenuity; but instead of relaxing in his demands, he insisted upon things which he believed were still more impossible, to try whether the Mexicans were really magicians as he suspected.
- b The next tribute he imposed was very extraordinary. He demanded, for the acknowledgement of the ensuing year, that certain birds should be brought to him, with their eggs so ready to hatch, that the young should break their shells in his presence; with which the god likewise enabled them to comply. Acamapixtli in vain endeavoured to break the galling yoke; the god, say the Mexicans, reserved this blessing for a proper season, and this excellent prince yielded his last breath, after a reign of more than forty years spent in beautifying the city, building bridges, regulating his dominions, and performing every duty of a great and good monarch. Many of the canals and aqueducts, so much admired by the Spaniards, were the work of Acamapixtli; who, notwithstanding he left a numerous family, would appoint none of his children for his successor, saying, that his people had a right to dispose of themselves as they thought proper, and that to impose a sovereign upon them was to deprive them of their natural liberty.
